"He went to Washington with a green light from the Iranians to take back a message from Bush to them on Iraq," said a senior aide to al-Hakim, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

Hassan al-Sneid, a lawmaker and al-Maliki confidante, said Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was told during a visit to Tehran last week that the Iranians had no objections to a dialogue with the Americans over Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0102137

Iranian influence in Iraq worries the United States and its Arab Sunni allies in the region, like Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt. Shiite and Sunni Arab politicians privately complain that their non-Arab neighbor supports Shiite and even some Sunni armed groups in a bid to achieve what analysts call "controlled chaos."

The aim, they said, was to keep the United States bogged down in Iraq and distracted from taking strong action against Iran over its nuclear program.

Al-Hakim has championed giving Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces the lead role in the fight against Sunni insurgents and al-Qaida in Iraq militants.

Iraqi government advisers, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said al-Hakim had planned to raise the issue with Bush.

Sunni Arabs fear al-Hakim will persuade the Americans to give the security forces a free hand to crush the once-dominant Sunni community. They also fear he will persuade Washington to tone down its demands that the Shiite militias to be disbanded.

Al-Maliki has been reluctant to rein in the militias. Sunnis fear that pressure from Washington to curb the militias will ease after the U.S. military relinquishes the lead on the battlefield to the Iraqis.

Officially, al-Hakim's Badr militia has been disbanded and turned into a political group, but few in Iraq believe it.

Instead, the Badr militia is widely believed to be the source of the top leadership in Iraq's police and army forces. The militia is also suspected of operating death squads targeting Sunni foes and senior members of Saddam's former Baath party.

Bush Meets With Iraq's Shiite Leader (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, December 5, 2006

President Bush told an Iraqi power broker on Monday that the United States was not satisfied with the progress of efforts to stop the sharp escalation of violence in Iraq.

Bush met at the White House with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, the Shiite leader of the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament.

Al-Hakim said that he "vehemently" opposes any regional or international effort to solve Iraq's problems that goes around the unity government in Baghdad.

"Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraq's problems," al-Hakim said.

The president said he spoke with al-Hakim for more than an hour and said they had a "very constructive conversation."

"I assured him that the U.S. supports his work and the work of the prime minister to unify the country," Bush said, referring to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"Part of unifying Iraq is for the elected leaders and society leaders to reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy," Bush said.

"We talked about the need to give the government Iraq more capability as soon as possible so the elected government of Iraq can do that which the Iraqi people want to secure their country from extremists and murderers," Bush said. "I told his eminence that I was proud of the courage of the Iraqi people. I told him that we're not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq. And that we want to continue to work with the sovereign government of Iraq."

Al-Hakim, after what he called a "very clear" meeting earlier with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, told reporters in Arabic that "we have asked for the American forces to stay in Iraq" to enable Iraqi security to deal with terrorists.

Monday's developments came amid an atmosphere of rising expectations about a new U.S. policy in Iraq and an acknowledgment by Bush's national security adviser that Bush accepts that a new approach is warranted.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley said Sunday that while Bush recognizes something different needs to be done, the president won't use the recommendations due this week from the Iraq Study Group as political cover for bringing troops home.

"We have not failed in Iraq," Hadley said as he made the talk show rounds Sunday. "We will fail in Iraq if we pull out our troops before we're in a position to help the Iraqis succeed."

He added: "The president understands that we need to have a way forward in Iraq that is more successful."

But, with the leak of another insider's secret memo, the second in a week, the administration found itself on the defensive.

The latest showed that Donald H. Rumsfeld called for a "major adjustment" in U.S. tactics on Nov. 6 — the day before an election that cost Republicans the Congress and Rumsfeld his job as defense secretary.

Hadley played down the memo as a laundry list of ideas rather than a call for a new course of action.

He said that Bush — just before a pivotal election — was not portraying a different sense of the war to the public than his own defense secretary was giving him in private.

The president "has said publicly what Rumsfeld said, that things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough in Iraq," Hadley said.

Democrats did not buy that.

"The Rumsfeld memo makes it quite clear that one of the greatest concerns is the political fallout from changing course here in the United States," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "The bottom line is there is no one, including the former secretary, who thought the policy the president continues to pursue makes any sense."

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., said the Rumsfeld memo was an example of how the administration has been "mischaracterizing and misstating this war." He said the Iraq conflict had devolved into a civil war. "There's two factions fighting for supremacy inside Iraq and our troops are caught in between," Murtha said on NBC's "Today" show. As incoming chairman of the House Defense Appropriations subcommittee, Murtha said he would put pressure on the administration to redeploy U.S. troops there.

Bush has nominated Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld. His confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee is on Tuesday.

As pressure builds for a new strategy, the report from the Iraq Study Group increasingly is viewed as perhaps clearing the way for a U.S. exit strategy in Iraq. Hadley, though, said the review will be just one factor the White House considers.

After a meeting last week in Jordan, Bush expressed confidence that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government can lead the country toward peace with support from the United States.

Yet Hadley found himself defending his own memo that called that very point into question.

Bush Presses Shi'ite Leader On Violence (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

President Bush yesterday bluntly told the leader of Iraq's largest Shi'ite party that the United States is not satisfied with efforts by Iraqi political leaders to stop sectarian violence, which has spiraled out of control in recent months.

The Oval Office meeting came on a day when the White House announced that the president will meet Thursday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, his closest ally in the Iraq war. That meeting will come just a day after Mr. Bush receives recommendations from a bipartisan commission charged with coming up with solutions to the nearly four-year-long war in Iraq.

After his hourlong meeting yesterday with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who heads the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament and is a leading opponent of anti-U.S. Shi'ite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the president said political leaders must step up to quell dissent among opposing factions.

"I told him that we're not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq, and that we want to continue to work with the sovereign government of Iraq," Mr. Bush said. "Part of unifying Iraq is for the elected leaders and society leaders to reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy."

But Mr. al-Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, said he "vehemently" opposes any regional or international effort to solve Iraq's problems that goes around the unity government in Baghdad.

"We cannot bypass the political process. Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems," he said. "Therefore, we believe that the Iraqi issue should be solved by the Iraqis with the help of friends everywhere. But we reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue."

Yesterday's meeting, which followed the president's meeting last week in Amman, Jordan, with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, begins a new effort by the Bush administration to create a dialogue with Iraqi political leaders. Mr. Bush is scheduled to meet next month with Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, who is a Sunni, and one senior administration official said top U.S. officials will meet soon with other moderate Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish leaders.

Still, the escalating sectarian violence in Iraq has prompted some U.S. critics to step up their calls for immediate withdrawal. "There's two factions fighting for supremacy inside Iraq, and our troops are caught in between," Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, said Sunday.

Mr. al-Hakim said Iraq can solve its own problems but told reporters after a morning meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that "we have asked for the American forces to stay in Iraq" in an effort to help Iraqi security forces contend with terrorists.

"We will work very hard and seek all forms of cooperation at the international level and the regional level in order to defeat terrorism that it is trying to use Iraq as a base in order to sabotage the future of that nation," Mr. al-Hakim said.

The White House yesterday did not rule out a possible meeting with Sheik al-Sadr. "I don't know if al-Sadr would also be willing to entertain the option. It's a very interesting question; we'll go back and muse on it in a few minutes," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

The outreach to all political leaders in Iraq, Mr. Snow said, is designed to give the president the chance "to talk to significant leaders and make the case that it's important for people to build together across sectarian lines, to take the measures necessary for national reconciliation."

Mr. al-Hakim defended the U.S. role in Iraq, and said Americans are unaware of the advances taking place in Iraq.

"The Iraqi situation has been subjected to a great deal of defamation, and the true picture is not being presented in order to show a dark side of what's happening in Iraq," he said.

Speaking at the United States Institute of Peace after meeting with Mr. Bush, Mr. al-Hakim endorsed proposals to create federal regions in Iraq, saying that concerns about such plans "are exaggerated."

"Federalism definitely will not divide Iraq," said Mr. al-Hakim. He said that religious -- not secular -- authorities were the only ones that could hold the country together.

"We should not resort to dealing with issues that may weaken the religious authorities, otherwise Iraq may be subjected to catastrophic storms that no power in the world could calm or control [or] return Iraq to its senses," he said.

In a Fox News interview last night, Mr. Bush told Brit Hume he was pleased by the Shi'ite leader's expressions of commitment to a unity government in Iraq.

"There is a lot of talk about Shia dominance to the exclusion of other folks in Iraq. I didn't hear that at all -- quite the contrary," Mr. Bush said. "I listened to a man who understands that the way forward is for there to be a government of and by and for the people."

Referring to his previous meeting with Mr. al-Maliki, Mr. Bush said both the prime minister and Mr. al-Hakim "understand that murderers must be stopped, that you can't have a society, a constitutional government presiding over a society in which murderers are allowed to run free."

US 'not Satisfied' With Pace Of Iraqi Progress (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

President George W. Bush told a powerful Iraqi Shia cleric on Monday that he was not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq as they discussed how the US could accelerate assistance to the Baghdad government.

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (Sciri), a key partner in the coalition government, said talks focused on arms and training for the Iraqi army and the transfer of military authority from the US commander to the Iraqi government.

Speaking later at the US Institute of Peace (USIP), Mr Hakim criticised US forces for not cracking down hard enough on Sunni insurgents.

Decisive strikes were needed, Mr Hakim said. Otherwise, he warned, Shia spiritual leaders might lose their capacity to contain Shia anger and Iraq would be plunged into civil war and "catastrophic storms that no power in the world could calm or control".

USIP is assisting the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is due to release its recommendations for new strategies in Iraq on Wednesday. A gradual redeployment of US combat troops by early 2008 is expected to form the core proposal. But there was no suggestion by Mr Bush or Mr Hakim of adopting such a timeline.

"I told His Eminence that I was proud of the courage of the Iraqi people. I told him that we're not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq," Mr Bush said.

Although White House officials portrayed the meeting as part of a normal process of consultation with Iraqi politicians, Mr Hakim's visit to the White House fuelled the perception of an administration desperately seeking a new direction.

Asked whether Iraqis were worse off now than under Saddam Hussein – as asserted by Kofi Annan, UN secretary-general, in a BBC interview – the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, replied: "You will have to ask the Iraqi people."

Mr Hakim vies with Moqtada al-Sadr, a radical cleric and militia leader, for the mantle of Iraq's most powerful Shia politician. Their family feud is generational. Both their militias have been accused of involvement in sectarian violence against the Sunni Arab minority – a charge Mr Hakim denies.

Mr Hakim also maintains close ties to Iran, where he lived in exile after 1980 and went on to lead the Badr brigade, an Iranian-trained and funded militia that fought on the side of Iran against Iraq in their 1980-88 war.

Mr Bush and Mr Hakim have rejected a proposal by Mr Annan, which is expected to be echoed by the Iraq Study Group, for direct US engagement with Iran and Syria. Mr Hakim said Iraq would deal with its neighbours.

Mr Hakim's support for the coalition government is crucial to its survival, although his relations with Nouri al-Maliki, prime min-ister, are difficult and he may be angling for US support for one of his allies to replace him.

Judith Yaphe, an analyst at Washington's National Defence University, said: "We may be trying to play on long-standing animosity between Sadr and the Hakims. He could be an ally but it's a very dangerous game to play and usually we don't play these games very well."

More deaths in Baghdad prompted Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador, and General George Casey, the US commander, to issue a joint plea to Iraqis not to be "drawn down the road of senseless brutality" in tit-for-tat sectarian killings.

Sins Of The Father (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

It is not the fault of Jenna or Barbara Bush that their father, the president, has gotten us into a war that he doesn't know how to get us out of. And, although you can blame parents for almost anything, George W. and Laura Bush are no longer responsible for the behavior of their twin daughters, who are in their mid-20s. Presidents, like the rest of us, don't get to choose their relatives. Remember Billy Carter?

Anyway, Jenna and Barbara are far from George W. Bush's biggest familial problem. The law of averages has given him at least one ne'er-do-well brother -- Neil. The biggest familial thorn in the president's side is probably his father, always ready (or so it seems) to send out a Brent Scowcroft or a James Baker with some patronizing and excruciatingly public advice for the young pup.

As for the twins, we actually know next to nothing about them. George and Laura Bush made the wise decision to keep them out of the limelight, and -- with surprisingly little slippage -- they have managed to enforce this policy on the press, on the Republican propaganda machine and on the girls themselves. Good for them.

From what little has leaked out, it seems that Jenna and Barbara are party girls who like to drink and dance until the wee hours with aristocrats and frat boys. Jenna is interning for UNICEF in Latin America (not actually teaching kids, as originally reported, but involved somehow in education). The twins recently took a trip to Argentina. Their first night there, partying in Buenos Aires, Barbara lost her purse to a thief.

So it would appear that George W. Bush's daughters are not Amy Carter or Chelsea Clinton or Karenna Gore. So what? Are you surprised?

Nevertheless, there is a war on. It's a war that has killed 3,000 Americans, most of them around Jenna and Barbara's age or younger. It has killed hundreds of thousands of Iraqis of all ages. And even more Americans and Iraqis have been injured, lost limbs, suffered terrible pain. President Bush can be quite eloquent in talking about the sacrifices of American soldiers and -- he always adds -- their families. In the Reagan style that has become almost mandatory, he uses anecdotes. He talks of Marine 2nd Lt. Frederick Pokorney Jr. "His wife, Carolyn, received a folded flag. His two-year-old daughter, Taylor, knelt beside her mother at the casket to say a final goodbye."

Bush says truly, about the American dead, "They did not yearn to be heroes. They yearned to see mom and dad again and to hold their sweethearts and to watch their sons and daughters grow. They wanted the daily miracle of freedom in America, yet they gave all that up and gave life itself for the sake of others."

Living your life according to your own values is a challenge for everyone, and it must be a special challenge if you happen to be the president. No one thinks that the president should have to give up a child to prove that his family is as serious about freedom as these other families he praises. But it would be reassuring to see a little struggle here -- some sign that the Bush family truly believes that American soldiers are dying for our freedom, and that it's worth it.

Who knows? Maybe they have had huge arguments about this. Maybe George and Laura wanted the girls to join the Red Cross, or the Peace Corps, or do something that would at least take them off the party circuit for a couple of years. And perhaps the girls said no. But I doubt this scenario, don't you?

The opposite approach to this question is taken by Jim Webb, the incoming senator from Virginia. Webb seems to believe that because he served in Vietnam, anyone who could have but didn't should shut up. That includes people who opposed that war -- that is, who got it right -- as well as those who supported it. Webb's son is serving in Iraq, and -- in a gesture that would throw Dr. Freud for a loop -- Webb wears a pair of the son's combat boots. At a White House reception for new members of Congress, Webb avoided the receiving line and then, when Bush came up and asked him how his son was doing, he basically told the president to flake off. Webb's self-righteousness can be obnoxious. But at least he is being morally serious.

At first it seemed a brilliant strategy -- repellent, but brilliant -- to isolate most Americans from the cost of the war in Iraq. It's starting to seem a lot less so. As the deaths and injuries mount, more and more people are touched by the war -- and become understandably resentful of those who are not. Bush, in his speeches, is eloquent about what no one doubts -- the sacrifice -- but banal about what most people have come to doubt: the purpose.

But no amount of eloquence can overcome the bald contrast between that rhetoric and how his own family lives. His daughters are over 21, and he can't control them, but that doesn't let them off the hook. They are now independent moral actors, and their situation requires that they either publicly oppose their father's war or do something to support it. Is it unfair to expect Jenna and Barbara to shape their lives around their father's folly? Of course it's unfair. If this is war, then unfairness comes with the territory.

Iraq Panel Likened To Vietnam 'Wise Men' (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which has received concentrated press coverage this fall as it prepares to report to President Bush tomorrow, was the idea of a Republican lawmaker looking for fresh ideas on the war.

For some, it brings memories of Vietnam in 1967 and 1968, when President Johnson turned to a group of "wise men," mostly Democrats, for advice on how to win that long war. But while Mr. Johnson actively sought their counsel, the White House and Pentagon are not overly enthusiastic about an outside group of former politicians and Cabinet members suggesting war policy, according to senior officials.

While the Iraq Study Group was in the homestretch of a 10-month project to write a report, the Bush administration in September kicked off its own top-to-bottom reviews on many fronts. The office of the secretary of defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department and the National Security Council are all weighing options. The ideas range from A to Z: pull out all troops now or add more troops to quell restive Baghdad and Anbar province.

Mr. Bush already has received some options from Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, and from outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Mr. Rumsfeld provided a list of 21 possible actions in a Nov. 6 memo to the president.

"Let's see if the [Iraq Study Group] comes up with anything better than this," a Pentagon official said of Mr. Rumsfeld's ideas. Mr. Rumsfeld proposed innovative ideas on the possible redeployment of forces inside Iraq and denying construction projects to violent communities.

By the time the White House begins studying the group's report, the president will also have scores of ideas from his own advisers.

The study group's main recommendations are thought to be a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops but with no predetermined timeline, and Washington engagement with Iran and Syria.

Rep. Frank R. Wolf, Virginia Republican, pushed the study group idea after a September 2005 visit to Iraq. The deteriorating security situation indicated to him the administration needed a fresh look. He proposed a panel of outside experts and sold the idea to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Mr. Rumsfeld. Mr. Wolf then sponsored a $1 million appropriation to fund the study.

Mr. Wolf, other members of Congress and the U.S. Institute of Peace collectively selected the co-chairman -- former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, Indiana Democrat. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton then selected the other eight members.

Some have referred to the study panel's cast of "formers" as nine wise men, plus one woman. It includes four members of Congress; two secretaries of state; one attorney general; one Supreme Court justice, one secretary of defense; and an investment banker and Washington power broker.

The group began work in March. By November, it had listened to more than 250 current and former government officials, military personnel and national security thinkers. It interviewed Mr. Bush twice.

The recommendations will be available online at 11 a.m. tomorrow on the sites of four organizations tied to the group: the U.S. Institute of Peace (www.usip.org); the Baker Institute for Public Policy at Rice University (www.bakerinstitute.org); the Center for Strategic and International Studies (www.csis.org); and the Center for the Study of the Presidency (www.thepresidency.org).

Also at 11 a.m., the group will formally release its report in a press conference on Capitol Hill. Members of the panel, including Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, will appear Thursday before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Unlike the September 11 commission, the Iraq Study Group has no statutory mandate. Its recommendations are not binding on Mr. Bush. But Democrats who want the president to change course in Iraq and bring troops home are expected to embrace any recommendation, no matter how imprecise, to cut troop levels in the near future.

The study group is somewhat unique.

"It's the old throwback to the 'wise men,' " said Richard Shultz, director of International Security Studies Program at Tufts University's Fletcher School. "Johnson did the same thing."

Mr. Johnson, his Vietnam War policy in shambles, summoned some of the most experienced minds in the Democratic Party to come to the White House on a number of occasions in 1967 and 1968 to advise the president. The list included Dean Acheson, President Truman's secretary of state; Judge Abe Fortas; and retired Gen. Omar Bradley, one of the top U.S. commanders in World War II.

Unlike the Iraq Study Group, however, Mr. Johnson's "wise men" did not constitute a formal group, with staff and a congressional budget.

"The extent of [the Iraq Study Group] is unique, but it's the same principle: The 'wise men,' " Mr. Shultz said.

Three weeks after the "wise men" came for a Nov. 2, 1967, meeting, Robert McNamara resigned as Mr. Johnson's defense secretary in a break over war policy.

Iraq Report Confronts Bush Resolve (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

DOJ_NMG_0102143

The Christian Science Monitor, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON

With the White House facing a pivotal week for Iraq policy, the big question is not so much what the bipartisan Iraq Study Group will say when it releases its report Wednesday, but how President Bush will respond.

In the final two years of his tenure and well aware that Iraq more than anything will define his place in history, Mr. Bush is facing intense pressure to make extensive adjustments to save a project that most experts conclude is rapidly failing.

At the same time, recent insistence by the president that his policies will yet succeed suggest that Bush will resist recommendations that do not mesh with his vision for Iraq.

"This president doesn't like to backtrack - but then sometimes he does," says Jon Alterman, Middle East program director at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "He sees his legacy as showing resolve, and that is going to influence any decisions [on Iraq] as much as the enormous pressure he is under to change course."

For example: the study group is expected to recommend a significant drawdown of the 144,000 US troops in Iraq over the coming year, even if Iraqi forces are not up to replacing them. That proposal "simply has no realism to it," Bush said last week. But another anticipated proposal, for substantially increased training of Iraqi security forces, is more likely to receive a presidential nod.

Much has been revealed in recent days suggesting the congressionally commissioned Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, will recommend a direction that's neither "stay the course" nor "cut and run." Recommendations are expected to include measures for using future US troop levels as leverage to pressure the Iraqi government to make hard political decisions - on disbanding militias, for example, or accommodating Sunnis.

At the same time, the Baker commission is expected to favor intensifying and broadening regional diplomatic efforts to help pull Iraq back from the brink of full-blown civil war. That recommendation is expected to include opening dialogue with objectionable but influential neighbors in the region, especially Iran and Syria.

The administration has been dropping hints that a major adjustment is forthcoming in US Iraq policy. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, said Sunday that the president would unveil a "new way forward" in coming weeks that will include "significant changes."

But Bush is also acting to put the public on notice that any changes will be what he determines is best, based on the full panoply of recommendations he is receiving. Four policy outlines beyond Baker report

Bush and various aides have repeated recently that the Baker commission's report is just one of a number that the president will be receiving over the coming days on how to proceed in Iraq.

In addition to studies anticipated from the Pentagon and the National Security Council, Bush has also received recently at least two detailed memos - from Mr. Hadley and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld - offering analysis and recommendations that emphasize the need for deep policy changes to alter Iraq's downward spiral.

Those two memos in particular have shifted the political ground for Bush as he awaits what was already expected to be a week of pressure for change with the release of the Iraq Study Group's recommendations.

"The flow of calls to reconsider Iraq policy means the context is very different - and more intense," says Mr. Alterman, a former State Department policy planning staff member in the president's first term. "After the Hadley and Rumsfeld memos, this would be the third call in a week saying: 'You really have to consider alternatives' - and to a president who has made clear he doesn't want to consider alternatives."

Given the high profile the Iraq Study Group has achieved, the White House won't be able to brush it off. At the same time, it will not want it to appear that the president is hanging on its every word, former presidential advisers say.

"We can anticipate that the [Baker] report will offer such a number of nuanced statements that it will permit reading into it what you want to see," says Geoffrey Kemp, an expert in security issues at the Nixon Center in Washington who was on the national security staff of the Reagan White House. "It will be difficult for the president to dismiss it, but ... neither will [Bush] want to look as if he is waiting, hat in hand, for its recommendations." Analyst: Bush will take his time to respond

Given those dual pressures, Mr. Kemp says he expects the White House to "take some time to digest what the study group has to say," and then to incorporate those aspects it agrees with into its new policy.

"I think [Bush] will use Baker-Hamilton to bolster his case where he can," Kemp says.

For example, Kemp says he now sees as practically written in stone a significant drawdown of US troops over the coming year.

But some analysts expect Bush to announce in the coming weeks an actual increase in US troops patrolling the Iraqi capital. If that happens, the president can be expected to announce such a decision as a short-term necessity for achieving the long-term goal of "withdrawing US troops and putting the Iraqis in control of their destiny," Kemp says.

White House political calculations will play a role in how it responds, others say.

"Remember this is not a nonpartisan commission, it is bipartisan," Alterman says. "So it will be looking at political outcomes as much as at outcomes on the grounds in Iraq."

Bush May Face Iraq Change Recommendation (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, December 5, 2006

It would take a major policy shift for the Bush administration to expand its sporadic dialogue with two old foes, Iran and Syria, as the Iraq study commission is expected to recommend.

The bipartisan panel appears convinced that reaching out to Iran and Syria could help stabilize neighboring Iraq, and improve chances for easing overall Middle East tensions by boosting the prospects for an Arab-Israeli settlement.

The White House has said it would consider talking to Iran and Syria if the Iraq Study Group makes that recommendation. Administration officials have also dropped hints that they might be willing to hold talks with Iran restricted to curbing violence in Iraq.

Yet the administration's overall tone has been one of skepticism about reaching accommodation with Tehran and Damascus. It has long accused both countries of stirring up trouble in the region, and it confronts both of them on issues besides Iraq.

With the Iraq report due for release Wednesday, administration officials continue to accuse Iran and Syria of arming and otherwise supporting insurgents in Iraq, Lebanon and elsewhere. They insist there is nothing to be gained by rewarding Iran and Syria with high-profile discourse with American diplomats.

"If diplomatic engagement serves a broader strategy in moving Iran, that is something we will consider," said David Satterfield, top State Department adviser on Iraq, in a recent AP Television News interview.

But he added, "What is critical is actions on the part of the Iranian government. The only actions we have seen from Tehran have been negative ones."

Satterfield expressed similar doubts about Syria, saying, "We don't believe engagement will serve a useful purpose in the absence of substantive changes by the Syrian government."

On Sunday, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., said on "Face the Nation" on CBS, "Asking Iran and Syria to help us succeed in Iraq is about like your local fire department asking a couple of arsonists to help put out the fire."

By contrast, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said on CNN's "Late Edition" that he supported a multinational Mideast conference including Iran and Syria, "because nothing will hold unless you begin to resolve those differences."

The Bush administration's differences with Iran include a demand that Tehran suspend development of nuclear weapons — a goal Iran denies it is pursuing — before the U.S. will join European-led talks that offer Iran economic inducements to halt its nuclear program.

The U.S. also wants Iran to cease its support for Hezbollah militia in Lebanon and other groups designated as terrorist by the State Department.

Iran and the United States have not had formal relations since fundamentalist revolutionaries seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran in 1979 and held Americans captive for 444 days. Successive U.S. administrations have harbored hopes that a more moderate leadership would emerge in Iran.

Relations have soured since the Sept. 11 attacks and President Bush's inclusion of Iran in an "axis of evil" with North Korea and Saddam Hussein's Iraq. They have only worsened since hardline President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took office last year, with confrontations over his calls for Israel's destruction and Tehran's nuclear efforts.

Richard Perle, a former U.S. official who is a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, said last week that if the Iraq panel called for talks with Iran and Bush took the advice, "It will be seen throughout the region as an indication of American weakness."

"The Iranians are fundamentally on the other side on Iraq and nothing we can say or do will change that," Perle said in an interview.

On the other hand, Robert Gates, Bush's choice to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, told the Council on Foreign Relations in 2004, "Direct dialogue with Tehran on specific areas of mutual concern should be pursued."

Over the years, while keeping their distance from Tehran, succeeding U.S. administrations have worked with Syria to promote peace with Israel.

But relations between Washington and Damascus have remained cool, largely because Syria views the U.S. as pro-Israel and Syria supports Islamic extremist groups.

Tensions worsened after the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq, with the Bush administration charging that Syria was letting insurgents cross its border into Iraq to fight coalition troops.

Bush has focused on curtailing Syria's domination of Lebanon. And State Department spokesman Tom Casey called last week for an end to "its well-known support for Palestinian rejectionist groups as well as other terrorist organizations," which include the leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

The U.S. withdrew its ambassador to Syria in February 2005 after the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in Beirut. A U.N. investigation has implicated top Syrian officials, but President Bashar Assad has denied Syrian involvement.

Cut And Walk (NYT)

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

In the 1990s, we became more aware of the importance not only of I.Q. to success but also of “E.Q.” — “emotional intelligence quotient.” Authors like Daniel Goleman explained E.Q. in part as an ability to assess, adjust to and influence the emotions of others.

These days, as we grope for a new policy in Iraq, we desperately need that kind of emotional intelligence, particularly toward overseas nationalism. Insensitivity to nationalism may be the biggest foreign policy mistake the U.S. and Europe alike have made in the last half-century — from Vietnam to Suez, Mexico to Algeria — and we’ve been repeating it in Iraq.

One of the essential paradoxes is that even well-meaning efforts to stabilize Iraq with our military presence inflame Iraqi nationalism and bolster nationalist extremists. Inadvertently, because we’re not sensitive enough to how our actions are perceived in the Iraqi cauldron, we end up empowering extremists who destabilize the country.

Exhibit A is the shadowy man who has won a reputation as perhaps the single most brutal mass murderer there, Abu Deraa. He is a Shiite who in the late Saddam years was apparently just a petty forger, according to Terrorism Monitor, a publication of the Jamestown Foundation.

Abu Deraa won renown as a “patriot” who attacked U.S. armored vehicles. Then he diversified into criminal kidnapping, which generated cash to make him a player and finance his band of gangsters.

The whispers about Abu Deraa and his torture of the Sunnis he captures — he specializes in using electric drills on their skulls — have won him increasingly mythic status. Some of the biggest and boldest attacks in Iraq are attributed to him, and he brings creativity and economies of scale to his murder enterprise. An Australian news account described how he once drove a fleet of ambulances into a Sunni neighborhood and used loudspeakers to call on young men to donate blood to help fellow Sunnis injured by Shiites. Dozens of young men came forward — and were executed.

Abu Deraa told Time magazine, in an interview through an intermediary, that his fight is against “occupiers, their supporters” and Sunni insurgents, and he painted himself as a pious Muslim driven by a “sense of holy duty” to attack American forces. Those arguments resonate among some Shiites, who see him as a hero and protect him, even as he helps tear his country apart.

At bottom, Abu Deraa is a psychopathic thug who terrorizes fellow Iraqis. But he has been able to use his attacks on American forces to win political cover to foment civil war.

So as we Americans plan our own strategy for Iraq, let's show more emotional intelligence. The Iraqi Study Group is right about needing to consult with neighbors like Syria and Iran, but that doesn't resolve another central problem in Iraq: Our open-ended military presence, perceived by Iraqis as a grab for Iraqi oil and bases, ends up legitimizing extremists like Abu Deraa and aggravating civil war.

Our military presence risks expanding the civil war in another way. As we side more openly with the Shiite government in its struggle against Sunni insurgents, Saudi Arabia — already nervous about the rise of Shiites — is hinting that it may help the Sunnis defend themselves. We could end up with a war in which Iran and Iraqi Shiites battle against Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Iraqi Sunni Arabs. (That's when gas prices reach $5 a gallon.)

So let's raise our E.Q. and take account of Iraqi emotions and nationalist sensitivities, particularly alarm about American bases on Iraqi soil. For starters, we can (as Don Rumsfeld noted in his leaked memo) quickly give back up to 50 of our 55 military bases in Iraq.

We should also state clearly that we will not keep any permanent military bases in Iraq. That's not going to persuade the extremist insurgents, but polls suggest that such an announcement would reduce the support that extremists get from ordinary Iraqis. That's a simple step that would save American and Iraqi lives.

The same logic argues for a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq, ending by November 2007. Granted, there is a real risk that the bloodbath will worsen significantly when we leave. But Iraqis themselves say overwhelmingly in polls that our presence is inflaming the violence rather than reducing it, and a timetable would be a useful signal that we really are going to pull out and that Iraqi factions need to conciliate and address their own problems.

We needn't cut and run. But let's post a schedule, and then cut and walk. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Iraq Study Group Findings Due Wednesday (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, December 5, 2006

The Iraq Study Group's long-awaited report on how the U.S. should overhaul its effort in Iraq will be released online on Wednesday, with members of the panel expected to testify on Capitol Hill the following day.

The recommendations will be posted to the Web sites of four organizations that have been involved in the effort: the U.S. Institute of Peace (http://www.usip.org); the Baker Institute for Public Policy at Rice University (http://www.bakerinstitute.org); the Center for Strategic and International Studies (http://www.csis.org); and the Center for the Study of the Presidency (http://www.thepresidency.org).

The report will be posted at 11 a.m. EST, just as the commission begins a news conference on Capitol Hill formally releasing its work. The panel is headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana.

In a letter Monday, Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Carl Levin, D-Mich., asked Baker and Hamilton and other members of the group to testify Thursday before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The group's study is seen as the first major bipartisan effort to rethink military and political options in Iraq, where increasing violence has raised questions about the viability of the Iraqi government and U.S. policy.

The group is expected to recommend gradually phasing out the mission of U.S. troops in Iraq from combat to training and supporting Iraqi units, with a goal of pulling back American combat troops by early 2008.

On Oct. 5, Warner said he thought the Iraq war was "drifting sideways" without a commitment from the Iraqi government to disarm militias. He said he wanted Baker's group to testify on its findings as soon as possible following the Nov. 7 elections, so that Congress could use its advice to forge its own bipartisan consensus.

"The ultimate power rests in the power of the people," Warner said in an interview with The Associated Press last week. The public, he added, will "watch very carefully as to how the Congress and the president hopefully work together, achieve a consensus."

While On Panel, Iraq Study Group Members Made Political Donations (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, December 5, 2006

A few members of the Iraq Study Group have made political contributions since they joined the bipartisan committee, with one panelist giving to a leading House Democrat who has embraced a quick withdrawal of U.S. troops.

The contributions could be fodder for critics who disapprove of the group's final recommendations, even though the panel consists of five Democrats and five Republicans.

Two months after the Iraq Study Group was launched, Leon Panetta contributed $500 to Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), the most outspoken House Democrat on the redeployment of troops in Iraq. Panetta is a former Democratic congressman who served as President Clinton's chief of staff.

Other group members opened their wallets for politicians this fall, but most steered clear of endorsing candidates so publicly.

The bipartisan group, which is scheduled to release its highly anticipated recommendations on the Iraq war tomorrow, is expected to lobby Congress and the Bush administration to implement its proposals in the coming months.

Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.) played a leading role in the formation of the study group. On July 31, one of its members, Vernon Jordan, a former adviser to Clinton, contributed $500 to Wolf's 2006 opponent, Judy Feder (D). Wolf won, attracting 57 percent of the vote.

Leaked information about the study group's forthcoming recommendations has triggered criticism from some conservatives, who have mocked the idea of talking to Iran and Syria about resolving the Iraq conflict.

Fred Barnes, executive editor of the right-wing Weekly Standard magazine, has panned the study group for what he sees as a retreat mentality. Barnes and other conservatives believe Democrats and the national media will champion the recommendations.

The bipartisan 9/11 commission also came under fire from conservatives, though the GOP-led Congress did pass many of its recommendations. After commission members complained about the input that Congress ignored, GOP lawmakers returned fire, suggesting the panel leaned to the left.

Democrats have vowed to implement all of the 9/11 panel's proposals, though they may lack the votes to do so.

Six of the 10 members on the 9/11 commission made campaign contributions after they joined the panel. The 9/11 members agreed that they should not physically participate in partisan activities, but did not put any limitations on political giving.

It is unclear whether the ISG came to a similar agreement. A spokesman for the group did not comment for this article.

Of the 10 commission members, Jordan was the most generous to political war chests in the 2006 cycle, giving more than $36,000 in contributions, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com. He gave to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.), and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), among many others.

Yet political giving on the Iraq Study Group is not confined to Democrats. James Baker, co-chairman of the committee and chief of staff to former President George H.W. Bush, contributed $15,000 to the National Republican Senatorial Committee in April. The study group was launched on March 15.

Federal records indicated that former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.), the other co-chairman, did not make any political contributions during the 2006 cycle.

Former Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.), another study group member, gave campaign cash to Rep. Barbara Cubin (R-Wyo.) and Sens. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), and Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) after joining the group.

At press time, Simpson told The Hill, "I give to people. What's new?" He added any article on the political giving of the ISG is "bt" and amounts to "extraneous crap."

He strongly defended the commission's work, noting each of the panelists signed on to every sentence in the forthcoming ISG report.

The Iraq Study Group is supported by four expert working groups and a panel of senior retired military officers. Most of the members of these subgroups did not make political contributions since being appointed as SIG analysts.

The study group says that "it will make a forward-looking, independent assessment of the current and prospective situation on the ground in Iraq."

Baker, Panetta and Jordan did not comment by press time.

An Earmark With An Impact (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

One never knows what some lawmaker will insert into a spending bill without public scrutiny: a remote bridge, or maybe a bike path. Then there is the Iraq Study Group, better known as the Baker-Hamilton commission.

In the last year, lawmakers of both parties have criticized earmarks as fostering waste and corruption. But few are complaining about the Iraq Study Group, which will release its much-anticipated report on Wednesday.

Representative Frank R. Wolf, Republican of Virginia, created the commission single-handedly last year when he inserted a $1 million earmark into a supplemental spending bill for the war.

"The fact is that there were members of Congress who would have opposed it," Mr. Wolf said. "Should I have allowed that to stop me from doing what was in the best interest of the country?"

There Is Much More At Stake For America Than Iraq (FT)

By Zbigniew Brzezinski

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

This is the week in which a painful truth finally came calling on power in the Oval Office of the White House. The president, though still mouthing his self-reassuring slogans to the public, has on his desk two documents, each telling him in effect that "mission accomplished" has turned into mission bust.

Superficially, the two documents could not be more different. Donald Rumsfeld's memo on the conduct of the military operations in Iraq, submitted just prior to his sudden dismissal, is a very brief and highly personal summary of the various tactical adjustments that might be considered in the light of the setbacks in fighting the Iraqi insurgency. It conveys anxiety but offers no strategic alternative.

The long-awaited Baker-Hamilton Study Group report assessing broader US policy options in Iraq is a lengthy compromise statement reflecting a typical, middle-of-the-road consensus among an elite Washington "focus group", composed of esteemed individuals not handicapped by much historical or geopolitical familiarity with the region's problems.

Arguing for conditional military redeployment from Iraq, it offers sound advice on the desirability of wider diplomatic initiatives to engage Iraq's neighbours in a collective search for regional stability, including the belated need to tackle seriously the lingering Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The real importance of both documents is in what they do not say explicitly but implicitly convey: that the war has been a disaster; that the US must find a way to disengage by handing over the mess it created to the Iraqi leaders that the US itself had elevated to power; and that eventually the US may have to leave while blaming those same leaders for the US failure to cope. That notion is implicit even in some of Mr Rumsfeld's options and it is inherent in the 16-months deadline set by the Baker-Hamilton group for eventual US military disengagement.

Neither document faces squarely two basic and troubling realities: that since in Iraq (except for Kurdistan) real power is not in the hands of the Iraqi politicians resident in the US-protected Green Zone in Baghdad, any political solution must engage the Shia theocracy, with its militias; and that the longer the American occupation continues, the already declining US influence in the Middle East will give way to regional extremism and instability, especially if continuing indecision over the basic strategic choices in Iraq continue to be matched by US unwillingness to address the negative regional consequences of Israel's prolonged and increasingly repressive occupation of the Palestinians.

The combination of the two has already elevated Iran's geopolitical power in the region. Hence the need of the moment is not for tactical tinkering or long consensus reports. Can one imagine Charles de Gaulle in the late 1950s waiting weeks for a long study by French public figures on how to end the Algerian war that was damaging France's national unity and international reputation? Leadership derived from a sense of history requires sometimes the cutting of Gordian knots, not tying oneself up in knots.

The president, and America's political leadership, must recognise that the US role in the world is being gravely undermined by the policies launched more than three years ago. The destructive war in Iraq, the hypocritical indifference to the human dimensions of the stalemate in Israeli- Palestinian relations, the lack of diplomatic initiative in dealing with Iran and the frequent use of Islamophobic rhetoric are setting in motion forces that threaten to push America out of the Middle East, with dire consequences for itself and its friends in Egypt, Israel, Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

America needs a strategic change of course, and it has to be undertaken on a broad front. It must accept the fact that real leadership in Iraq should be based on a coalition of the Shia clergy commanding the loyalty of Shia militias and of the autonomous Kurds and that the sooner a date is set for US departure, the sooner the authentic Iraqi leaders will be able to enlist Iraq's neighbours in a wider regional effort to promote a more stable Iraq. It must also engage its allies in a joint definition of the basic parameters of an Israeli-Palestinian settlement, for the two parties to the conflict will never do so on their own. Last but not least, the US must be ready to pursue multilateral and bilateral talks with Iran, including regional security issues.

In brief, the immediate dilemma is Iraq but the larger stake is the future of the Middle East.

Blurring Political Lines In The Military Debate (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — No military expert was more forthright in opposing the Iraq war than Anthony C. Zinni.

General Zinni, a retired marine who once served as the top American military officer in the Middle East, contended that the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's Iraq was vastly overstated and that invading Iraq would be a burdensome distraction from the struggle against Al Qaeda.

These days General Zinni is delivering another provocative message: that leaving Iraq quickly would strengthen Iranian influence throughout the Middle East, create a sanctuary for terrorist groups, encourage even more sectarian strife in Iraq and risk turmoil in an oil-rich region.

"This is not Vietnam or Somalia or those places where you can walk away," General Zinni said in a recent interview. (He served in both countries.) "If we just pull out, we will find ourselves back in short order."

Instead, he says, the United States should leave open the door for a temporary increase in American troops, an argument he included in a broader plan prepared for the World Security Institute, a research organization, and made public on Monday. "It may be necessary to surge them for a short term," he said.

General Zinni noted that his position was similar to that of Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, a staunch supporter of the decision to invade. "I do believe more troops are required on the ground," the general said. "I believe what Senator McCain says."

The Iraq debate roiling Washington cuts across partisan divides and has led to some odd bedfellows. For example, the troop reduction and pullback options suggested by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in a memo written just before he resigned reflect some convergence between him and Democratic lawmakers who have criticized the war.

But for all the twists and turns, there is an underlying logic to the policy alignments.

Even before the Iraq war, Mr. Rumsfeld opposed sending large numbers of troops to Iraq, arguing that a large and lengthy presence would put the United States in the position of doing things that the Iraqis should be doing for themselves. He outlined his view shortly before the war in a speech in New York called "Beyond Nation Building," and it was reflected in his criticism of Gen. Eric Shinseki, the Army chief of staff at the time, who cautioned that hundreds of thousands of troops would be needed in postwar Iraq.

In offering new options for shrinking the American military footprint in Iraq, Mr. Rumsfeld, in his memo to the White House, was also giving expression to old policy predilections. His option to begin modest troop reductions to put pressure on the Iraqi government is very similar to the amendment sponsored by Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat and incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, though with one notable difference: the secretary has resisted the idea of a firm timeline.

So close is the parallel between some of Mr. Rumsfeld's favored options and the Democratic agenda that Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat and former presidential candidate, has all but claimed credit for them. "Look, everything in the Rumsfeld memo is a summary of things that I and others laid out three years ago," Senator Kerry said Sunday on CNN. "This is rather extraordinary."

As for General Zinni, he forcefully opposed the invasion of Iraq, in part because he thought it would undermine stability in the Middle East and because he was worried that holding a post-Hussein Iraq together would be a monumental enterprise. But now that the United States is in Iraq, he opposes a quick withdrawal for the same reasons.

The barrel-chested officer has a well-earned reputation for blunt talk and a tortured relationship with the Bush administration after a rocky stint in which he served as a special envoy to the Middle East. In his new paper on "The Future for Iraq," he argues that there is no easy fix. "We have missed too many opportunities," he writes, "and have created too much irreparable damage via the mistakes that were made, for that to be possible."

Having acknowledged that, he suggests economic, political, security and administrative steps to try to turn the situation around. His program calls for a new bipartisan steering group to ensure that American policies toward Iraq are efficiently carried out, job-creation programs for Iraqis, integration of Iraq's militias into government-supervised national guard units and encouragement for the Iraqi Army to promote civil affairs.

On American troop levels, General Zinni wrote that the United States has had too few forces to carry out effectively what the administration has called a "clear, hold and build" strategy, which, he explains, "requires holding and staying in an area long enough for the building process to be effective." While the American military is stretched thin, he writes, it could "with difficulty, support a short-term increase in force if the increase would provide the security momentum to jump-start other programs."

As difficult as it is to stabilize Iraq, General Zinni insists that the alternatives are worse.

Swiftly redeploying forces from Baghdad to safer areas in Iraq or Kuwait, for example, would leave the United States unable to influence events in the capital and the volatile heartland, he said.

Extracting American forces altogether, he said, is unrealistic in the short term. Iraq under the sway of extremists, he asserted, could encourage instability in the Persian Gulf. The stakes are so high, he said, that if the fighting in Iraq expands into a major civil war the United States may need to consider intervening to try to quell the fighting instead of leaving.

"We made a mess in the worst possible place we could have made a mess," he said in the interview. "We took an Iran that was contained, and now its influence is stretched through Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and into Palestinian territories.

"You can't be in the region for security reasons and not deal with the biggest security problem that you created in effect. I don't see how you walk away from this one." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

When Iraq Went Wrong (NYT)

By Tim Pritchard

London

OF the many tasks that faced the Iraq Study Group, which is to release its report tomorrow, perhaps the most vexing was pinpointing the exact moment when everything in Iraq started to go wrong. How did scenes of joyful Iraqis pulling down Saddam Hussein's statue so quickly turn into images of car bombings, grieving mothers and burning helicopters?

Some of those who appeared before the panel argued that it had been a mistake to disband the Iraqi Army after the military victory. Others said there had not been enough troops on the ground to secure and stabilize Iraq. The problem with such analyses is their tendency to treat the invasion and the post-invasion period as separate entities.

That is, the invasion is generally portrayed as well planned and executed, while the post-invasion strategy is characterized as poorly thought out and undermanned. The idea is that hidden somewhere in the weeks and months following the arrival of American forces in Baghdad lies a magic moment when Iraq somehow began to descend into chaos.

In fact, the short fight to get to Baghdad and the long one in which coalition forces have been engaged ever since have much in common. All the information about the nature of the trouble to come was apparent from the very first days of the war. If lessons learned then had been incorporated into military and political thinking, it would have injected a much needed dose of realism at an early stage.

Those lessons were best synthesized in a little-known but bloody battle, fought in an obscure part of Iraq on Day 4 of the war. It was a battle that America nearly lost.

It was dawn on March 23, 2003, when marines from Task Force Tarawa approached the town of Nasiriya, in southern Iraq. They had been given a routine task: taking two key bridges to open up a route to Baghdad. Nasiriya was a predominantly Shiite town that had rebelled against Saddam Hussein during the Persian Gulf war. It was assumed that as soon as the Americans rolled into town, the city's defenders would lay down their weapons and, as one Marine commander told me, "put flowers in our gun barrels, hold up their babies for us to kiss and give us the keys to the city."

But when Task Force Tarawa's lead units reached the outskirts they came across the burnt-out remnants of several vehicles of the Army's 507th Maintenance Company. A captain in the 507th told wide-eyed Marine commanders how his convoy had taken a wrong turn at night, driven into Nasiriya and been attacked by Iraqi fighters. Several soldiers were still missing in the city, including a young private, Jessica Lynch.

It was the fate of the missing Jessica Lynch that attracted America's attention in the days following. But it's what happened to the marines of Task Force Tarawa that is most instructive about the true nature of the Iraq war.

As Marine units moved into the city, they were attacked by large numbers of Iraqi fighters. To their surprise, few of the Iraqi combatants seemed to be wearing military uniforms. Many were dressed in the loose-fitting black clothing worn by Shiite Muslims, and much of the gunfire came from dwellings flying black flags denoting them as Shiite homes. And yet the Shiites were supposed to be on the Americans' side.

What's more, as the marines were drawn into a raging battle in the city center, more and more people came out of ordinary homes to take up arms. One group of young American troops, who became separated from the rest of their unit and were forced to commandeer a house in the middle of the city, found themselves under attack for several hours from what appeared to be armed civilians. They had been expecting to fight Iraqi soldiers. Instead they found themselves shooting at old men, women, even children.

Of course, there were fanatical Sunni Saddam Fedayeen troops, as well as some desperate foreign jihadis, who fought that day. But untold hundreds of those who picked up weapons were simply civilians intent on defending homes against foreign invaders. The potent and complex mix of insurgency — Sunni and Shiite militants, foreign fighters and civilians — that causes such chaos in Iraq today was already apparent during the battle of Nasiriya.

Intelligence about the terrain was also sorely lacking. Marine tanks spearheading the maneuver took a route that led to a marsh where they sank, mired uselessly in thick mud, while the battle raged. It's more than just a metaphor for coalition forces getting bogged down, post-invasion, in towns like Falluja and Samarra. It was the product of a rush to arms without adequate intelligence or planning.

At one stage, in a "friendly fire" incident, Air Force planes fired at marines on the ground, killing up to 10. Radio communications repeatedly failed. Units lost contact with each other. Faced with an increasingly determined enemy, Marine commanders thought they might just lose the battle. This showed another truth, obscured during the march to Baghdad, but that has become strikingly apparent since: there is a limit to what armor and technology can do against a people with faith and who fight because they feel their country has been violated.

There were other incidents in Nasiriya, minor at the time, that foreshadowed events that would become an international embarrassment. At one point, a Marine commander came across a gruesome scene: young marines, standing over a pile of Iraqi corpses, taking photos of each other, thumbs up and grinning inanely to camera. It took only a year for the first photos of American soldiers grinning over the bodies of abused Iraqi prisoners to appear.

BUT what was most striking at Nasiriya in those very early days of the war was the refusal of freedom-deprived Iraqis to come forward and support coalition forces. At best, the civilians stood by and watched the American war machine thunder into town. At worst, they ran to arms stashes, grabbed AK-47s and took to the streets. Four days into the invasion, and already, instead of coming together, Iraqis were falling back into their faiths and tribes and killing coalition forces and each other.

Eighteen marines died in Nasiriya that March day, in what turned out to be the bloodiest phase of the invasion. Four days later the city was finally declared secure. Two weeks after that, American forces triumphantly entered Baghdad and helped topple Saddam Hussein's statue. Everyone lauded the speed and efficiency with which United States forces had fought their way to Baghdad. The trauma of Nasiriya was forgotten.

And that was a shame. If the details of what happened at Nasiriya had been gathered, recognized and analyzed more soberly early on, instead of trampled on in a rush of triumphalism, coalition forces might have learned useful lessons for the reconstruction of Iraq: the limits of military power, the importance of a proper understanding of the complexity of a place and its people, the perils of underestimating an enemy. Instead, of course, President Bush stood on the deck of the aircraft carrier Abraham Lincoln and made his hubristic speech announcing the end of combat operations under a banner announcing "Mission Accomplished."

The battle of Nasiriya taught that there was, contrary to first appearances, no simple route to Baghdad. It should also serve to remind those in Washington that there will be no simple route out of it. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Warner Wants Dems In War Debate (CLE)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

The Columbus Ledger-Enquirer, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - A leading Senate Republican on defense issues, Sen. John Warner, will call on President Bush to solicit privately the opinions of Democrats before forging a new strategy on Iraq.

Warner in an opening statement Tuesday to Robert Gates' confirmation hearing as defense secretary will say there is a "moral obligation" for the president to seek out the views of Democrats.

A copy of the Virginia senators prepared remarks were obtained late Monday by The Associated Press.

Gates is being considered to take over the Pentagon as Bush is rethinking his policy in Iraq and awaits the recommendations of an independent bipartisan panel. Bush also launched an internal assessment of U.S. options and says he will consider both studies before making any decisions.

"After the President has had the opportunity to review these important reports, I respectfully recommend that he privately consult with the bipartisan leadership of the new Congress before making his final decisions," Warner said.

Warner later adds: "To me, this fulfills the moral obligation that our government has to the brave men and women of the armed forces and their families, who have sacrificed so very, very much in this fight for freedom," Warner said.

While several Republicans, including Warner, have urged a bipartisan approach in crafting a new Iraq policy, Warner's statement is the strongest indication yet that he and perhaps other key Republicans will challenge Bush when it comes to the war.

Warner is stepping down as chairman of the Armed Services Committee when Democrats take charge next year but is expected to remain a key player on the Iraq debate.

Warner and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will take over the panel next year, vowed to generate a bipartisan resolution or legislation that would address the situation in Iraq.

On Oct. 5, Warner returned from a trip to Iraq to declare the war was "drifting sideways." If the situation did not improve within the next three months, the U.S. must reconsider its options, he said.

"Regrettably, the levels of violence have continued to escalate, and the ability of Prime Minister (Nouri al-Maliki) and his government to exercise fully the reins of sovereignty remains an enormous challenge," Warner said in the prepared statement.

Rumsfeld Memo Developed Over Weeks (AP)

By Robert Burns

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's secret memo to President Bush offering new approaches in Iraq was developed over a period of weeks, according to a newly declassified cover letter.

The letter, obtained by The Associated Press on Monday, also said that Rumsfeld had instructed Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander for U.S. forces in the Middle East, to assemble his own group "some time ago" to consider new approaches in Iraq — "since war plans of this type" are the responsibility of Abizaid's command.

There has been no public disclosure of recommendations from the Abizaid group.

The letter, addressed to Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser, was transmitted with the memo and dated Nov. 6, two days before Rumsfeld resigned.

The cover letter was declassified Monday by Rumsfeld.

The options paper remains classified secret, although its contents were published in full by the New York Times on Sunday and authenticated by Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff.

Some in Congress have questioned the timing of Rumsfeld's memo outlining "illustrative new course of action" in Iraq, suggesting that it came to light as a way of defending Rumsfeld's reputation as he was about to leave office.

The Rumsfeld cover letter makes clear that he had been working on the options paper for some weeks.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said Monday she viewed the memo as inconsistent with Rumsfeld's recent congressional testimony, and she said he should have shared these suggestions with Congress many months ago.

"The memo by Secretary Rumsfeld and the leaking of it very much reminded me of a strategy of trying to leave office saying that you actually had a lot of good plans that were different than your public utterances," Collins said.

In the options paper, Rumsfeld declared, "In my view it is time for a major adjustment" in Iraq. He had previously stated publicly the current policy is not working well enough or fast enough, but he had not called for major change.

Rumsfeld did not recommend any particular new course of action but enumerated about 20 possible alternative courses, including to begin modest withdrawals of U.S. forces "so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Other options included an accelerated drawdown of U.S. military bases in Iraq; having U.S. forces provide security only for those provinces or cities that openly request U.S. help; and positioning substantially more U.S. troops near the Iranian and Syrian borders to reduce infiltration of foreign fighters.

In the cover letter accompanying the secret memo, Rumsfeld wrote that he and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had mentioned to Bush "a number of weeks ago" that they were considering alternative approaches for Iraq.

"It is clear that the current path in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough. Change is needed," Rumsfeld wrote.

The defense secretary said he had given his options paper to Pace to use as a "discussion piece" with the chiefs of the military services. He said Pace and the chiefs have been discussing various options on their own.

U.S. Military Shifts Troops In Iraq Into Advisory Roles (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Edward Wong

BAGHDAD, Dec. 2 — American commanders in Iraq are already shifting thousands of combat troops into advisory positions with Iraqi Army and police units, especially in the capital, in their latest attempt to bring sectarian violence under control.

Changes in troop assignments over just the past three weeks included moving about 1,000 American soldiers in Baghdad from traditional combat roles to serve as trainers and advisers to Iraqi units, senior American officers said in interviews here. Commanders say they believe that a major influx of American advisers can add spine and muscle to Iraqi units that will help them to move into the lead in improving security.

The troops have been reassigned by commanders, who have not sought additional combat troops to replace them. While the troops have not been through the special program for trainers set up by the military, they are working in their areas of expertise, commanders said.

American generals in Iraq have made the reassignments in recent weeks even though President Bush and his senior national security advisers have not yet made a formal decision about whether to expand the American contingent sent to Iraq specifically to serve on military training teams.

Before the transfers began, between 4,000 and 5,000 troops had been assigned to about 400 training teams.

Increasing the number of American trainers for the Iraqi military and the police is among the recommendations expected on Wednesday from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which Mr. Bush has said he wishes to review before announcing a future course in Iraq.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, told Congress last month that he envisioned doubling the number of American trainers, but senior military officers now say they are drawing up plans that would at least triple the number of troops assigned to training.

Maj. Gen. Joseph F. Fil Jr., the commander of the First Cavalry Division, which assumed control of Baghdad in the middle of November, pulled troops from his own force for those assignments without requesting replacements to make up for those joining Iraqi units, officers here said.

Similarly, Maj. Gen. Benjamin R. Mixon, commander of the 25th Infantry Division, based in Tikrit in north-central Iraq, said he was planning to add 2,000 trainers to Iraqi units in his area by transferring troops from his combat ranks. General Mixon, who discussed his plan on Friday during a visit by General Abizaid to Tikrit, said he, too, believed he could increase the number of American trainers without asking for more American troops.

Before any expansions, the average number of troops serving on one of the teams was 11 members at the battalion level, 11 at the brigade level and 15 at the division level, said Brig. Gen. Dana J. H. Pittard, who oversees the Americans training the Iraqi Army, elite police units and border guards.

"We're going to double, triple, quadruple the size of the transition teams," General Pittard said on a recent visit to the main training base for the Iraqi Army, in a windswept area called Kirkush near the Iranian border.

At the training base, a 15-member team working with the top commanders of the Fifth Iraqi Army Division recently bolstered their numbers with a platoon from a combat unit of the 82nd Airborne Division. If security improves, American commanders might transfer more people from combat units to the training mission, said Col. David Puster, the leader of the division-level team. "They'll have to come from resources in the country," the colonel said. "As you stand up the teams, you stand down the combat units."

The goal is to create platoon-size teams of 20 to 30 advisers for each Iraqi battalion. The larger teams would also have communications specialists capable of such tasks as calling in airstrikes and medical evacuations, Pentagon officials say. American officers in Iraq say expanding the teams could also allow trainers to work more intimately with Iraqi soldiers, down to the company level.

The teams would also be able to watch more closely for sectarian biases and human rights abuses.

At the same time, though, commanders acknowledge that the plan of moving American forces from direct combat roles to training and advising carries risks, especially as some Bush administration officials and military officers say the Baghdad security operation already is short by four Iraqi brigades, or approximately 5,000 Iraqi troops.

"Our plan is shaping up over the next three or four months where we will reposition troops within Iraq, perhaps to increase the numbers in Baghdad as needed," said one senior military officer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was discussing future planning.

Asked whether stabilizing Baghdad would require pulling American forces from other contested areas to fill the deficit in forces — in particular whether American troops could be spared from the Sunni base of Anbar Province — the senior officer said only, "We will try and keep our head above water in Anbar."

But General Abizaid said that any current shortage in combat troop numbers for the Baghdad security mission should be filled by Iraqi forces.

"The Baghdad security situation requires more Iraqi troops," General Abizaid said in an interview. "And that's the direction we are heading right now."

DOJ_NMG_0102155

Senior officers here said that the Iraqi Army, however imperfect, was better suited for quelling sectarian violence than Iraq's national and local police, and that it was more respected by the Iraqi populace.

"The Iraqi Army has the opportunity to be the single institution that can elevate the narrative beyond regional, local, religious interests," said Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, the senior commander of the training program. "And in most cases they are succeeding in doing so, in other words becoming that institution of national unity."

Commanders say that national police units — which have been infiltrated by sectarian militias — are being pulled out of the fight unit by unit for retraining and, in some cases, the assignment of new commanders, with Iraqi Army units taking over their duties in the interim.

The risks to American troops of working as trainers away from the security of larger American units were underscored early last month, when a staff sergeant and two team leaders — a lieutenant colonel and his replacement — were killed in a single attack in Baghdad.

Another risk is that operations carried out with Iraqi security forces in the lead may be less effective and result in more casualties among Iraqi security forces and civilians than with the better-trained American troops. Thus, American units will step back from the frontlines, but would remain on standby to respond should Iraqi units get in trouble.

There is also some concern that pushing Iraqi units to the front may result in atrocities by corrupt or sectarian Iraqi units.

Commanders said they were drawing up a set of "red lines" that, if crossed by Iraqi forces, would require American troops to return to the fight in those areas. Officers declined to provide many details, but said that, for example, kidnappings or killings by units in Iraqi security uniforms would be countered by immediate American action.

4 U.S. Troops Killed In Helicopter Crash (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

BAGHDAD, Dec. 4 — Four American troops were killed when a military helicopter broke down while flying over a lake in Anbar Province in western Iraq and made an emergency landing on the shore, American military officials said Monday.

The military said the craft, Marine Corps CH-46 Sea Knight troop transport helicopter with 16 people and equipment on board, was flying over Lake Qadisiya, near Haditha, on Sunday when it began to experience mechanical difficulties. The pilots brought the twin-rotor helicopter down in a controlled maneuver and guided it to the water's edge, according to Lt. Col. Josslyn L. Aberle, a military spokeswoman in Baghdad.

The mechanical failures were not caused by an enemy attack, officials said; they did not give further details.

In the minutes after the accident, 13 of the people on board were accounted for, including one marine whose body was recovered from the water. The bodies of the three other victims were recovered in the lake on Monday during an intensive search that included air, amphibious and diving teams, officials said.

Noting that the investigation was continuing, military officials declined to explain how the victims ended up in the water.

A number of military helicopters have crashed in Iraq, usually because of mechanical failure or enemy attack. One of the most deadly incidents for American troops since the invasion was the crash of a Marine helicopter near the Jordanian border in Anbar Province in January 2005, which killed 31.

Last week, an American F-16 jet on a combat mission crashed west of Baghdad. Though the pilot's body has not been recovered, the military has listed him as dead.

Elsewhere, Shiite gunmen planted explosives in a Sunni Arab mosque in the northern Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriya on Sunday afternoon and shattered its blue dome, Sunni officials said on Monday. The building, called the Nidaa Allah Mosque, was empty during the attack, and the explosion caused no casualties, according to a local cleric, Said Ahmed Mohammad.

For several months, Shiite death squads have been waging a bloody campaign of violence and intimidation in Hurriya to drive Sunni Arabs from the neighborhood, Sunni officials say. The Nidaa Allah Mosque was one of four Sunni mosques in Hurriya that came under assault during a wave of reprisal attacks by Shiite gunmen following a series of car bombings on Nov. 23 that killed more than 200 people in Sadr City.

According to Mr. Mohammad, the mosque's imam and his family abandoned the mosque on Nov. 25 and it has sat empty since then. In a photograph of the sandstone-colored mosque taken on Sunday and distributed by the American military, the dome was broken like an egg shell and pocked with holes from the bullets of automatic gunfire.

In Falluja, two civilians were killed and two wounded when a gun battle erupted on Monday between Sunni Arab insurgents and an American military patrol in the Nazal district of the city, a local police official said.

A bomb exploded in the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora on Monday, killing a child and wounding two civilians, an Interior Ministry official said, and at least 52 dumped bodies were found around the capital. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Emergency Helicopter Landing Kills 4 U.S. Troops (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 4 -- Four American troops were killed over the weekend when their helicopter made an emergency landing in a lake in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said on Monday.

Their deaths bring to 14 the number of U.S. troops killed across Iraq so far this month. Over the weekend, eight of those deaths occurred in western Iraq's Anbar province, a base for Sunni Arab insurgent groups and the deadliest area of the country for U.S. troops.

"There's always been a tough fight going on in Anbar province, and it continues to be so," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman.

In recent months, U.S. troops have stepped up efforts to quell reprisal killings between Sunnis and Shiites and tamp down insurgent activity. On Monday morning, they killed two suspected insurgents and captured six in a raid in northern Baghdad, according to a military statement. They also destroyed a vehicle packed with explosives in that operation.

The CH-46 helicopter that went down in Lake Qadisiyah on Sunday had 16 troops on board. One Marine was recovered from the water but could not be resuscitated. The bodies of three service members -- one each from the Marines, the Army and the Air Force -- were found in a subsequent search, the military said.

"We have recovered all of our comrades," Marine Lt. Col. Bryan Salas said in an e-mailed statement. "Our thoughts and prayers are with the families of the deceased."

The mayor of Haditha, Ibraheem al-Bayati, and Iraqi army Lt. Hussein Muslih said the helicopter had been shot down by insurgents with machine guns as it was taking off from the town, located near the Euphrates River.

A group that calls itself the Islamic State of Iraq posted a sign on a nearby mosque in Haditha announcing that the helicopter had 30 passengers on board and had been downed, according to a resident who read the sign.

The U.S. military strongly denied that machine-gun fire brought down the helicopter, saying that the aircraft experienced mechanical difficulties.

"The guys who own the helicopter say it is under investigation and that there is no evidence that it is the result of enemy action," Garver said.

The military is still investigating the crash in Anbar last week of an F-16 fighter jet that killed a U.S. Air Force major. Enemy fire was not suspected.

The first days of December have also been deadly for Iraqi civilians.

On Sunday, a 5-year-old girl was shot during an attack on coalition forces and Iraqi national police in the al-Doura district of Baghdad, according to the U.S. military. The girl was taken to a military hospital in the Green Zone, which houses the Iraqi government and U.S. and British embassies. She later died from her injuries, the military said.

In Baqubah, a group of men opened fire on four employees of Diyala province's agricultural office as they drove to work Monday morning. The driver and three of the employees died, police said. Gunmen also shot and killed a taxi driver in central Baqubah, police said.

In Baghdad, a news editor at an Iraqi radio station was shot and killed on his way to work, the Associated Press reported. Nabil Ibrahim al-Dulaim, a Sunni, was married with two young daughters, the news agency said. His death brings to 93 the number of journalists killed in Iraq since the war began, according to the Paris-based group Reporters Without Borders.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. on Monday condemned the recent car bombings and sectarian killings. Their statement was partially a response to a triple car bombing that struck a food market in the majority Shiite neighborhood of Sadriyah on Saturday, killing more than 60 people.

"The true enemies of all Iraqis are the murderers who carry out these senseless and cowardly attacks, regardless of sect, tribe or ethnicity," they said. "They are terrified of progress in this country and are determined to sow sectarian discord for their own selfish agenda."

Census Counts 100,000 Contractors In Iraq (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

There are about 100,000 government contractors operating in Iraq, not counting subcontractors, a total that is approaching the size of the U.S. military force there, according to the military's first census of the growing population of civilians operating in the battlefield.

The survey finding, which includes Americans, Iraqis and third-party nationals hired by companies operating under U.S. government contracts, is significantly higher and wider in scope than the Pentagon's only previous estimate, which said there were 25,000 security contractors in the country.

It is also 10 times the estimated number of contractors that deployed during the Persian Gulf War in 1991, reflecting the Pentagon's growing post-Cold War reliance on contractors for such jobs as providing security, interrogating prisoners, cooking meals, fixing equipment and constructing bases that were once reserved for soldiers.

Official numbers are difficult to find, said Deborah D. Avant, author of the 2005 book "The Market for Force: The Consequences of Privatizing Security," but an estimated 9,200 contractors deployed during the Gulf War, a far shorter conflict without reconstruction projects. "This is the largest deployment of U.S. contractors in a military operation," said Avant, an associate professor at George Washington University.

In addition to about 140,000 U.S. troops, Iraq is now filled with a hodgepodge of contractors. DynCorp International has about 1,500 employees in Iraq, including about 700 helping train the police force. Blackwater USA has more than 1,000 employees in the country, most of them providing private security. Kellogg, Brown and Root, one of the largest contractors in Iraq, said it does not delineate its workforce by country but that it has more than 50,000 employees and subcontractors working in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait. MPRI, a unit of L-3 Communications, has about 500 employees working on 12 contracts, including providing mentors to the Iraqi Defense Ministry for strategic planning, budgeting and establishing its public affairs office. Titan, another L-3 division, has 6,500 linguists in the country.

The Pentagon's latest estimate "further demonstrates the need for Congress to finally engage in responsible, serious and aggressive oversight over the questionable and growing U.S. practice of private military contracting," said Rep. Janice D. Schakowsky (D-Ill.), who has been critical of the military's reliance on contractors.

About 650 contractors have died in Iraq since 2003, according to Labor Department statistics.

Central Command, which conducted the census, said a breakdown by nationality or job description was not immediately available because the project is still in its early stages. "This is the first time we have initiated a census of this robustness," Lt. Col. Julie Wittkoff, chief of the contracting branch at Central Command, said in an interview. Those figures do not include subcontractors, which could substantially grow the figure.

In June, government agencies were asked to provide data about contractors working for them in Iraq, including their nationality, a description of their work and locations where they were working. The information was provided by more than a dozen entities within the Pentagon and a dozen outside agencies, including the departments of State and Interior, Wittkoff said. The count increased about 15 percent from about 87,000 since Central Command began keeping a tally this summer, she said, though the increase may reflect ongoing data collection efforts. The census will be updated quarterly, Wittkoff said.

Three years into the war, the headcount represents one of the Pentagon's most concrete efforts so far toward addressing the complexities and questions raised by the large numbers of civilians who have flooded into Iraq to work. With few industry standards, the military and contractors have sometimes lacked coordination, resulting in friendly fire incidents, according to a Government Accountability Office report last year.

"It takes a great deal of vigilance on the part of the military commander to ensure contractor compliance," said William L. Nash, a retired Army general and a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. "If you're trying to win hearts and minds and the contractor is driving 90 miles per hour through the streets and running over kids, that's not helping the image of the American army. The Iraqis aren't going to distinguish between a contractor and a soldier."

The census gives military commanders insight into the contractors operating in their region and the type of work they are doing, Wittkoff said. "It helps the combatant commanders have a better idea of . . . food and medical requirements they may need to provide to support the contractors," she said.

Journalists Acquitted In Iraq WMD Case (AP)

By Jan M. Olsen

AP, December 5, 2006

Three Danish journalists who published classified intelligence reports on Iraq's former weapons program were acquitted Monday on charges of endangering national security.

The Copenhagen City Court ruled that Niels Lunde, chief editor of the Berlingske Tidende newspaper, and reporters Michael Bjerre and Jesper Larsen acted in the public interest when they published a series of articles in 2004 citing leaked Danish intelligence reports.

The articles said there was no evidence Iraq had weapons of mass destruction at the time of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, one of the key reasons cited by the U.S. and Britain for going to war.

A former intelligence officer previously has been sentenced to four months in prison for leaking the documents in the case, which was viewed in Denmark as a landmark test of media freedom.

Lunde called the verdict "a great victory for the open society." Prosecutor Michael Joergensen said he had not yet decided whether to appeal.

Joergensen had recommended that each of the defendants be given a four-month prison term — the same sentence that former intelligence officer Frank Grevil received after he was convicted last year of leaking the documents to the reporters.

Judge Peter Lind Larsen said the "considerable public interest" in the information outweighed the government's concerns that its intelligence-gathering operations were jeopardized.

Press freedom advocates welcomed the decision, which was met with applause in the packed court room.

"In Denmark, we have today thoroughly underlined that journalists, media have an extensive freedom of expression," said Mogens Blicher Bjerregaard, head of the Danish Union of Journalists.

Troops Needed To Fight Taliban (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, December 5, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — The outgoing U.S. commander in Afghanistan warned that the fight against the Taliban is in danger of being undermined by a shortage of NATO troops and by restrictions that keep some alliance forces out of combat.

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry said in an interview that NATO countries need to contribute more troops and that some of them must drop “caveats” that prevent their forces from fighting freely.

The restrictions risk driving a wedge in the NATO alliance between forces that fight and those that don't, Eikenberry said.

“Could you have an alliance in which you have one group that is always going into the toughest places and fighting and taking casualties, and you have a second group that is in a different category?” Eikenberry said over the weekend. “Over the next several years, that is something that could be a challenge if it is not addressed.”

The United States and other countries have been pushing for the removal of caveats as they try to send troops to fight the raging insurgency in southern and eastern Afghanistan. At a summit last week in the Latvian capital, Riga, the NATO countries operating in Afghanistan agreed to come to each other's aid in an emergency, ignoring any caveats. The NATO commander in Afghanistan defines what constitutes an emergency.

Eikenberry's comments indicate caveats remain a worry as NATO has assumed a larger role in Afghanistan. The United States this year handed over military responsibility for all of Afghanistan to a 32,000-strong NATO force, which previously had operated in the country's relatively secure north and western regions. Eikenberry said the transition to NATO command had gone smoothly. Afghanistan is the alliance's first deployment outside Europe.

Eikenberry is worried about the caveats and about NATO's troop strength, which is at 90% of the level NATO says is required. “The objective has got to be to get to the 100% level,” he said.

The caveats require NATO to put more troops in the field to compensate for the countries that are prevented by their governments from joining in combat.

The full list of caveats is secret to prevent Taliban militants from exploiting NATO weaknesses.

Restrictions are sometimes imposed by governments wary about casualties. German forces in Afghanistan, for instance, have been ordered to avoid combat and rarely venture outside their outposts for long patrols, according to an August report by the Congressional Research Service. Other limitations result from lack of equipment or training.

Romanian forces that share a base with U.S. troops in Qalat, the capital of southern Afghanistan's restive Zabul province, don't have vehicles that can handle the region's rugged terrain. Lengthier patrols are carried out by U.S. troops in Humvees.

“Commanders on the ground are best served if all their forces do not have caveats that place operational constraints on them,” Eikenberry said. “Any caveats that would restrict combat forces from being able to maneuver or to be deployed anywhere within Afghanistan for any kind of combat operation … are the ones of greatest concern.”

Close to wrapping up an 18-month tour as U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Eikenberry also said Afghanistan's broken-down infrastructure — particularly its roads — needed more repair than the United States and its allies realized after ousting the Taliban regime in late 2001.

Pentagon Resists Pleas For Help In Afghan Opium Fight (LAT)

By Josh Meyer,

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

The DEA wants the military to take a larger role in stopping the drug trade, which experts say finances the insurgency.

— The Pentagon, engaged in a difficult fight to defeat a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, has resisted entreaties from U.S. anti-narcotics officials to play an aggressive role in the faltering campaign to curb the country's opium trade.

Military units in Afghanistan largely overlook drug bazaars, rebuff some requests to take U.S. drug agents on raids and do little to counter the organized crime syndicates shipping the drug to Europe, Asia and, increasingly, the United States, according to officials and documents.

While the Pentagon and the Drug Enforcement Administration, or the DEA, have been at odds, poppy cultivation has exploded, increasing by more than half this year. Afghanistan supplies about 92% of the world's opium, and traffickers reap an estimated $2.3 billion in annual profits.

"It is surprising to me that we have allowed things to get to the point that they have," said Robert B. Charles, a former top State Department counter-narcotics official. "It we do not act aggressively against the narcotics threat now, all gains made to date will be washed out to sea."

The bumper crop of opium poppies, much of it from Taliban strongholds in southern Afghanistan, finances the insurgency the U.S. is trying to dismantle.

The DEA's advocates in Congress argue that the Pentagon could undermine the insurgency by combating the drugs that help finance it. Military officials say they can spare no resources from the task of fighting the Taliban and its allies.

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has said that Afghanistan's flourishing opium trade is a law enforcement problem, not a military one. It would be "mission creep" if the 21,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan were to turn their attention to opium, and it would also set a precedent for future combat operations, military officials say.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Afghanistan's police forces and British troops in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization peacekeeping operation have the primary responsibility for fighting the Afghan drug problem.

Military officials also fear that cracking down on opium traffickers could alienate the Afghan people and warlords who profit from the trade. An estimated one-eighth of the population is involved in poppy cultivation, and the opium trade is one-third of the country's economy.

The Pentagon has cooperated some with the DEA, but its resistance to doing more has drawn criticism from prominent congressmen, including Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the International Relations Committee.

Hyde and other lawmakers say the Bush administration is making a crucial mistake in not directing U.S. forces to collaborate with the DEA to take down those supplying the Taliban with cash, high-tech weapons and trucks.

"If we don't change the policy soon, and fight both drugs and terrorism simultaneously, Afghanistan may well fall into a failed narcotics state status," Hyde said in a statement.

Hyde has urged the White House and the Pentagon to look to Colombia as a model. Anti-narcotics agents there work closely with the military to target terrorism and drug trafficking.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai and other officials have asked for more help from the Pentagon, especially stronger support for the DEA.

"We are disappointed that there isn't more and closer cooperation between these two," said M. Ashraf Haidari, Afghanistan's Washington liaison to U.S. military and law enforcement agencies. "We have been saying this since 2003."

Haidari said the DEA and Afghan authorities needed "maximum military support both from ground and air." He complained that there was little coordination between the U.S. and international anti-drug efforts in Afghanistan.

The DEA has about 10 agents in Kabul, the Afghan capital, and rotates small teams of agents and intelligence analysts into the country, two at a time. The teams train and work with Afghan narcotics police, but also do their own investigations.

But DEA agents can't move about the mountainous terrain without helicopters and, in many cases, can't penetrate well-protected drug operations without backup from troops.

Several dozen kingpins have emerged in the Afghan drug trade who are allied with the Taliban and Al Qaeda, current and former U.S. and Afghan officials said. In the last year, the drug bosses have become more brazen, richer and powerful.

U.S. and Afghan officials say the major traffickers and their hundreds of criminal associates prey on poor Afghan poppy farmers, openly run huge opium bazaars and labs that turn opium into heroin, and truck vast quantities of drugs into neighboring countries. They often return with night-vision goggles, land mines, sniper rifles and other high-tech weapons to use against U.S. and NATO forces.

Antonio Maria Costa, head of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, said in a recent interview that the location of major drug operations were "well-known to us and to the authorities." He said he recently watched a video of a heavily armed drug convoy of about 20 vehicles crossing into Iran.

"When you see narcotics trafficking that has the connotation of military operations, I am afraid we can only cope with them with military muscle," he said.

U.S. efforts have largely focused on small drug arrests and the State Department's program to eradicate poppy fields.

Publicly, DEA officials praise the Pentagon for its help and say coordination has improved. But two senior congressional aides said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy had been quietly campaigning for more Pentagon assistance.

"Behind closed doors she has been very adamant about how we need this stuff over there," a DEA official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Without the helicopters, we can't move. We're sure not going to go out in caravans with a couple of pistols."

Tandy testified in June that although DEA agents had developed leads in Afghanistan, the agency had "no operational infrastructure, assets or support to conduct operations" in Helmand province, where as much as half of Afghan heroin is grown and processed.

The Pentagon has promised as many as eight MI-17 helicopters for Afghan authorities to use in collaboration with U.S. military and law enforcement officials. But only two have arrived and are being used solely for training, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said. DEA officials cannot say when helicopters will be available for drug operations, he said.

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Todd Vician said that in the last two years U.S. troops had worked to support DEA efforts to combat the drug trade in Afghanistan "in the form of intelligence, planning, transportation of interdiction forces, medical evacuation and close air support if needed."

He also said Rumsfeld had authorized federal authorities, including DEA agents, to go on military operations in areas of known or suspected drug activity.

But in many cases the Pentagon has balked at drug interdiction efforts even when it had the resources, said a former senior U.S. anti-drug official, who declined to give details of what he said were classified operations.

"There were [drug] convoys where military people looked the other way, and situations where DEA sought [Pentagon] intelligence and it wasn't given to them," the former official said.

"DEA would identify a lab to go hit or a storage facility and [the Pentagon] would find a reason to ground the helicopters," the former official added. "They would say we don't want you to create a disturbance in an area where we're trying to chase down terrorists and the Taliban."

A recent congressional report said the DEA asked the Pentagon for airlifts on 26 occasions in 2005, and was denied in all but three cases. The Pentagon said it had done better in 2006, supporting 12 of 14 DEA requests for air support.

Several current and former DEA officials said the Pentagon efforts were mostly administrative and not related to raids and other enforcement efforts.

Hyde and Rep. Mark Steven Kirk (R-Ill.), a former naval intelligence officer, told Rumsfeld in an Oct. 12 letter that they wanted the Pentagon to allow DEA agents to ride along on more military missions in Afghanistan and to call them in when soldiers found a large drug stash or operation.

Eight days later, Rumsfeld wrote that he had asked one of his undersecretaries, Eric S. Edelman, "to look into this matter."

"We will get back to you as soon as possible," Rumsfeld wrote.

Hyde's aides say the congressman hasn't heard back.

NTSB Faults Pentagon In '04 Afghan Crash (USAT)

By Alan Levin And Matt Kelley,

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Poor Defense Department oversight of private companies that fly military missions in war zones was partially responsible for a 2004 crash that killed six people in Afghanistan, federal accident investigators said Monday.

The National Transportation Safety Board recommended that the Defense Department coordinate with the Federal Aviation Administration to better monitor the charter flights increasingly being used to carry small numbers of troops and cargo in Iraq and Afghanistan.

An NTSB statement said the agency is “concerned that the unique risks presented by operations in remote overseas locations have not been adequately addressed for civilian contractors that provide air transportation services to the U.S. military.”

The flight was operated by Presidential Airways of Melbourne, Fla., a part of the same company as Blackwater USA, a private security firm assisting private companies and the military in war zones.

Pilots on the CASA 212 twin-turboprop were flying over a remote mountainous region of Afghanistan on Nov. 27, 2004, when they entered a tight canyon ringed by peaks as high as 16,580 feet. They tried to climb over the mountains, but crashed at 14,650 feet, the NTSB said.

The pilots had not used oxygen, as is required when flying over 10,000 feet for prolonged periods, the NTSB said. Lack of oxygen at high altitudes can interfere with pilots' mental skills. The NTSB also noted the company's failure to require crews to fly specific routes and follow safety regulations.

For example, the military requires planes it charters to be equipped with a device that allows people on the ground to follow the flight's route. But the NTSB said it found no evidence that the military had tried to enforce the rule.

Without the device, searchers had difficulty locating the wreckage. Searchers did not find it for nearly 24 hours. The search was also slowed because the company did not discover that the plane was missing until nearly six hours after the crash.

Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman, said the Pentagon will review the recommendations.

Mark Corallo, a spokesman for Blackwater, said that the NTSB report "fails to understand the realities of operations in a war zone."

The crash killed Lt. Col. Michael McMahon, 41; Chief Warrant Officer Travis W. Grogan, 31; Spc. Harley D. Miller, 21; pilot Noel English, 37; co-pilot Loren Hammer, 35; and mechanic Melvin Rowe, 43.

A Precarious Shelter In Afghanistan (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

KABUL -- The room was carpeted and cozy, warm from the wood stove and filled with the chatter of children. But the tales their mothers and older sisters told recently, speaking hesitantly even in the safety of a guarded private shelter, were bone-chilling.

Sahara, an angelic-looking young woman, said she was forcibly married at 11, widowed at 12 and kept as a virtual slave by her in-laws for the next eight years. Unable to endure more beatings, she slipped away early one morning, walked for two days and nights and finally ventured into a police station to ask for help.

Gulshan, a mother of three with a permanently worried look, said she was falsely accused of murdering her husband after he had an affair with her sister. She was sentenced to five years in jail, and her husband's brothers vowed to kill her upon her release. Under the law, they may also take custody of her small children, who are hidden with her at the shelter.

"They said I killed my husband, but I am very sad he died, even though he had a bad friendship with my sister," Gulshan said. "I need him, because of the children. Now I am alone in life, and in this society a woman alone is less than nothing."

Until recently, most of the 20 women at the shelter would probably have been either dead or in prison, hunted down by male relatives seeking revenge or hit with criminal charges for actions that would not be illegal in the West, such as eloping with a boyfriend or fleeing an abusive husband. Some might have committed suicide by burning themselves, as hundreds of desperate Afghan girls and women have done in the past several years.

Afghan society still considers such women "bad" and deserving of punishment. According to the country's conservative Muslim and tribal traditions, arranged marriages are both a cultural cornerstone and a business contract, sometimes with two sisters marrying two brothers. Wives are expected to endure beatings, unfaithfulness or years of separation in obedient silence.

But Afghanistan is also officially a democracy now, with a ministry of women's affairs, human rights organizations and constitutional protections against abuse. In the years since the overthrow of the Taliban in 2001, a network of civic groups has begun promoting women's legal rights and opening shelters.

Still, despite increasing cooperation from police and referrals from the women's ministry, the shelters remain controversial and in permanent danger of attack by angry husbands and fathers. Some Afghans view groups that advocate women's emancipation as the real danger to society and blame foreign influence for provoking the widely reported phenomenon of self-immolation by unhappy brides or daughters-in-law.

"In our society, it is still unacceptable for a woman to leave home or go to court to solve her problems," said Mari Akrami, who directs the Afghan Women's Skills Development Center. She recently made a documentary film about a girl named Mujahida, who was betrothed to a man at age 4 and later murdered by her family for running away from him.

"Now some people call me a bad woman, too," Akrami said with a rueful laugh.

Women's activists said Afghan courts still tend to side with men in cases of domestic abuse or marital conflict and are often swayed by influential families rather than the law. Two years ago, Akrami's group was given custody of a 10-year-old girl whose family had been arrested for selling her as a bride four years earlier.

"In court she told how she had been made to wear a white dress and a lot of people were invited to a feast. She had no idea it was her wedding," Akrami said. A senior justice official, under heavy pressure from the girl's family, wrote Akrami a letter asking that the girl be sent back to her husband. "He said I must respect Afghan culture and customs," she said.

Today, that official is no longer in his post, and the government of President Hamid Karzai has made several changes in the justice system. Last summer, Karzai appointed an Afghan American to head the Supreme Court, a former university teacher who is widely viewed as a modern thinker, sympathetic to women's rights.

In a recent interview, the new chief justice, Abdul Salam Azimi, said Afghan civil laws and Islamic principles both provide ample protection for women, including the right to divorce for a variety of reasons. But he acknowledged that conservative culture is often more powerful, especially in rural areas, and that there are heavy social and psychological barriers to women seeking legal help.

"If a woman comes to court, we will protect her under the law," said Azimi, 70, who dresses in tailored business suits. "The problem is that many cases never reach us at all. A lady in a house may be suffering a lot, but she is too ashamed to go and complain. There is strong pressure from families, and often there is pressure from the women themselves."

Advocacy groups have tried to educate the public about women's rights, with limited success. In the town of Charikar, 30 miles north of Kabul, a community meeting was held recently to discuss the problem of domestic violence. The women in the audience were eager and attentive, but the male officials on the panel seemed impatient and uncomfortable.

One official gave a long, rambling speech in which he said it was important to protect women but then criticized Western countries as immoral and defended Afghan culture as "the least violent toward women in the world."

In a small room nearby, a free knitting and literacy class for women was underway. None of the participants had ever been to school or learned a skill, and several said it had been difficult to get permission to attend from male family members.

"Some women are stopped by their brothers, their fathers, even their uncles," said Rahima, 35, a mother of six. "I visit those families, and I tell them I am a good woman, I go straight to class and back home with my face covered. My honor is safe, and I am learning something useful for myself, and it can be useful to their wives and daughters, too."

Advocates say that what little legal protection Afghan women have is effectively available only in Kabul, the capital, and several other large cities. But even there, they said, courts rarely grant divorces to women and usually award custody of minor children to fathers.

In Kabul, a German-based group called Medica Mondiale provides attorneys for girls or women charged with such offenses as fleeing their husbands or having sex outside of marriage. Lawyers there said they try to mediate informally with family members, who often level such accusations against their own daughters or wives.

For example, they said, two families could be persuaded to let an eloping son and daughter marry instead of going to prison, or a girl who rejects an arranged marriage could return the gifts and money the man's family has given her, often the real cause of dispute.

"If a girl of 16 has been promised to an old man in marriage and she is unhappy about it, the law says she cannot be forced, but she may be unable to express her feelings to the family. We can express them for her," said Aziza Khowa, a lawyer with the group. "If the families are open-minded, they may understand quickly. If they are very strict, we may have to visit them and talk about it many times."

Since Medica Mondiale began offering legal aid to Afghan women in 2003, it has helped solve 750 cases through the court system or informal mediation.

The most formidable obstacle to change, advocates said, is the power of gossip and shame. An Afghan woman's reputation can be destroyed for life if she simply decides to insist on her right to choose, whether that means rejecting an unattractive groom or refusing to endure daily beatings by a drunken husband.

"The rule of rumor is a terrible thing, and it can cause great tragedy," said Angeles Martinez, the Medica Mondiale director here. "In Afghanistan, women have no identity as individuals, only in relation to their families."

In more than 90 percent of cases in which Afghan women or girls have attempted suicide by burning, Martinez said, "the cause is pure, constant domestic violence. At some point you turn it against others, or against yourself."

Losing The Good War (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0102164

Afghanistan was supposed to be the good war — and the war America was winning. But because of the Bush administration's inattention and mismanagement, even the good war is going wrong.

The latest grim news is that after years of effort — and more than $1 billion spent — Afghanistan's American-trained police force is unable to perform even routine law enforcement work. According to an article in yesterday's Times, investigators for the Pentagon and the State Department found that the training program's managers did not even know how many police officers were serving, while thousands of trucks and other American-purchased police equipment have simply disappeared.

The failure to provide local security — or even a semblance of impartial justice — helps explain why so many Afghans have lost confidence in the pro-Western government of President Hamid Karzai, and why a growing number are again turning to the Taliban for protection. The failure to stand up an effective police force also helps explain why opium cultivation rose by nearly 60 percent this year.

Creating even the most basic government institutions was always going to be difficult in a country as poor as Afghanistan. According to one expert, 70 percent or more of the recruits in the police training program are illiterate — not surprising in a country with a male literacy rate of only 43 percent. But the State Department and Pentagon compounded these problems, handing off the bulk of the police training work to an expensive private contractor and then failing to vigilantly monitor the program. We have seen that time and again in Iraq, where experts say the police training is at least as flawed.

There are many culprits for Afghanistan's many problems. Mr. Karzai needs to do a lot more to curb the corruption that is rife among his political appointees. President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan needs to do a lot more to stanch the torrent of Taliban fighters crossing his border into Afghanistan. NATO members need to send more troops to Afghanistan — with far fewer restrictions on how they fight.

As for fixing the police training program, there is little hope of that without also reforming the Afghan Ministry of Interior, which oversees the police, and is mired in both incompetence and corruption. Washington has sent some advisers to help clean up the ministry, but the effort is moving far too slowly. And the United States and its allies need to send a lot more police advisers to walk the beat with the newly graduated recruits, who get just a few months of classroom training. That is standard practice for training effective police forces, but it has not been tried in Afghanistan.

Mr. Bush's decision to rush off to invade Iraq meant that Afghanistan would be shortchanged when it came to resources and to policy makers' priority lists. The cost of that inattention can be seen in the failing Afghan police force. It can also be seen in the Taliban's growing strength, the mounting death toll of Afghan civilians and NATO troops, and the unraveling of the Karzai government. So much for winning the good war.

U.S. Army Battling To Save Equipment (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

ANNISTON, Ala. -- Field upon field of more than 1,000 battered M1 tanks, howitzers and other armored vehicles sit amid weeds here at the 15,000-acre Anniston Army Depot -- the idle, hulking formations symbolic of an Army that is wearing out faster than it is being rebuilt.

The Army and Marine Corps have sunk more than 40 percent of their ground combat equipment into the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to government data. An estimated $17 billion-plus worth of military equipment is destroyed or worn out each year, blasted by bombs, ground down by desert sand and used up to nine times the rate in times of peace. The gear is piling up at depots such as Anniston, waiting to be repaired.

The depletion of major equipment such as tanks, Bradley Fighting Vehicles, and especially helicopters and armored Humvees has left many military units in the United States without adequate training gear, officials say. Partly as a result of the shortages, many U.S. units are rated "unready" to deploy, officials say, raising alarm in Congress and concern among military leaders at a time when Iraq strategy is under review by the White House and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, is lobbying hard for more money to repair what he calls the "holes" in his force, saying current war funding is inadequate to make the Army "well." Asked in a congressional hearing this past summer whether he was comfortable with the readiness levels of non-deployed Army units, Schoomaker replied: "No."

Lt. Col. Mike Johnson, a senior Army planner, said: "Before, if a unit was less than C-1," or fully ready, "someone would get fired." Now, he said, that is accepted as combat-zone rotations are sapping all units of gear and manpower. "It's a cost of continuous operations. You can't be ready all the time," he said.

Across the military, scarce equipment is being shifted from unit to unit for training. For example, a brigade of 3,800 soldiers from the 3rd Infantry Division that will deploy to Iraq next month has been passing around a single training set of 44 Humvees, none of which has the added armor of the Humvees they will drive in Iraq.

The military's ground forces are only beginning the vast and costly job of replacing, repairing and upgrading combat equipment -- work that will cost an estimated $17 billion to $19 billion annually for several more years, regardless of any shift in Iraq strategy. The Army alone has 280,000 major pieces of equipment in combat zones that will eventually have to be fixed or replaced. Before the war, the Army spent $2.5 billion to $3 billion a year on wear and tear.

At Anniston, the sprawling lots of tanks and other armored vehicles are just the start of a huge backlog in broken-down gear.

"There's stuff, stuff everywhere," Joan Gustafson, a depot official, said as she wheeled her brown Chevrolet van through a landscape of rolling hills lined with armadas of mobile guns.

"There's another field of M1s," she said, motioning toward a swath of M1A1 Abrams tanks next to the winding road. "We're just waiting for someone to tell us what to do with them."

The Army's five depots carry out the highest level of maintenance for Army gear ranging from rifles and other small arms to tanks, helicopters and missile systems. Since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, the Army has left behind hundreds of thousands of pieces of equipment in Iraq and has relied heavily on field maintenance facilities in Kuwait.

But as the war has continued, Army leaders have recognized that they cannot afford to wait for a drawdown of troops before they begin overhauling equipment -- some of it 20 years old -- that is being used at extraordinary rates. Helicopters are flying two or three times their planned usage rates. Tank crews are driving more than 4,000 miles a year -- five times the normal rate. Truck fleets that convoy supplies down Iraq's bomb-laden roads are running at six times the planned mileage, according to Army data.

Equipment shipped back from Iraq is stacking up at all the Army depots: More than 530 M1 tanks, 220 M88 wreckers and 160 M113 armored personnel carriers are sitting at Anniston. The Red River Army Depot in Texas has 700 Bradley Fighting Vehicles and 450 heavy and medium-weight trucks, while more than 1,000 Humvees are awaiting repair at the Letterkenny Army Depot in Pennsylvania.

Despite the work piling up, the Army's depots have been operating at about half their capacity because of a lack of funding for repairs. In the spring, a funding gap caused Anniston and other depots to lose about a month's worth of work, said Brig. Gen. Robert Radin, deputy chief of staff for operations at the Army Materiel Command at Fort Belvoir.

"Last year we spent as much time trying to find available money as managing our program," he said. "We don't want to go into the next rotation . . . with equipment that's at the far end of its expected life."

Responding to urgent requests from the Army and Marine Corps, Congress approved an extra $23.8 billion in October to replace worn-out equipment in fiscal 2007. With the money, the Army plans to double the workload at its depots, which will repair and upgrade 130,000 pieces in 2007, up from 63,000 last year. This will include a quadrupling of the number of tanks, Bradleys and other tracked vehicles overhauled, from 1,000 to 4,000.

At Anniston, which will handle 1,800 combat vehicles in fiscal 2007, a cavernous 250,000-square-foot repair shop is humming as damaged tanks are rolled in one by one and disassembled with the help of giant cranes. Removing an M1 tank's turret alone takes a day and a half, and the entire overhaul requires 54 days and costs about $1 million, said Ted A. Law, the depot's vehicle manager.

Earnest Linn, 58, a heavy-mobile-equipment mechanic who as of January will have worked at Anniston for 30 years, said that "it's never been like this" since the end of the Vietnam War.

In October, Anniston became the official repair facility for the Army's newest armored vehicle, the Stryker. Repairs for those vehicles will soar from eight in fiscal 2006 to 75 this fiscal year -- including 58 that received some level of battle damage, said Gregory McMath, program manager for Stryker repair.

"This one hit a triple-stacked land mine," he said, peering up into the underbelly of a Stryker ripped open by the blast. Some of the Strykers are coming in with 40,000 miles on their odometers, he said.

Workers at Anniston take pride in patching, rebuilding and testing the broken-down gear and returning it to like-new condition. Often, they must innovate by taking parts from wrecked vehicles if new parts do not exist or have not been ordered in time.

"The supply system can't keep up with us," said Rodney Brodeur, division chief for turbine engines, speaking over the clang and whir of his workshop. It is projected that in 2007, Anniston will rebuild 1,400 turbine engines for M1 tanks, compared with 800 this year.

Fine sand and heavy use erode the blades on the tank engine rotors, eventually leading the blades to snap off and stall the engines. Such erosion, which is invisible to the Army's field mechanics, can lead to catastrophic failure without timely maintenance.

"If your Cadillac stops by the side of the road, that's an inconvenience," Brodeur said. "If the tank quits in the middle of the fight, that's a hard target."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Disputes 'whistle-blower' (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, December 5, 2006

In an unusual departure from the polite "no comment" that the Securities and Exchange Commission generally offers in response to criticism, four SEC officials are expected to blast a self-proclaimed "whistle-blower" before a Senate subcommittee hearing today.

The four officials, including Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement, are scheduled to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee to answer allegations that a high-profile investigation of John Mack, the CEO of Morgan Stanley, was abandoned last year because of political pressure.

Gary Aguirre, a former SEC investigator, made those allegations at a congressional hearing in June. Aguirre said he was fired because he didn't want to abandon an investigation into whether Mack broke inside-trading rules by sharing market-sensitive information with a hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management.

He testified that he wanted to subpoena Mack in order to ask him about various suspicious trades, but his superiors wouldn't let him issue the subpoena.

In June, the SEC said political pressure didn't play a role in the decision not to bring Mack in for questioning. Last week the SEC closed the investigation. Today, Thomsen and others are expected to offer blunt testimony about Aguirre and his work habits at the SEC.

Aguirre was fired in September 2005, just days before the expiration of his one-year probationary period at the commission. Once an employee passes the one-year mark at the SEC, it's almost impossible for him or her to be fired.

According to the testimony of Thomsen and three other former supervisors of Aguirre, advance copies of which USA TODAY obtained from a source close to the committee, Aguirre was an unhappy employee who did not respond well to authority.

He "demonstrated his own dissatisfaction with his employment by twice leaving the office abruptly during the workday after disagreeing with other attorneys," Thomsen will say.

Aguirre, who is in his 60s, also requested, and received, official time to pursue an unsuccessful age-discrimination case against the SEC "for failing to hire him on 22 prior applications."

Mark Kreitman, who heads the SEC divisional unit where Aguirre worked, will testify that Aguirre refused to reason with his superiors about the Mack subpoena.

"Frighteningly, it appeared that Mr. Aguirre was pursuing a personal agenda bordering on a vendetta, instead of a calmly reasoned, fair-minded pursuit of the evidence," an advance copy of his testimony says.

"Toward the end of his tenure, Mr. Aguirre's behavior became increasingly unprofessional, irresponsible and erratic. He threw what can only be reasonably described as tantrums, storming up and down the halls in a furious crouch, and abruptly left the office without leave on a number of occasions," Kreitman will say.

2nd Official Dissented Over Pequot Inquiry (NYT)

By Walt Bogdanich

Congressional investigators have found that a second official at the Securities and Exchange Commission expressed serious concerns about how the agency was conducting its inquiry into a prominent hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management.

The official, Eric Ribelin, an investigator at the commission, asked to be removed from the Pequot inquiry because of his serious misgivings about decisions being made on the case by senior S.E.C. officials, according to a government official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss the matter.

Mr. Ribelin believed that the inquiry "was not handled right," Senator Arlen Specter, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said in an interview. The investigator's criticism echoes some of the complaints lodged this year by the former S.E.C. lawyer who ran the investigation, Gary J. Aguirre.

"Something smells rotten here," Mr. Ribelin wrote in an e-mail message to an S.E.C. supervisor last year.

He is among those expected to testify today before Senator Specter's committee, which, together with the Senate Finance Committee, has been examining allegations by Mr. Aguirre that the agency prematurely halted its Pequot investigation because of outside political pressure.

Mr. Aguirre, who led the hedge fund investigation until he was fired last year, has told members of Congress that senior S.E.C. officials blocked him from taking testimony from John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive and friend of Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg.

S.E.C. officials said they turned down Mr. Aguirre's request at that time because he had not made a strong enough case for taking Mr. Mack's testimony, records show. The S.E.C. took Mr. Mack's testimony about a year later, and formally closed the Pequot investigation last week without taking any enforcement action. Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack have repeatedly denied any improper conduct.

Mr. Ribelin did not return a message left at his office yesterday.

An S.E.C. spokesman, John J. Nester, declined to comment, saying, "We'll just let our testimony speak for itself."

Senator Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, said he was interested in finding out why S.E.C. officials, who had previously written favorable evaluations of Mr. Aguirre's work, suddenly wrote a critical evaluation that covered the same time period.

"The supplemental evaluation was highly unusual," Senator Specter said.

Government officials said the S.E.C. supervisors never discussed the evaluation with Mr. Aguirre and then placed it in his employment file after he was fired on Sept. 1, 2005.

Just days before his firing, Mr. Aguirre was awarded a two-step merit pay increase.

According to a government official, Mr. Aguirre's direct supervisor, Robert Hanson, an S.E.C. branch chief, said the supplemental evaluation was written at the suggestion of Paul R. Berger, a former associate director of enforcement. Mr. Berger declined to discuss the evaluation yesterday, saying he could not comment on personnel matters.

Senate investigators have also been looking at circumstances surrounding Mr. Berger's decision to take a job at the law firm of Debevoise & Plimpton this year.

Debevoise was hired by Morgan Stanley's board to vet Mr. Mack before he was named to head the company in June 2005. As part of that vetting process, Mary Jo White, the former New York federal prosecutor now at Debevoise, did contact the S.E.C.'s director of enforcement, Linda Thomsen, about Mr. Mack, but the firm says it never suggested to anyone at the commission that the investigation be stopped.

Mr. Aguirre has told Congress that after a compliance officer at Morgan Stanley called the S.E.C. in June of 2005, inquiring whether Mr. Mack might face an enforcement action, Mr. Aguirre's Pequot investigation was essentially shut down.

Mr. Aguirre said that before answering the compliance officer, he consulted with his two superiors, Mr. Hanson and Mark Kreitman, an assistant director of enforcement. According to Mr. Aguirre, Mr. Kreitman favored telling Morgan Stanley that Mr. Mack was indeed a target, but first he informed his boss, Mr. Berger, by speakerphone.

With Mr. Aguirre listening in, Mr. Berger overruled Mr. Kreitman, saying in effect that the S.E.C. would most likely not file charges against Mr. Mack, and that nothing should be said to Morgan Stanley, Mr. Aguirre said.

Mr. Berger said yesterday that he had told Morgan Stanley "that it was premature to say whether or not Mr. Mack had any exposure."

Several months later, Mr. Berger said, an S.E.C. colleague who was interviewing at Debevoise offered to mention that Mr. Berger might have an interest in working there, too. Mr. Berger agreed.

In a statement yesterday, Debevoise's presiding partner, Martin Frederic Evans, said, "Sometime in September 2005, well after our work for the Morgan Stanley board had concluded, we were told that Mr. Berger might have an interest in talking to Debevoise, but the firm did not contact Mr. Berger, nor did the firm hear from him till January 2006."

Mr. Evans said that neither Mr. Mack nor the S.E.C. investigation were mentioned in the firm's employment discussions with Mr. Berger.

Once that contact began, Mr. Berger said yesterday, "I recused myself from any matter with which the firm was involved, including the Pequot investigation."

Mr. Aguirre has already provided Senate investigators with lengthy statements and dozens of contemporaneous e-mail exchanges he had with S.E.C. supervisors. He is also expected to testify at the hearing today, along with senior S.E.C. officials, including Ms. Thomsen and Mr. Berger.

The committee is also expected to question the agency's inspector general, Walter J. Stachnik, who initially concluded that the S.E.C. had done nothing wrong. But after the disclosure that Mr. Stachnik's office had not interviewed Mr. Aguirre before rendering its judgment, the inspector general reopened his investigation.

"These folks are going to be under oath, and I'm going to try to get to the bottom of it," Senator Specter said.

The senator said he would call for legislation requiring hedge funds to register with the S.E.C. if they manage pension fund investments or money from small investors.

Before the S.E.C. decided this year not to file any enforcement action against Pequot, the agency had been investigating a number of profitable trades by the hedge fund in advance of mergers or other market-moving news.

Mr. Aguirre began investigating Pequot soon after he started at the agency in September 2004.

"When you are inquiring into areas like this, it's very delicate and people are very reluctant to talk," Senator Specter said. "These investigations are not easy and not totally predictable."

The S.E.C. is also under review by the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress. Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, asked for the review in September because he was growing concerned, he said, about whether the S.E.C. was "faithfully adhering to its mission."

The G.A.O. will also examine how well the commission monitors self-regulatory organizations — like the New York Stock Exchange and NASD — that refer cases to the commission for possible enforcement actions. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Jefferies Settles Probe Of Lavish Gifts, But Fidelity Isn't Clear Of U.S. Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Susanne Craig And Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Brokerage firm Jefferies Group Inc. has agreed to pay more than $10 million to settle allegations that a former star trader doled out gifts and entertainment, including expensive wine and private-jet flights, to Fidelity Investments to win mutual-fund trading business.

The National Association of Securities Dealers, which spearheaded the investigation, imposed a $5.5 million penalty on Jefferies, and the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered Jefferies to return nearly $4.8 million of trading gains. The firm, which settled charges without admitting or denying guilt, has been ordered to hire a monitor to review travel, entertainment and gift policies.

WSJ reporter Suzanne Craig reports on the SEC and NASD fining brokerage firm Jefferies Group $5.5 million for splurging on improper gifts and excessive entertainment2 to Fidelity Investments.

Former Jefferies trader Kevin Quinn, whom Jefferies armed with a big expense account to lure Fidelity business, was fined $468,000, and Scott Jones, a Jefferies board member who was Mr. Quinn's immediate supervisor, was fined $50,000. Both agreed to other penalties to settle the charges.

Mr. Quinn, who through his attorney declined to comment, has been permanently barred from working at a registered securities firm. A spokesman for Jefferies said the New York firm has enhanced its internal controls and was happy the matter is behind the firm. Mr. Jones, through a Jefferies spokesman, declined to comment.

Notable in yesterday's announcement was that the SEC, which has jurisdiction over Fidelity, took no action against the mutual-fund company. Mutual funds are supposed to send their stock trades to whichever firm offers them -- and their customers -- the best price and service, and such decisions aren't supposed to be based on gifts a fund manager may have received from a broker.

However, according to people familiar with the inquiry, the SEC has had difficulty trying to prove that investors were financially harmed because Fidelity traders accepted the gifts and entertainment. "It's very hard to do, very hard to prove...that the gifts are in any way impairing price," said Howard Schiffman, a securities lawyer and former SEC enforcement lawyer in Washington.

Complicating the picture is Fidelity's reputation for using its market muscle to squeeze brokers' profits and lower its funds' trading costs. Fidelity's trading costs, once in line with those of other money managers, have fallen in recent years to half the industry average, according to a study by Abel/Noser Corp., which tracks such expenses. That saved hundreds of millions of dollars for investors. As a result, it could be hard to show that the company could have done better with costs had it gone elsewhere.

Fidelity has had an investor-friendly image and a reputation for ethical conduct and has been rocked by the probe. The company has disciplined more than 20 employees on the trading desk, including firing some people, Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley said. Scott DeSano, the once-powerful head of equity trading, was reassigned and the company also has a new policy on gifts.

The mutual-fund company, also known as FMR Corp., continues to fight allegations that customers were harmed. "We continue to believe it's not possible to demonstrate that financial harm occurred to any Fidelity fund or client as a result of these excessive gifts or entertainment," Ms. Crowley said.

Fidelity isn't out of the woods yet. The SEC is continuing to investigate the company, according to people familiar with the investigation. These people said the SEC may be trying two other strategies, including bringing civil charges against the company for violating disclosure laws, which require fund companies to disclose conflicts of interest to customers. Those familiar with the case said the SEC also is looking at whether it can bring a charge based on Fidelity traders receiving compensation above what Fidelity paid them.

The charges bring to a close a painful, albeit colorful, chapter in Jefferies' corporate history. In 2002, the company hired Mr. Quinn, agreeing to pay him $4 million a year. The firm armed the trader with a $1.5 million expense account that Mr. Quinn used to curry favor with a select group of Fidelity traders.

He spared little expense, doling out gifts valued at more than $600,000 and entertainment that totaled more than $1 million, regulators estimated. The NASD bars gifts valued at more than $100 and allows "ordinary and usual business entertainment" so long as it is "neither so frequent nor so extensive as to raise any question of propriety."

Mr. Quinn bought tickets to concerts and tennis matches at Wimbledon and the U.S. Open, often making available a private plane so traders could travel in style to the events, regulators said. In 2004, Jefferies paid more than $125,000 for a weekend trip to the Super Bowl that featured parties hosted by Maxim and Playboy magazines. Regulators said the brokerage firm also bought traders numerous bottles of wines, including six bottles of 1998 Opus One for a total of more than $2,600, regulators found.

On one weekend jaunt featured in a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal, Jefferies paid about $75,000 for traders to attend a Miami bachelor party for a Fidelity trader that featured dwarf tossing. A friend of the bridegroom to be, not a Wall Street firm, paid for the dwarf to attend the weekend festivities, according to people familiar with the matter. As the probe unfolded, some traders said they reimbursed Jefferies for some of the gifts. Still, regulators said any money paid to Jefferies didn't come close to covering the amount that was spent.

The case led the NASD to overhaul its gift and entertainment rules. Regulators don't plan to tinker with the gift-giving rule but want firms to set dollar limits, or establish comprehensive guidelines for expenses that are subject to regulatory review. These changes are being considered by the SEC.

The NASD still may bring a handful of gift and entertainment cases, but the bulk of its review was completed with an 11-page report issued yesterday. The report found that while most firms have failed to keep records on things like which clients and staff attended events, abuse was limited and doesn't warrant further action. It encouraged firms to review their systems. "We saw problems but it was mostly record-keeping and nothing approaching the Jefferies excess," said James Shorris, the NASD's head of enforcement.

Jefferies To Pay $9.7 Million To Settle Fidelity Gift Case (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, December 5, 2006

In a case that could taint the pristine image of mutual fund giant Fidelity Investments, federal regulators settled civil charges with a stock brokerage firm for lavishing more than $1.6 million in fine wines, golf junkets, sports tickets and other goodies on a handful of Fidelity traders. The gifts, regulators contend, were designed to get Fidelity to shift more of its stock-trading business to the firm.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the National Association of Securities Dealers announced Monday that Jefferies & Co. agreed to pay $5.5 million in fines and $4.2 million in disgorgement to settle the case.

Regulators say Jefferies obliterated the NASD's $100 limit on the amount of gifts and expense-related entertainment that can be provided to a customer each year.

According to the settlement, Jefferies made only $4.3 million in commissions off the Boston-based family of mutual funds in 2001. In order to grow its Fidelity business, the company hired Kevin Quinn in September 2002, paying him $4 million a year and an annual expense account of $1.5 million.

Quinn moved quickly, organizing a $215,000 golf junket to Las Vegas and Cabo San Lucas, Mexico, that fall for two Fidelity traders and their supervisor. For the next two years, the big-ticket spending continued. Quinn arranged for five Fidelity traders and their supervisor, Scott DeSano, to fly from Boston to various spots across the USA and in the Caribbean.

One of the Fidelity traders must have been a tennis fan, because Quinn provided $90,000 worth of tickets to Wimbledon from 2002 to 2004, and $17,000 in U.S. Open tickets during those same years.

Other traders received tickets to Broadway shows, and one received tickets to the 2004 Super Bowl in Houston.

While Quinn was lavishing perks on five traders and their boss, Jefferies' business with Fidelity grew more than tenfold: In the second quarter of 2002, Jefferies executed trades in 25 million shares of major companies on behalf of Fidelity; two years later, that number swelled to 277 million.

Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley said the company had disciplined 14 individuals in the matter some two years ago, after an internal investigation. Several were terminated. “We don't tolerate this type of conduct,” she said. The SEC's investigation of Fidelity continues, she added.

Jefferies & Co. Settles Claims Of Illegal Gifts (WP/AP)

By Marcy Gordon

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

The New York brokerage firm Jefferies & Co. is paying $9.7 million to settle regulators' charges that it illegally lavished nearly $2 million in golf trips, entertainment and other gifts on Fidelity mutual fund traders in exchange for their business.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the NASD, the brokerage industry's self-policing organization, announced the settlements yesterday. Two Jefferies executives were also sanctioned.

Under the settlement with the SEC, Jefferies was censured and agreed to pay $4.2 million in restitution plus interest. It also agreed to hire an independent consultant to review the firm's compliance procedures. In the deal with NASD, Jefferies will pay a $5.5 million civil fine over the alleged violations that occurred between September 2002 and October 2004.

Jefferies neither admitted nor denied wrongdoing.

It was the first case brought in a two-year investigation by the SEC and the NASD into whether about two dozen brokerage firms illegally provided golf outings, Super Bowl tickets and other gifts to traders at mutual fund advisers to get them to bring their business to the firms. The practice is said to be widespread in the brokerage industry.

NASD rules prohibit such gifts worth more than $100. Additionally, mutual fund advisers are required to disclose potential conflicts of interest.

Fidelity Investments, the Boston-based fund giant, has said it could face action from the SEC in an investigation into whether its traders sent company business to brokerage firms that offered gifts and gratuities, rather than to firms offering the best deals on trades. More than a dozen Fidelity employees have been disciplined in connection with the investigation and at least five traders have left the firm.

Jefferies' director of equities, Scott Jones, accused by the regulators of failing to adequately supervise Kevin Quinn, a former trader and senior vice president, agreed to pay a $50,000 civil fine and was barred for three months from working as a supervisor for any brokerage firm.

The firm hired Quinn in May 2002 to expand its business with the Fidelity funds, giving him a $1.5 million annual travel and entertainment budget, the regulators said.

Quinn allegedly showered the fund traders with expensive golf outings, flew them on private jets to such locations as Bermuda and Puerto Rico, put them up at swank hotels and gave them golf merchandise and tickets to major sporting events -- including the Super Bowl and the Wimbledon tennis tournament.

Quinn agreed to pay a $468,000 civil fine; he was barred from working for any brokerage firm.

Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley declined to comment on the Jefferies settlements.

Bruce Baird, an attorney for Jefferies, said the firm "cooperated completely" with the regulators' investigation. "Jefferies is glad to have all this behind it," he said.

SEC In Crackdown On Wall St Lavish Gifts (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York And Rebecca Knight In Boston

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

US regulators moved on Monday to crack down on brokers who lavish gifts on mutual fund traders as they slapped $9.7m in penalties on Jefferies & Co, the New York securities firm, for currying favour with Fidelity traders.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the industry regulator NASD said Jefferies, a middle-sized investment bank, hired Kevin Quinn as an executive vice-president in 2002 and gave him a $1.5m annual travel and entertainment budget to boost their institutional business.

He used the money to court five Fidelity traders, paying for private flights to Turks and Caicos, Bermuda and Puerto Rico, as well as vintage wines, golf outings, and trips to Wimbledon and the US Open tennis tournament.

He also paid $75,000 towards a lavish Miami bachelor party for a Fidelity trader. “Investors deserve and the integrity of the market requires that traders select brokers based on the quality of their trade execution and not the lavishness of their gifts,” said Walter Ricciardi, the SEC’s deputy enforcement director.

The regulators said the case was part of a broader effort to tighten policies that have let brokers funnel thousands of dollars in gifts and entertainment to institutional traders.

The NASD, which unearthed the problem, also issued a report urging firms to track entertainment and gifts more closely.

“We looked at 40 different firms that did institutional business and there was an industry- wide failure to track entertainment and gifts,” said James Schorris, head of enforcement at the NASD.

The firms routinely violated the NASD’s gift policy at the time, which limited gifts to $100. “We didn’t see any other firm that sank to the level of Jefferies but there is a lot of room for improvement,” Mr Schorris said.

Mr Quinn, who lost his job in October 2004 after his spending habits came to light, has been ordered to pay $468,000 in SEC penalties and barred from the securities industry for life, his lawyer said.

His supervisor Scott Jones was fined $50,000 and suspended from serving as a supervisor for three months. Since the scandal broke, Jefferies has instituted a "no gifts" policy for its employees.

"Jefferies has revamped its procedures and it is going to make sure nothing like this ever happens again," said the firm's outside counsel Bruce Baird.

"Jeffries chose to settle, rather than to litigate," said Anne Crowley, a Fidelity spokeswoman. "This settlement is one where we played no role and had no say, this is not a settlement with Fidelity."

She said that Fidelity had conducted its own investigation and taken strong disciplinary action against those employees found to have violated company policies.

Agreement Elusive On Accounting Rule Change (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

Regulators continue to revise an accounting rule criticized by business groups as overly expensive, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said yesterday, but an agreement remains days away.

Officials at the SEC and the board that oversees the audit industry have been meeting and exchanging documents about the measure, which requires accountants to review corporate financial controls, for the better part of two weeks. The rule is the single most expensive part of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, corporate accountability legislation passed in 2002 that is designed to prevent fraud after collapses at Enron and WorldCom.

Trade groups and lawmakers have attacked the provision and called for regulators to scrap the burdensome approach. At the same time, consumer advocates warn that establishing different standards for thousands of small and mid-size businesses would effectively gut the measure and make financial reports less reliable for investors.

The trick is to make complying with the rule less expensive, particularly for smaller companies with fewer resources. Coming to agreement on the mechanics, including forcing accountants to rely on the judgment of corporate managers, and to focus on the most important issues in the financial statements, has been a difficult task. The debate broke into public view two weeks ago after a memo from Cox was leaked to the press.

At a public meeting yesterday, Cox said he was "confident" a pact could be reached soon that would both "improve the reliability of public company financial statements and better protect investors." The SEC is to meet Dec. 13 to issue a new proposal. Mark Olson, chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, said last week that his panel would meet to issue its own guidance sometime before Christmas.

Separately, the SEC's five commissioners unanimously approved the accounting board's $136.4 million budget, an increase of about 4 percent over 2006. Olson said the budget would allow him to hire more inspectors and enforcement officials to police the work of more than 1,600 firms that are registered with the board.

SEC officials are to testify today at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on how the agency enforces insider trading rules against hedge funds. Among the witnesses will be a former SEC lawyer who claims he was fired for seeking to depose a top investment banker. The agency has argued his allegations lack merit.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Feds Charge Alzheimer's Researcher (AP)

By Rita Beamish, The Associated Press

AP, December 5, 2006

(AP) — In a rare federal prosecution, a leading government Alzheimer's researcher was charged Monday with a criminal conflict of interest for performing lucrative private drug company work that overlapped his official duties.

DOJ_NMG_0102173

Prosecutors alleged Dr. Trey Sunderland of the National Institutes of Health received $285,000 in improper consulting fees and travel expenses from Pfizer, Inc., for work on early indicators of Alzheimer's at the same time he also oversaw similar NIH business with the drugmaker.

The private consulting "directly related" to his government job, and Sunderland failed to obtain the proper approvals from his supervisors or disclose the work to NIH, according to papers filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore.

The felony charge carries a maximum sentence of one year in prison and a $100,000 fine. Prosecutors filed the charge as a criminal information, instead of indictment, signaling the possibility of a plea deal.

Sunderland did not return a call to his office Monday seeking comment. His attorney, Robert Muse, declined comment.

The prosecution is believed to be the first such case against a federal scientist since the early 1990s.

It stemmed from a two-year ethics controversy at NIH that prompted the nation's premier medical agency to issue new rules on consulting and end such relationships that enrich its scientists.

Scientists recently told NIH that the new rules are so strict that many are considering leaving the agency.

NIH had identified at least 44 government researchers who improperly made money moonlighting for biotechnology and drug companies. Most were given written or verbal reprimands or were permitted to retire.

But Sunderland drew the attention of federal prosecutors and the ire of Congress when House investigators revealed his private financial deal and the fact that he transferred hundreds of tubes of valuable NIH tissue samples to Pfizer around the time of his consulting work.

Sunderland, 55, who heads a geriatric psychiatry branch at NIH's National Institute of Mental Health in Bethesda, Md., is to appear Friday for arraignment.

Sunderland refused to testify before Congress last June, citing his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee which launched the probe called Monday for Sunderland's dismissal. Otherwise, Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said in a statement, "We can only conclude that no one is being held accountable, the system is broken and the public trust has been violated."

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., complained Sunderland had been kept on even after Department of Health and Human Services agencies found wrongdoing in their own internal investigations.

"Will a criminal conviction for conflict of interest be enough to get someone fired from NIH?" he asked.

Prosecutors alleged in Monday's court filing that during his five-year private deal with Pfizer, Sunderland "did participate personally and substantially as a government employee and officer ... in a particular matter in which, to the defendant's knowledge, he had a financial interest."

The conflict began in 1998 when Sunderland was making arrangements for NIH to work with Pfizer on an Alzheimer's project. At the same time, he began negotiations to be a paid consultant on the same project, prosecutors allege. Government scientists are not allowed to take money for their official collaborations with private companies.

NIH spokesman John Burklow declined comment.

Ned Feder, a former NIH scientist now with the non-profit watchdog group Project on Government Oversight, said "in this and similar cases NIH authorities have made it habit of covering up or minimizing wrongdoing. They are still hiding the details of other scientists' conflicts of interest over the past 10 years."

Experts said the last prosecution of a senior NIH scientist was that of Prem Sarin, who was convicted in 1992 of embezzling a drug company payment to NIH that was intended to help with AIDS research.

My Boss Stole My Identity! (FORTUNE)

By Stephanie Mehta, Fortune senior writer

Fortune, December 5, 2006

I.D. theft in the workplace is becoming more common, but workers are still forced to trust their employers with sensitive information, says Fortune's Stephanie Mehta.

Anyone who works in an office - or watches "The Office" - knows how torturous cubicle life can be: unflattering fluorescent lights, insecure supervisors and clueless co-workers can all take their toll. Now, it seems, there's a new indignity: bosses who steal their employees' identities.

Terrence D. Chalk, a well-known White Plains, N.Y., entrepreneur, may have done just that. The Justice Department says Chalk, CEO of a computer services company called CompuLinx, applied for loans and credit cards using the names of employees or clients, falsely claiming they were officers of his firm.

Charges include conspiracy and credit card fraud, and if he's convicted, he faces up to 165 years in prison. Chalk, who was quoted frequently in computer industry trade publications and served on local charity boards, has made other enemies too.

4 scams: How to avoid them

Once his case became public, assorted associates came out of the woodwork, claiming the entrepreneur owed them money. And a former business partner told the local paper that Chalk used his deceased father's personal information to get a loan. Chalk's lawyer didn't return calls.

ID-stealing bosses are the exception, but they are out there, says Linda Foley, executive director of the Identity Theft Resource Center, a leading nonprofit that provides information and support for fraud victims.

In fact, Foley started the center in 1999 after her boss used information on Foley's tax forms to apply for credit cards and a cell phone. And earlier this year a judge in upstate New York sentenced a computer entrepreneur to seven years in jail for tax fraud and stealing the IDs of employees and friends.

"It is very hard when an employer or co-worker does this to you, because you somehow feel you are safe in the workplace," says Foley.

Yet the office is fertile territory for a would-be identity thief: Workers constantly leave personal information lying around on their desks or office fax machines. People place wallets and bags - containing Social Security cards, checks and other information thieves use to commit fraud - in the same place every day, making them easy pickings.

But even if you're extra cautious in the workplace, you're still no match for a boss who wants to steal your identity. After all, there's one institution you really can't hide a Social Security number from: your employer.

Feds Win Milberg Discovery Battle (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, December 5, 2006

L.A. federal prosecutors have won a behind-the-scenes discovery fight in the undying probe of plaintiffs firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman.

In a sealed ruling issued the day before Thanksgiving, U.S. District Judge A. Howard Matz ordered the production of reams of discovery that prosecutors had sought from various plaintiffs firms, according to lawyers familiar with the case.

Attorneys for Milberg -- which was indicted in May, as were two of its name partners, on charges of paying kickbacks to clients -- had argued that the material was covered by work-product privilege.

The documents relate largely to payment agreements with other firms for John Torkelsen, a former expert witness for the plaintiff goliath, said the attorneys.

Torkelsen has been the subject of intense interest as the prosecutors continue efforts to indict Milberg's former star partner William Lerach, who now heads the top plaintiff shop Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins.

The May indictment of Milberg accused that firm of giving fees to outside lawyers who in turn paid lead plaintiffs in class actions, constituting illegal kickbacks.

But the ongoing investigation looks beyond those charges at other transactions. Aside from the Torkelsen payments, prosecutors have spent years looking at referral fees Milberg allegedly paid to other lawyers -- and possibly stockbrokers -- in exchange for bringing them lead plaintiffs.

STOCK SUSPECTS

The stockbroker probes involve a group from Florida and brokers at the New York investment firm First Albany, said attorneys with knowledge of the case. A spokeswoman for First Albany didn't return calls.

DOJ_NMG_0102175

Lawyers said the prosecutors are interested in whether Milberg paid brokers for referring investors to serve as lead plaintiffs in shareholder suits.

While such payments were made explicitly illegal by a 1995 federal law, it's not clear whether they were allowed in earlier years. That legal gray area, the lawyers said, muddles whether brokers could be forced to cooperate.

Last year, a Long Island, N.Y., broker -- and former Milberg partner -- Paul Tullman, pleaded guilty to tax charges and -- according to the Wall Street Journal -- is cooperating in the L.A. case.

SQUEEZING TORKELSEN

Torkelsen became central to the investigation some time after it was launched in 1999 by a former firm client who -- in trying to dodge a long prison sentence for insurance fraud -- told prosecutors he got kickbacks while serving as a persuasive expert witness who helped set the value of many Milberg class actions.

After leaving the expert business, Torkelsen started an investment fund -- largely with cash from plaintiffs lawyers -- that led to his downfall: He pleaded guilty last year to bilking the Small Business Administration of about $5 million invested in his fund. Torkelsen's ex-wife, Pamela, is cooperating with prosecutors, testifying in the Milberg case while her ex-husband resists pressure to flip, said lawyers familiar with the probe. Torkelsen is serving a prison sentence of more than five years.

L.A. federal prosecutors moved Torkelsen to a downtown Los Angeles detention center months ago to get a handwriting sample and have kept him there.

Lawyers familiar with the case -- speaking on condition of anonymity due to the confidential nature of the proceedings -- said Matz's discovery order could provide detailed information on pay arrangements among Milberg, the expert and various plaintiffs firms. That could lead to more pressure on Torkelsen: the threat of another criminal indictment.

Torkelsen's attorneys with the L.A. federal public defender's office didn't return calls by press time, nor did lawyers for the two indicted Milberg partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman.

And Bryan Daly, a partner at Beck, De Corso, Daly, Kreindler & Harris in Los Angeles who represents the firm, said he couldn't comment on discovery issues. So did Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the L.A. U.S. Attorney's Office.

13 MONTHS TO GO

While the investigation continues, defense lawyers for the firm, its partners and two Southern California lawyers indicted last year for alleged involvement with referral fees are preparing for trial.

At a hearing last week, U.S. District Judge John Walter chose Jan. 8, 2008, to start the Milberg trial. And while speculation is still rampant about whether Lerach and lead Milberg partner Melvyn Weiss will face charges, Daly, the L.A.-based Milberg lawyer, said his focus now has to be on the pending case. "The trial schedule is something we're going to work very hard to meet," he said.

U.S. Navy Submariner Pleads Guilty To Trying To Transmit Classified Data (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sonja Barisic, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 5, 2006

(AP) - NORFOLK, Virginia-A sailor accused of stealing a U.S.Navy laptop and peddling its classified contents to an undisclosed foreign government pleaded guilty to espionage, desertion and other charges.

If convicted, Petty Officer 3rd Class Ariel J. Weinmann, 22, of Salem, Oregon, could face a sentence of life in prison without parole, a dishonorable discharge from the Navy and forfeiture of all pay.

Under the plea agreement Monday, Weinmann pleaded guilty to one count each of espionage, desertion, failing to properly safeguard and store classified information, electronically copying classified information, communicating classified information to a person not entitled to receive it, and stealing and destroying a government computer.

Weinmann pleaded guilty to trying to transmit classified information related to national defense to a representative of a foreign government on Oct. 19, 2005, while he was in or near Vienna, Austria.

He pleaded not guilty to two additional espionage counts, one accusing him of giving classified information to an agent of a foreign government in March 2005 in Bahrain and another accusing him of trying to deliver confidential information on March 19, 2006, in Mexico City.

Weinmann told the judge that he deserted the Navy in July 2005 because the service did not meet his expectations.

"I had a very idealized view, basically what amounted to a World War II Navy," Weinmann told the judge.

Court adjourned Monday with the judge yet to accept the plea. Attorneys need to iron out details in the agreement regarding Weinmann's cooperation with investigators after trial.

Weinmann, a fire control technician, had been stationed on the Connecticut-based submarine USS Albuquerque.

He said he did not report for duty aboard his submarine on July 3, 2005. He moved to Austria and never planned to come back to the United States, but changed his mind and was arrested in March at Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport.

Weinmann told the judge he believed his actions could hurt national security.

"I believe if it fell into the wrong hand, sir, the information could be detrimental to the United States," Weinmann said.

He said he made copies of classified material on a laptop computer, which he took with him to Austria. He said that he printed one document and copied other information onto CDs and that he had unclassified, classified and secret information sitting on a table in his apartment in Austria.

The military has not said what it believes Weinmann might have sought in exchange for the information.

Weinmann's most recent duty station was at the Submarine Support Squadron, based in Norfolk.

WPTY-TV, December 5, 2006

A former U.S. Attorney talks to Eyewitness News about corruption charges against a Memphis City Council Member.

On Thursday, November 30, 2006, city council members Rickey Peete and Edmund Ford were charged for taking a bribes in exchange for their votes on a zoning issue. It is the same crime Rickey Peete was convicted of in 1989. Hickman Ewing was the U.S. Attorney who prosecuted the case.

The year was 1989. Hickman Ewing was the U.S. Attorney for West Tennessee. One day he received a call from his friend, a real estate developer. Ewing said, “In this case they called, and they said this guy's trying to shake us down.”

It was the beginning of Ewing's case against city councilman Rickey Peete. He said, “They would go down and talk to each councilman and try to lobby them to vote for them, and Rickey basically says I’m the one that can get this through, I can get this through for you, and I need money now and money later.

Ewing said the developers said no, and called him. They agreed to help Ewing get evidence that Rickey Peete was looking for a bribe. Ewing said, “The third partner, Hank Hill, called Rickey and said, ‘Hey look, I know what you told my other partner, I’m a little different situation, we may be interested in this, so come on down.’ Of course he's wearing a recorder at city hall.”

Ewing said the two agreed to meet later that day at a restaurant to exchange the money. “Literally, Rickey says ‘hand it under the table’, and the guy hands him a sack full of bills under the table. The FBI is sitting at the next table watching,” said Ewing. “He was two payments behind on his Mercedes, like $350, he goes and pays one that afternoon and says I'll give you the next payment whatever the date was of the vote. He says I'll give you that money then, that's pretty good evidence.”

Ewing said Rickey Peete was by no means the first public official he went after during his time in the federal building. He said, “We probably prosecuted 100 public officials before 1989.”

But hearing that Rickey Peete is now accused of the exact same crime was a different story, “It's sad, especially if it happens again, in somewhat the same way.”

Ewing said he is glad the U.S. Attorney's office is continuing it's crusade against public corruption. He said, “I think prosecuting one public official is worth a lot more than prosecuting ten bank robbers. Who's more dangerous to society, one crack dealer who's 19 years-old who's got a habit, or the public official? I'd say the public official.”

We tried to contact both Rickey Peete and his lawyer on Monday, December 04, 2006 for a comment on this story. Neither of them returned my calls.

On Friday, December 1, 2006, Rickey Peete resigned his position as chairman of the Center City Commission Board of Directors, but he is still a voting board member. On Tuesday, December 5, 2006, some city council members say they will call for Peete and Edmund Ford to resign from the council.

Not Guilty Plea In Hollywood Wiretapping (MH)

The Miami Herald, December 5, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A former phone company employee pleaded not guilty Monday to charges of lying to FBI agents and a federal grand injury investigating wiretapping allegations against Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano.

Joann Wiggan is to stand trial Jan. 9 in U.S. District Court.

Wiggan, 52, is charged with lying to investigators, grand jurors and during a previous trial about her contact with former co-worker Ray Turner. If convicted, she faces a maximum of 15 years in prison.

Prosecutors say Wiggan was one of three SBC employees who supplied Turner with information from confidential phone company databases he used to help Pellicano illegally tap the phones of several Hollywood figures.

Turner and Pellicano have pleaded not guilty to charges in a separate indictment.

Wiggan was acquitted in September of four perjury charges but jurors deadlocked on a fifth. During the trial, she said her conversations with Turner had nothing to do with accessing private phone records for Pellicano.

Prosecutors countered by showing jurors pages of phone calls - more than 1,000 - from Wiggan between 1998 and 2002 that they say prove she lied about her contact with Turner.

In the new indictment, prosecutors allege Wiggan and Turner called each other at least 35 times during a time when Wiggan claimed they hadn't spoken.

Prosecutors also allege Wiggan denied retrieving voice mail messages from an account they say she accessed on "hundreds of occasions" between 1998 and 2004. Jurors deadlocked on that charge during her trial.

Prosecutors contend Pellicano illegally wiretapped the phones of such people as actors Sylvester Stallone and Keith Carradine and bribed police officers to run the names of more than 60 people, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through government databases. According to court documents, the information gathered was used to get dirt for threats, blackmail and in some cases to secure a tactical advantage in litigation.

Fourteen people have been charged in the case, with six pleading guilty to various crimes. Pellicano has pleaded not guilty to racketeering and wiretapping and is set for trial in August.

Alleged Mafia Underboss Is Freed On Bail (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 5, 2006

He faces charges of extortion and illegal gaming

SALEM -- Reputed New England Mafia underboss Carmen "The Big Cheese" DiNunzio looked uncomfortable yesterday as he shuffled into court in leg irons. He didn't speak, as his lawyer entered not guilty pleas on his behalf to charges of illegal gambling and extortion.

"He's unused to the attention he's getting," said Boston lawyer Anthony M. Cardinale, who represents DiNunzio, 49, of East Boston. The man described by law enforcement officials as a low-key underworld leader was freed on bail after posting $20,000 cash.

"It's not the strongest of cases, but anything in superior court is always serious," said Cardinale, who has previously represented a who's who of mobsters, including former New England mob boss Francis "Cadillac Frank" Salemme and former underboss Gennaro "Jerry" Angiulo.

Cardinale said the indictment returned by an Essex County grand jury on Friday alleges crimes that occurred in 2001 and was brought just as the statute of limitations was about to expire.

"I think it's to our benefit that they waited this long" to bring the case, Cardinale said.

DiNunzio is charged with extortion, maintaining or organizing an illegal gaming operation, and conspiracy in maintaining or organizing a gaming operation.

According to law enforcement officials, DiNunzio rose to be second in command of all New England mobsters about 2002, after winning the favor of New England godfather Luigi "Baby Shanks" Manocchio of Providence.

Cardinale said his client vehemently denies allegations that he is the number two man in the New England mob and controls all Mafia activities in the Boston area.

First Assistant Essex District Attorney John T. Dawley said he was seeking a high cash bail for DiNunzio because "this case involves violence."

"It also involves witnesses who remain on the street," Dawley said.

He added that DiNunzio has a 1993 federal conviction for extortion.

In that case, DiNunzio admitted shaking down a Las Vegas gambler for $27,000 and was sentenced to four years in prison.

The indictment alleges that DiNunzio conspired to run an illegal gambling operation between September and December 2001 with four men, Joseph Settipane, Thomas Verona, James Candelino, and Gregory Costa.

All four men were bookmakers, according to law enforcement officials.

Settipane died after the Massachusetts State Police Special Service Section launched the 2001 probe, using wiretaps and hidden bugs to secretly record conversations.

Verona, Candelino, and Costa were indicted in December 2002 on illegal gambling charges in allegedly running a sports betting operation.

At the time, an Essex prosecutor described the trio as midlevel agents in a gambling network tied to organized crime. All three were convicted and sentenced to probation.

In March, Varone was among 24 men indicted on state gaming charges, according to a spokesman for Essex District Attorney Jonathan W. Blodgett. That case is still pending.

The investigation that led to DiNunzio's indictment also led to the indictment last February of reputed mob soldier William Angelesco on gambling and conspiracy charges.

DiNunzio, who owns the Fresh Cheese shop in the North End and Carmen's Kitchen restaurant in East Boston, declined to comment before leaving in a silver Isuzu.

Ansonia Man Competent For Murder-for-hire Trial (NHREG)

By Phil Helsel, Register Staff

New Haven Register, December 5, 2006

-ANSONIA — The local man who police say conspired with his mother in a low-rent "murder for hire" scheme was ruled competent to stand trial and entered not guilty pleas Monday.

Nicholas Scott Taylor, 20, is charged, along with his mother, Kathryn Smith, 48, of conspiring in a plot to kill Smith's boyfriend for what they believed would result in a $100,000 insurance policy payout earlier this year.

Monday, a judge ruled that Scott is competent to stand trial and the case was continued until Jan. 9.

Taylor, of Nichols Street, and his mother allegedly offered an undercover FBI informant a used stereo and up to $150 cash to kill Smith's longtime boyfriend, according to an arrest warrant affidavit. The offer was just $50 and a used stereo, and possibly another $100 after they cashed in some methadone, to carry out the killing, police said.

Smith and Taylor are each being held in lieu of $250,000 bail and are charged with one count each of conspiracy to commit murder, criminal attempt to commit murder and inciting injury to persons. Smith already has pleaded innocent to the charges.

According to police, Smith and Taylor tried to hire an acquaintance of theirs to carry out the murder, but he went to Shelton police instead.

Ansonia police and the FBI then began an undercover investigation that led to the pair's arrest Aug. 29.

Taylor allegedly told undercover officers during an arranged meeting that his mother's boyfriend was "getting really annoying to us."

He allegedly provided the undercover officer the man's work schedule, including days off, and said "the area around the ferry" would be a good place to discard a weapon.

Both allegedly told the agent they would not feel guilty if the plan were carried out, according to the affidavit.

Woman Charged In '78 Slaying (SEATIMES)

By Steve Miletich And Jim Brunner, Seattle Times staff reporters

Seattle Times, December 5, 2006

Prosecutors charged a Pierce County woman Monday with first-degree murder in the 1978 killing of an auto mechanic who allegedly was lured to his death as part of a contract killing.

Karen L. Martin, 51, was arrested Friday by a FBI/local law-enforcement task force investigating old unsolved homicides. Her name surfaced as investigators combed past cases related to organized crime and Seattle strip clubs.

In court documents filed with the murder charge, King County Detective Scott Tompkins said Martin told him in July that her then-husband informed her they would be paid $10,000 to kill the victim, Leroy Grant, 36.

Martin said her husband was involved with prostitution and organized crime, Tompkins wrote in the charging documents. Her husband was in prison at the time.

On Jan. 22, 1978, Martin lured Grant to a site in Maple Valley on the premise that she wanted him to restore a Corvette for her, and then she killed him, according to the documents. His body was found four days later, shot at close range in the head and chest with a .22-caliber pistol.

A year after the killing, Martin and her attorney went to federal prosecutors, saying she had information on contract killings linked to a Seattle-based crime organization.

She was offered immunity from federal prosecution before she acknowledged she killed Grant, according to the charging papers. Grant was killed because he had obtained money "he was not supposed to have gotten," Martin allegedly told prosecutors.

Federal prosecutors didn't inform King County prosecutors about Martin's admissions, and Grant's slaying went unsolved.

The immunity offer was never formally executed and is not binding on state prosecutors, according to Tompkins' court filing.

When Tompkins contacted Martin in July, she at first denied killing Grant, the filing said. But Tompkins suggested investigators had found her DNA at the scene, and then she "confessed to committing the murder."

Martin provided details of the crime, including that she used a .22-caliber revolver and took Grant's wallet to make it look like a robbery, Tompkins wrote.

Martin's arrest was the third in the past year by the task force, which was formed after the 2003 "Strippergate" scandal in Seattle. The scandal involved the alleged funneling of illegal contributions to three Seattle City Council members by associates of Frank Colacurcio Sr. and his son, Frank Colacurcio Jr., the operator of Rick's strip club on Lake City Way Northeast.

In the wake of that scandal, investigators decided to focus on the Colacurcios' business operations, as well as old homicides possibly related to the strip-club industry.

When Martin approached federal prosecutors in 1979, she did so out of fear that her husband was trying to blame her for the killing, according to court documents. She sought immunity in exchange for the information.

At the time prosecutors were investigating Colacurcio Sr. and later convicted him of tax evasion.

Colacurcio Sr. has not been implicated in Grant's killing or in connection with the other two arrests, made in two separate 1975 killings at a Seattle-area strip club and at a Yakima restaurant. Colacurcio Jr. was in his teens at the time.

Martin is being held on $500,000 bail and is scheduled to enter a plea Dec. 14.

Producer Gets Short Sentence In TV Scam (LAT)

By Christine Hanley And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

After bilking millions from scores of investors, Joseph Medawar gets a term of a year and a day.

In a ruling that surprised attorneys and outraged investors, a federal judge Monday sentenced onetime Hollywood producer Joseph Medawar to a year and a day in prison for swindling scores of people out of millions of dollars to develop a bogus television show about the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

Minutes after Medawar apologized to the people he defrauded, U.S. District Judge Manuel L. Real sentenced the 45-year-old con man to a prison term far shorter than the 33 months his attorney had requested, or the 57 months sought by the government. Medawar also was sentenced to nine months' home detention after his prison sentence ends and 3,000 hours of community service, and he was ordered to pay at least $2.6 million in restitution.

Showing no emotion, Medawar left the courtroom without comment. He was ordered to surrender Jan. 22 to begin his prison term. His attorney, Jeffrey Rutherford, later issued a prepared statement.

"Joseph Medawar accepts his sentence," the statement read. "He is extremely remorseful and repentant. He is sorry for the harm that he has caused and he accepts full responsibility for his conduct. He thanks his family and friends for their support. He vows to repay each of the victim-investors. He also vows to continue to help the government in its investigation of others."

Acknowledging disappointment, Assistant U.S. Atty. Christine Ewell told reporters outside court that authorities would review Real's sentence to see if there are any grounds for appeal.

Ewell also was apologetic when questioned by many investors about whether and when they might get reimbursed.

"We're doing our best. We're sorry," she told one woman. "Our goal is to get as much as we can back to you."

Real, 82, has been a lightning rod for criticism, with a reputation for a peremptory and even cantankerous temperament on the bench. Most recently, he was the subject of a congressional subcommittee hearing considering possible impeachment over his decision to seize a bankruptcy case from another judge.

After the sentence, investor Manuel Lozano did not hide his disappointment.

"I was looking for justice," he said. "I was expecting more."

In May, about three years after he first began promoting his idea for a Homeland Security series, Medawar admitted to authorities that the show was a financial scam and pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit mail fraud and income tax evasion.

By then, according to the FBI, the IRS and the U.S. attorney's office, Medawar and others had defrauded at least 70 investors — many from local churches — out of millions of dollars.

The money poured into his company, Steeple Productions, was spent on luxury cars, shopping sprees, jewelry, posh dinners and $40,000-a-month rent on a Beverly Hills mansion for the show's purported lead actress, Alison Heruth-Waterbury.

Heruth-Waterbury previously pleaded guilty in the case and was sentenced to five years' probation and 2,500 hours of community service and ordered to pay restitution. Jeffrey Rosenberg, former chief financial officer of Medawar's company, was sentenced to 10 months in federal prison for lying to agents about the fraud.

Medawar also persuaded two prominent Orange County Republicans, U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher and former congressman and current Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox, as well as House Homeland Security Committee staffers, to provide advice on how to make the show more realistic.

Medawar also was accused of using money laundered through the scheme to pay Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach) $23,000 for an option on a 30-year-old screenplay by Rohrabacher. The congressman has said he thought Medawar's proposed TV show would bring positive attention to the nation's homeland security efforts and denied that he provided Medawar any special attention in return for the producer's purchasing Rohrabacher's script or contributing to his political campaign.

In May, when Medawar pleaded guilty, Rohrabacher said he would return the screenplay option payment.

At Monday's hearing, the courtroom was packed with Medawar's relatives and victims.

Carmen Wood, 71, of Southgate, who invested $10,000 from her family trust, talked about how she blindly put her faith in Medawar and his idea the day she met him at a Whittier church, and how disappointed she was that someone would misuse Christianity to target innocent people for financial gain.

"I am asking that justice be served here for me and these people here who lost money," she said, later turning to look straight at Medawar and saying. "May God be your judge."

Lozano, who lost $120,000, told the story of another investor who could not be in court Tuesday. The man, suffering from lung cancer, had scraped up $1,000 to give Medawar, banking on the hope that once the production company went public, as promised, it would bring the payday he needed for a special medical procedure that could have saved his life. "His illness got the best of him," Lozano said of the man, who died "waiting for the money."

Minutes before Real's ruling, prosecutor Ewell urged the judge to sentence Medawar to no less than the nearly six years recommended by the government. She also dismissed the arguments of Medawar's family and friends that he is a good man who has always been generous to them.

"It's simple to be generous," Ewell scoffed, "when you are using other people's money."

The San Jose Mercury News, December 5, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A man was sentenced to a year in prison Monday for bilking investors out of millions of dollars by fraudulently claiming to be producing a government-backed television show about the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

The sentence given to Joseph Medawar, 44, by a federal judge was a fraction of what prosecutors had sought.

U.S. District Judge Manuel Real said he wanted Medawar free after a year to earn $3.46 million in restitution to investors, many of whom Medawar met in church. The judge also sentenced Medawar to 3,000 hours of community service.

Medawar pleaded guilty in May to tax evasion and conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud, admitting fleecing about 50 people of millions of dollars.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Christine Ewell said outside court that she had sought a 57-month sentence and was disappointed by the judge's leniency.

Prosecutors said Medawar's lies included telling investors that President Bush endorsed the series and that the real Department of Homeland Security approved use of its name and seal for the TV show.

As part of the scheme, federal prosecutors said, he falsely claimed 26 episodes of "DHS" were in post-production and that the company had distribution deals with 137 overseas markets. Investigators found only one episode had been shot, and only after Medawar became aware of the federal probe.

One would-be investor, Manuel Lozano, told the judge Monday that Medawar left many "individuals financially crushed by the side of the road." Lozano said he had been fooled into investing $120,000 in the series - money that included life insurance he collected when his wife died.

Lozano also expressed disappointment outside the court, saying "justice and the legal system don't necessarily coexist."

Jeffrey Rosenberg, 58, a financial officer who failed to report the scheme, was sentenced to five years probation and 2,000 hours of community service in September. He also was ordered to pay $1.5 million in restitution to the victims of the investment scam.

Alison Heruth, who claimed to be the lead actress in "DHS," also pleaded guilty in the case and was given probation.

Murder Convict In FEMA Fraud Trial (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), December 4, 2006

Governor Reiss Sr. committed murder as a teenager, spent part of his adulthood on the run after an escape from prison and then became a preacher.

Now in his 50s, the Mobile native finds himself once again in trouble with the law.

Reiss, 54, will go on trial later this month on charges that he defrauded the federal government following Hurricane Katrina, the first such case to go to trial in Mobile's federal court. Jury selection is slated for today.

It marks yet another bizarre turn in a life filled with twists that has taken Reiss from Mobile County to prison to Louisiana to prison again.

Reiss' colorful history notwithstanding, defense attorney Willie Huntley said his client is innocent of the current allegations. He attributed the fraud charges to confusion on the part of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which he contends filed his application under the wrong category.

"All he did was make a call and say, 'I need some help' just like thousands of people along the Gulf Coast," Huntley said in a recent interview.

Reiss pleaded not guilty last week to the latest charges, the third set of allegations brought in the case. Prosecutors accuse him of filing fraudulent claims with FEMA for housing assistance totaling more than $12,000.

DOJ_NMG_0102182

A guilty plea hearing had been set for August, but Reiss said he wanted a trial. Then a federal grand jury added more charges in September. The trial was supposed to be held in October, but a judge postponed it until this month because a key prosecution witness was unavailable at the time.

A week before jury selection, the grand jury came back with more charges.

If the trial goes off as scheduled on Dec. 18, it will not be the first time Reiss will have sweated out the deliberations of 12 jurors. Records from the Alabama Department of Corrections show that Reiss was sentenced in January 1970 for second-degree murder in the shooting death of a teenager at a Prichard club the previous year.

He served four years in prison before escaping from Draper Correctional Institution in September 1974, said corrections spokesman Brian Corbett.

"I didn't stay because I was wrongly accused, and the only way I could prove that was to live it," Reiss said in an interview last week.

Louisiana authorities arrested Reiss 10 years later, Corbett said. According to a news account at the time, Reiss had become a minister and asked for permission to preach to inmates at the Louisiana State Police barracks in Baton Rouge.

Louisiana officials conducted a routine background check and discovered that Reiss had two arrests on his record -- the murder charge and a second one for assault with intent to murder, according to the 1984 newspaper article. The story said police inquired further and discovered Reiss had escaped from the Alabama prison.

Mike Edmonson, a Louisiana state trooper, said at the time that authorities called up Reiss and told him his request to preach had been granted. When he arrived, police arrested him and took him to the East Baton Rouge Parish jail.

"The guy was extremely surprised. It was a shock to him, but he knew what he'd done in the past, so I don't think he was completely surprised," the newspaper quoted Edmonson as saying.

Reiss said that it was not the first time he had been arrested. He said he was arrested in Louisiana 1976, and three other times on the escape charge, but that Louisiana refused to turn him over to Alabama authorities out of concern over the validity of the murder conviction.

Corbett said records indicate Reiss returned to Alabama in 1991, seven years after the 1984 arrest in Louisiana. He said the Alabama Board of Pardons and Paroles granted Reiss a parole in 1991. Reiss said he came back voluntarily.

Reiss was 17 when the original crime for which he was convicted took place. According to a newspaper account, Reiss shot Ronnie Hays to death during a dance inside a teen club on Whistler Avenue.

Reiss testified that he and some friends had been drinking and were angered when they were told to leave. He said he went to his grandmother's house, got a shotgun and shells and returned to fire several shots through the window.

Hays, a standout high school athlete, was killed and 12 others were wounded.

Defense lawyers argued at trial that Hays could have been killed by his own father, who had fired a pistol during the confusion, according to the newspaper article.

Charges involves FEMA

Reiss said he became a born-again Christian in 1978, and later became a minister. He said he founded three different churches, retiring as a full-time preacher in 2001 because of high blood pressure.

Now, he is one of thousands of people across the country who authorities contend took advantage of FEMA's decision to hand out cash on little more than the word of the applicants following the Aug. 29, 2005, hurricane. More than a dozen people have been charged in southwest Alabama.

The latest indictment charges Reiss with making false claims against the government, making a false statement and two counts each of theft of public money, wire fraud and aggravated identity theft.

Authorities allege that Reiss lived in New Orleans at one time but was living in Mobile when the storm struck. According to the indictment, Reiss applied for assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Sept. 30, 2005, listing his name and someone else's, and using a New Orleans address where he did not live at the time of the hurricane.

Reiss allegedly obtained two payments from FEMA in 2005: $2,358 on Oct. 4 and $10,500 on Nov. 22.

Huntley said Reiss applied over the phone for aid to replace furniture, clothing and a vehicle that were destroyed when floodwaters ravaged New Orleans. Reiss said he did not use the first check to replace those belongings, as FEMA requires, but instead spent it on other things -- including helping a church member. He said he did not know about FEMA's restrictions on the aid at the time.

Reiss said the second check came as a surprise. "They sent me money that I didn't ask for. It was supposed to go to my ex-wife."

Reiss said he did not apply under his ex-wife's name, as the indictment alleges, but listed her as an occupant of the house that was damaged. He and his lawyer contend it was a mix-up that the check came to him. Huntley said Reiss, his ex-wife and son -- all of whom share the same last name -- all applied for aid.

"I believe that's what caused the complications and confusion," Huntley said.

Reiss said he deposited the money in his credit union but said he never spent it. He said he was trying to get it to his ex-wife but was not supposed to have contact with her as a result of the divorce.

The indictment accuses Reiss of falsely stating in his application that he lived in New Orleans when he actually lived in Mobile. Huntley said his client has an Alabama driver's license and had gotten a job in Mobile and moved in with relatives in the Port City several months before Katrina because his New Orleans home was about to be foreclosed on. But he continued to travel back and forth between both cities, Huntley said.

Even if Mobile was his primary residence, Huntley said, Reiss still would be eligible for FEMA assistance related to his personal property.

Under a preliminary calculation by the U.S. Probation Office, Reiss would have an incarceration range of six to 12 months and be eligible for probation. But Huntley said prosecutors have indicated to him that they plan to hold Reiss' prior criminal record against him if he's convicted -- a move the defense lawyer said he would fight on grounds that it happened too long ago to be relevant.

"Hopefully, we won't even have to get to this issue because, hopefully, a jury will find him not guilty," he said.

Man Arrested, Tied To Assaults Near Howard (WP)

By Robert E. Pierre

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

A teenager from Temple Hills has been arrested in connection with eight recent sexual assaults near Howard University, D.C. police said yesterday.

Women were groped in the incidents, and in two cases, the assailant brandished a knife, police said. No one was injured in the assaults, which took place late last month. During the past week, police blanketed the area where the assaults occurred with plainclothes and uniformed officers.

Yesterday, police announced the arrest of Avon Marquell Pittman, 17, of the 4700 block of Temple Hill Road. On Saturday afternoon, plainclothes officers noticed Pittman following a woman in the 200 block of T Street NW and pounced, discovering a kitchen knife and taking him into custody, police said. He was later let go, and police said the woman he had been following was so startled that she left before they could question her.

Police arrested Pittman early yesterday, after authorities developed additional leads. He was charged as an adult with assault with intent to commit first-degree sexual assault while armed. The charge applies to just one of the cases.

But "the community can feel confident" that the crimes are solved, police Cmdr. Larry McCoy declared at a news conference.

Police had offered a $10,000 reward in the case, and McCoy said it was unclear whether it would be paid. But he said tips helped police solve the cases quickly. Witnesses helped police come up with a composite drawing that was passed out to residents.

Police said the victims ranged in age from 16 to 49, though most were in their teens and 20s. Most of the crimes took place near Fifth and U streets NW, near one another and during daylight hours. Police did not offer a motive but said Pittman had friends and family in the neighborhood.

D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1), who represents the area, said residents have been concerned about being groped as they walked down the street. He praised the police effort, which he said included having female officers pose as private citizens.

"This shows what can happen when the police really focus their energy and make determined efforts," he said. "This is a real relief to get this guy off the street."

For Second Time, Kaine Delays Execution Of Va. Triple Killer (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux, Washington Post Staff Writer

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine yesterday delayed for the second time the execution of triple killer Percy L. Walton, a move that keeps the capital murder case at the center of a growing national debate over the execution of the mentally ill.

In June, Kaine delayed Walton's scheduled execution until Friday to allow for an independent evaluation of his mental condition and competence. Based on that evaluation, Kaine (D) said yesterday that Walton's execution would be delayed 18 more months, until June 10, 2008.

"I am compelled to conclude that Walton is severely mentally impaired and meets the Supreme Court's definition of mental incompetence," Kaine said in a statement. "At the same time, it is within the realm of possibility -- though unlikely -- that Walton's mental impairment is not permanent. Accordingly, a commutation of his sentence is not appropriate at this time."

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1986 that the execution of the mentally ill violates the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court said death-row inmates must be able to comprehend that they are about to be executed and why. But the high court left it up to states to define who is sane or insane.

Walton's case is one of several pending around the country that have frequently been cited as important tests of the limits of the Supreme Court's ruling in Ford v. Wainwright.

Attorneys for Walton, 28, contend that Walton is mentally ill and mentally retarded and that his condition has further deteriorated since he has been on death row. His attorneys at trial never requested a competency hearing. A competency hearing was held three years ago as part of his appeals, and experts disagreed about his mental state.

In a rare move, less than two hours before his scheduled execution in June, Kaine asked three mental health experts to evaluate Walton to determine if he is competent to be executed. A spokesman for the governor said two of the three experts had completed reports on Walton's mental health, and one declined to review his case. The experts' conclusions will not be made public, the spokesman said.

Jennifer Givens, an attorney for Walton, said yesterday that there is little doubt that Walton is mentally ill, adding that she is pleased with the governor's decision.

"As we have predicted all along, the governor has determined that Walton's severe mental illness prevents him from understanding fully the punishment he is about to suffer and why he is to suffer it," Givens said.

The reprieve drew fire, however, from Kaine's political adversaries, who said Kaine, who twice defended death-row inmates as a private attorney, failed to deliver on his campaign promise to uphold the death penalty in Virginia. Kaine's former campaign opponent, former Republican attorney general Jerry W. Kilgore, said he was not surprised by the governor's decision.

"It's what we expected and what we said when we were on the campaign trail," Kilgore said. "It's a shame any time one person exerts his will over that of an unbiased jury and not only that, judges and appellate judges."

Virginia Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R) raised similar concerns in a statement yesterday, saying he "respects" Kaine's authority but thinks Walton should be executed. McDonnell said he is "concerned about the impact today's action could have on our justice system."

Since he took office, Kaine has allowed four executions to go forward.

Walton pleaded guilty in 1997 to killing Jessie and Elizabeth Kendrick, an elderly Danville couple, and his neighbor Archie Moore. Walton's current attorneys and his family maintain that he showed signs of the early onset of schizophrenia before his conviction.

Yesterday's decision marked the third time in three years that the execution of Walton, 28, has been at least temporarily halted. In 2003, a federal judge delayed Walton's execution three days to hear testimony about his mental state. This June 8, after ordering an inquiry into his mental state, Kaine said there "is more than a minimal chance that Walton no longer knows why he is to be executed or is even aware of the punishment he is about to receive."

Nicknamed "Crazy Horse" by death-row guards for his bizarre behavior, Walton often refuses to shower and rarely speaks coherently, his attorneys say. Characterized as "floridly psychotic" by a psychiatrist, Walton has said that he will go to Burger King, that he will drive a motorcycle after his execution and that he believes his death will resurrect his three victims and his late grandfather, his attorneys said.

In March, Walton's case narrowly split the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which ruled 7 to 6 that his execution could go forward, saying that questions about whether Walton understood that his "death means the end of his physical life" bordered on the "metaphysical."

Last week, a North Carolina judge issued a 60-day stay in the case of Guy T. LeGrande, a convicted killer who wore a Superman T-shirt and sent letters to a judge signed "Lucifer" when he defended himself at his murder trial.

CIVIL LAW:

Trusts Busted (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Harry Kananian died in the year 2000 of mesothelioma -- a cancer almost always caused by asbestos. But the legacy that may survive him is the role he is posthumously playing in exposing evidence of asbestos litigation fraud.

In early 2000, the Ohio resident met with the law firm of Early, Ludwick, Sweeney & Strauss to see about collecting compensation from special trusts set up by companies to deal with asbestos liabilities. So the law firm filed a claim to one trust, saying Kananian had worked in a World War II shipyard and was exposed to insulation containing asbestos. It also filed a claim to another trust saying he had been a shipyard welder. A third claim, to another trust, said he'd unloaded asbestos off ships in Japan. And a fourth claim said that he'd worked with "tools of asbestos" before the war. Meanwhile, a second law firm, Brayton Purcell, submitted two more claims to two further trusts, with still different stories. The two firms swept up as much as $700,000 for Kananian and his estate from trusts and settlements.

In the legal trade, this is known as "double dipping" -- the process by which lawyers file claims at many different bankruptcy trusts on behalf of a single plaintiff. Each trust is told a different story about how the client got sick, and the plaintiff collects from all of them. Of course, the lawyers collect too. This practice may well have remained unexposed had not Brayton Purcell decided to cash in on Kananian one more time. It sued Lorillard Tobacco, this time claiming its client had become sick from smoking Kent cigarettes, whose filters contained asbestos for several years in the 1950s. That suit has now exploded on Brayton, exposing one of the asbestos bar's more lucrative cash cows.

In Cleveland, Judge Harry Hanna of the Cuyahoga County Court of Common Pleas has been asked to rule on a motion to disqualify Brayton from the suit and bar it from practicing in Ohio. The firm stands accused by Lorillard of lying to the court, defrauding asbestos trust funds and obstructing discovery. Those accusations come via a raft of internal emails and documents, most if which are referred to in the court record, that tell a story of two law firms using contradictory stories to rake in money from bankruptcy trusts, then potentially trying to cover it up. All parties are under a gag order from the judge. Last week, Brayton Purcell, amazingly, requested to withdraw itself from the case. * * *

As the tort bar piled on endless -- and often bogus -- asbestos claims in the 1990s, many defendant companies started looking for a way out. One solution was to go into bankruptcy, turn over a huge chunk of money to an asbestos "trust," and emerge from Chapter 11 clear of asbestos woes. These trusts are responsible for one of the largest wealth transfers in history, shifting billions from companies and insurers to plaintiffs lawyers and their largely healthy customers. A number of large trusts are due to come online over the next year alone, with assets of $30 billion.

Many trusts are run by the very lawyers who created them; that is, once the trust is created, the defendant company is no longer involved with claims, and the trial lawyers divvy up the money. These lawyers, because their contingency fees are based on the trust's payouts, have no incentive to ensure that applicants for compensation were actually harmed by that particular trust's product. While it is not illegal to file at different trusts (and some industrial workers were exposed in multiple ways), most such claims are vague or contradictory. Trust payments are also considered legal settlements and thus confidential. So while the asbestos bar may wrongly double dip, this is usually hard to prove.

Harry Kananian met with the firm Early Ludwick in February 2000. According to an Early email, he wasn't clear how he'd been exposed. He had, however, served in the Army in World War II and remembered several months on troop ships known to contain asbestos. On one such two-week trip he'd done welding. He also recalled working in a factory that was "dusty," as well as a "white powdery substance" when he was remodeling his house.

Early Ludwick then filed its multiple claims -- to the 48 Insulations trust, the Eagle Picher trust, the UNR trust, the Celotex trust and others. Brayton Purcell was also retained by the plaintiff and filed claims to Johns Manville and Bethlehem Steel. The discrepancies were never questioned until Brayton sued Lorillard Tobacco, and Brayton probably never thought the prior claims would be an issue. But Lorillard suspected Kananian had already collected on the basis of his work history -- and it argued the jury had a right to know. To Brayton's dismay, Judge Hanna agreed earlier this year.

When Brayton's lead counsel, Chris Andreas, started to realize in February that Judge Hanna would allow the claims as evidence, his first strategy was to sell Early Ludwick down the river. Mr. Andreas seemed to hope that, if the judge thought Early's work was erroneous, he wouldn't allow the claims into court, where they might sway a jury. Mr. Andreas said in court that the Early claims were "flat incorrect," "simply inaccurate," "absurd" and "the most misleading information that [he'd] ever seen." The judge was unmoved.

In a March 10 email, Mr. Andreas relates the bad news to his partners, and explains the problems with the original claims. To give one example: In the UNR claim (which stated Kananian had unloaded asbestos off ships), Mr. Andreas says that, in fact, Kananian only supervised Japanese workers who'd unloaded ships. Also, "there is absolutely no evidence that anyone shipped or unloaded Unibestos [a UNR product] on any of ship [sic] he was involved with during this period, least of all Mr. Kananian himself." The rest of the Early claims had similar problems, he said, admitting that in one of Brayton's own claims "we also overstate Mr. Kananian's exposure . . ." In a separate email he states, "there is no way what our client sent them matches what they put in these forms."

Mr. Andreas worries that "I am forced to try to explain them away as mistakes by clerks or [attorneys]. A jury is going to look down on this type of fabrication by lawyers and can use this information to dump plaintiffs by finding that." He then offers a choice: They can give the money back, in which case Judge Hanna won't allow the claims, or they can "go forward at trial" and try to get the jury to focus on something other than "unsworn claim forms that were just used to pry money out of a bankrupt" (my emphasis). The goal, he says in another email, is to "blame [Early] for bulls----ing the trusts."

Meanwhile, Lorillard was trying to subpoena the confidential trust claims. Brayton knew the judge would go ballistic if it tried to officially squelch this process, so instead it worked behind the scenes. When the Celotex trust informed the law firms that it had received a subpoena, and asked whether they would try to legally block the subpoena, one outside lawyer suggested they "respond to [Celotex] via phone requesting that they resist . . ." Mr. Andreas noted: "I would love if Celotex gave these a--holes a hard time."

When it became clear Lorillard would get its way, the strategy changed again. Brayton Purcell decided it would work with Early Ludwick to submit amended claims to the trusts. In Brayton's original claim to Johns Manville, for instance, the form had described Kananian as a "laborer" who had direct contact with asbestos. It also said he'd worked in "shipyard construction/repair" and listed several Manville products, by name, to which he'd been exposed. The amended claim instead listed Kananian's occupation as "other," noted that he'd only been on board a ship where Manville products were installed, removed any reference to shipyard work, and deleted any Manville products. Other trust claims were similarly purged.

But Brayton Purcell had a problem. It needed to change the forms to bolster the Lorillard suit, but it didn't want to raise alarms at the asbestos trusts. Its solution was apparently to try to make sure the trusts didn't look closely. Even as Mr. Andreas was telling his partners that the original Early claims were "fictional," he instructed those working on the new claims to tell the trusts they were only "correcting some clerical errors." Partner Al Brayton instructed his staff, according to an email, to "simply re-do the old claim form with the new answers and submit with a cover letter. Do not call them."

By spring, Judge Hanna was getting suspicious. To the firms' dismay, he took the rare step of allowing Lorillard to depose its opponents. Brayton Purcell emails show it wondering if the former office assistant who'd prepared the original Manville claim was "disgruntled." Mr. Brayton had already instructed an underling to "immediately brief all personnel preparing claim forms or efficiency responses that they are not to 'make up' information to make a claim qualify." But the firms continued to obstruct, and the judge had enough. This summer, he ordered up their emails.

Among other things, the emails show that raise questions about Mr. Andreas's candor with Judge Hanna. On March 10, Mr. Andreas told the court that he didn't know if the original Early Ludwick claims had even been submitted to the trusts, and said he would "welcome" documentation showing they had. In fact, on March 3 -- a week prior to Mr. Andreas's statement -- a paralegal at Brayton sent an email to Early Ludwick noting that "trial attorney, Christopher Andreas, asked that I follow up with your office on the total amount of settlements your office has obtained in this case." That same day, Early Ludwick sent back an email listing the trusts and how much money had been obtained from each. As for Mr. Andreas welcoming proof from the trusts, this was about the same time he was hoping Celotex would resist.

Then there's Mr. Andreas's knowledge of the claims. On March 23, he told Judge Hanna that his firm would "stand by" its original Manville form. In fact, the firm had submitted a revised claim the night before. When Judge Hanna found out, he asked if Mr. Andreas had known. His response: "I'll just tell you right on the record and I'll repeat it under oath at any other point, I did not know about it when we argued on [March 23]. I did not know it had been prepared." However, Mr. Andreas had been sent an email with the revised form on March 22 -- the night before his "stand by" comment -- and had replied, only two hours after receipt. * * *

Lorillard laid most of this out in a motion requesting that the judge dismiss the case, bar Brayton Purcell from Ohio, and turn the information over to the Justice Department. Lorillard is insisting the original claims were accurate, although Harry Kananian's real history remains the great mystery here.

Brayton Purcell in November filed a 101-page document, arguing that Kananian's mesothelioma was caused by the "total dose of inhaled asbestos from all products," including Kent cigarettes. Regarding its desire to alter the claims, it said it believes the jury had a right to accurate evidence. It addressed one issue, claiming that "while it may be true" that Mr. Andreas knew about the amended claim form even as he said he "stood by" the original, his statement related to the "overall accuracy" of that original. Then, last week, it filed a motion asking to be withdrawn, although it said it was doing this to help its client, not because of the allegations. Mark Abelson, of Campagnoli, Abelson and Campagnoli, an attorney for Brayton Purcell, says: "At this point in time, we don't believe that the Brayton Purcell firm had done anything wrong. It is my belief that Lorillard is making every attempt to create tangential issues to the litigation that will delay and deflect any actual trial on the merits of their own conduct." Early Ludwick had no comment. Lorillard did not return a call.

Judge Hanna has continued to push back the trial date until the claims issue is resolved. A hearing is set for this week, and it isn't clear he'll allow Brayton to withdraw and thus escape any further scrutiny.

Whatever happens, the exposure of this trust scam is bolstering a new wave of oversight. Judges are already taking a closer look at silicosis claims and "prepackaged" bankruptcies -- both cash cows for the trial bar. Just last week, a separate Ohio judge ruled that an asbestos plaintiff must turn over any prior claims to a bankruptcy trust. Similar rulings have been handed down in Virginia and California.

Meanwhile, reform proposals are beginning to emerge. One idea is for the trusts to release data about claimants, so that other trusts and defense attorneys can review existing claims. Some lawyers are requesting that active litigation be put on hold until companies can see who claimed from trusts. That this hasn't already happened is the fault of bankruptcy judges, who have been unresponsive to requests for more oversight of the trusts they help create.

A cleaner system would help true victims. Some lawyers for mesothelioma victims feel the need to file many claims because trusts are drying up -- making it difficult to get decent compensation. The feeding frenzy by plaintiffs lawyers who cash in repeatedly, often on behalf of plaintiffs who are entirely healthy, often leaves little for those who are truly ill. It isn't justice: It's fraud.

Diversity Programs May Face Ax (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court appeared ready Monday to strike down public school diversity programs that use race as a factor in deciding where students go to school.

In the first test of school integration efforts to come before the court since Chief Justice John Roberts and fellow conservative Samuel Alito joined the bench last term, the justices heard two cases — one from Seattle, the other from Louisville — that examine whether using race in school assignments violates the Constitution's equality guarantee.

The court has supported affirmative action policies in education, most recently in 2003, when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor joined the nine-member court's four liberals to allow colleges to consider race in admissions to get diversity.

O'Connor is retired now, replaced by Alito. And Monday's two hours of arguments indicated that the court is moving toward a harder line on race-based policies.

The key player appeared to be Justice Anthony Kennedy, who is at the ideological center of the court. As the liberals asked questions that suggested they supported the school districts' policies, Kennedy joined conservative justices in expressing skepticism about programs that transfer some students out of their neighborhoods to counteract racially segregated housing patterns in those cities.

Kennedy bristled at the notion of "characterizing each student by the color of his or her skin," even for benevolent reasons. He rejected arguments that such policies do not stigmatize or otherwise harm students because all pupils end up with a place in a classroom, even if they are denied the school of their choice.

"The question is whether or not you can get into the school that you really prefer," Kennedy said. "And that in some cases depends solely on skin color. You know, it's like saying everybody can have a meal but only people with (a particular) skin can get the dessert."

Also challenging the policies were Roberts, Alito and Justice Antonin Scalia. Justice Clarence Thomas, the only African-American justice, asked no questions but has made clear in the past that he opposes using race as a factor to address past discrimination.

If the court rules against the districts, it could spell the end to school policies across the nation that use race as a criterion for enrollment and other decisions. The impact of a ruling would depend on its scope. Kennedy suggested that policies such as those in Louisville and Seattle that use race determinatively were unconstitutional but that "magnet" programs that enroll students voluntarily in a racially mixed school might be permissible.

Liberal Justice Stephen Breyer, whose questions indicated he backed the school districts, lamented the possibility that they would not be able to use race-conscious methods to continue integrating schools.

"It seems to me … that there is a terrible problem in this country," he said. "There are lots and lots of school districts that are becoming more and more segregated, and school boards all over are struggling with this problem. If they knew an easy way, they would do it."

Breyer and the other liberals — John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg — suggested a ruling against the school districts could undermine Brown v. Board of Education, the landmark 1954 ruling in which the court abolished the doctrine of "separate but equal" and began the nation's history of school desegregation.

Attorneys on both sides of the issue Monday, whether supporting the school systems' integration efforts or challenging them as wrongly perpetuating the use of race, contend that their side embodies the legacy of Brown.

The significance of the cases — and of their potential impact on the 1954 landmark — was apparent in the courtroom. Among the spectators was Cecilia "Cissy" Marshall, the widow of the late Justice Thurgood Marshall, the nation's first black justice and a legal architect of desegregation. Also in the court was William Coleman, who was part of Marshall's legal team in 1954, went on to become secretary of Transportation in the Ford administration and is now a lawyer in Washington.

Outside the marble-columned building, supporters of the integration programs vastly outnumbered challengers. They chanted, “Equal education, not segregation.”

However, it is the challengers — mostly white parents whose children were not assigned to their schools of choice — who seemed more likely to prevail.

Supreme Court Weighs School Diversity Cases (MCT)

By Stephen Henderson

McClatchy Newspapers, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - In historic arguments over voluntary school desegregation plans in Seattle and Louisville, Ky., a majority of the Supreme Court seemed highly skeptical Monday that race can be used even as a "tipping factor" in the decision to move students around to produce racially diverse schools.

But Justice Anthony Kennedy, probably the decisive vote on the matter, also seemed to stop short of embracing assertions that the Constitution always requires colorblind approaches to school integration, such as magnet schools.

Either way, the court effectively could end voluntary integration plans that are in place in dozens of school districts across the country by next spring. That would force administrators to come up with more subtle ways to ensure that children don't attend schools that reflect the nation's still-segregated housing patterns. Kennedy's distinctions might be the only hope for school districts that want to desegregate.

"When it came to the plans at issue, Kennedy certainly seemed to evince a good deal of hostility," said Ted Shaw, the executive director of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, which is supporting the school districts in the cases.

"But I also think he was trying to figure out where the stopping point was or how far the argument ought to go," Shaw said. "I think he was looking for a limiting principle" for the idea of government colorblindness.

Kennedy was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts, Justice Antonin Scalia and Justice Samuel Alito in his criticism of the school plans. Justice Clarence Thomas, a longtime critic of race-conscious policies, typically doesn't speak during oral arguments but is widely expected to object to the plans.

The cases, Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, mark a return for the justices to the dicey question of how race fits into the Constitution, and how the nation's past can be confronted.

The school districts say integration is a key component of a public education, and is compelling enough by law to justify a limited use of race in policies designed to produce that integration.

Scalia was especially dubious of the argument, advanced by a lawyer for the Seattle schools, that the plans were justified as a way to combat segregation.

"Can you think of any area of law in which we say whatever it takes, so long as there's a real need?" Scalia asked. "I mean, if we have a lot of crime out there and the only way to get rid of it is to use warrantless searches, you know, fudge on some of the protections of the Bill of Rights, whatever it takes, we've got to do it?"

"It seems to me you're saying you can't make an omelet without breaking eggs," Scalia said.

Kennedy seemed closer to Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer on the question of whether race-conscious policies should be permitted at all.

Breyer was particularly exercised over assertions that race-conscious integration efforts, which have been mandated by courts seeking to remedy past segregation, could be deemed unconstitutional outside the context of a court order.

"How could the Constitution, the day that that decree is removed, tell the school board it cannot make that effort anymore, it can't do what it's been doing, and we'll send the children back to their black schools and their white schools?" Breyer asked.

Kennedy was quite pointed in his criticism of the Seattle and Louisville plans, saying that unlike more nuanced measures, they characterize "each student by reason of the color of his or her skin.

"That is quite a different means. And it seems to me that should only be, if ever, allowed as a last resort."

But Kennedy also signaled to lawyers for parents who've challenged the assignment plans that race neutrality may not always be required.

DOJ_NMG_0102190

In Seattle, an "open choice" student-assignment plan allows high school students to pick a number of schools they'd like to attend. They're generally granted their choices, but if a school has too many applicants, the district takes several other factors into account to decide who got in.

One of them is race, which is used to prevent most schools from having demographics that differed wildly from the district as a whole.

In Louisville, after public schools were released from a court-ordered desegregation plan in 2000, administrators chose to continue an integration plan. Students choose from among several schools near their homes, and the district assigns them based, in part, on maintaining a racial balance in each school.

But parents, including some blacks, in both districts sued after their children were denied entry to neighborhood schools or schools they otherwise wanted to attend. They say the districts' policies discriminate on the basis of race, something the 14th Amendment to the Constitution doesn't permit.

The parents are supported in both cases by the Bush administration, which has consistently argued that while diversity is a compelling interest, it must be achieved through race-neutral means.

The cases' arguments echo the court's 2003 rulings on college affirmative action, which carved a narrow berth for race-conscious admissions as a way to enhance campus diversity. The school districts rely directly on the reasoning in those cases to support their policies.

The cases also reach back to Brown v. Board of Education, the landmark 1954 case that ordered an end to public school segregation. Brown at one time was used to support massive involuntary busing and sweeping, court-ordered desegregation plans, and its promise of integrated public schools is the legal force behind the voluntary plans that exist today.

A decision is expected by the end of June.

Court Reviews Race As Factor In School Plans (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — By the time the Supreme Court finished hearing arguments on Monday on the student-assignment plans that two urban school systems use to maintain racial integration, the only question was how far the court would go in ruling such plans unconstitutional.

There seemed little prospect that either the Louisville, Ky., or Seattle plans would survive the hostile scrutiny of the court's new majority. In each system, students are offered a choice of schools but can be denied admission based on their race if enrolling at a particular school would upset the racial balance.

At its most profound, the debate among the justices was over whether measures designed to maintain or achieve integration should be subjected to the same harsh scrutiny to which Brown v. Board of Education subjected the regime of official segregation. In the view of the conservative majority, the answer was yes.

While there is no reliable data on how common these plans are, they are thought to be widespread among school districts where residential patterns would otherwise produce neighborhood schools of one race or nearly so. Depending on how broadly the court rules, possibly hundreds of districts would need to modify or scrap voluntary integration plans.

The National School Boards Association as well as the Council of the Great City Schools, representing 66 urban districts, filed briefs on behalf of Seattle and Louisville, warning of impending disruption if the justices overturn the lower court rulings that upheld the two plans.

The Supreme Court had declined to review a similar voluntary integration plan in Massachusetts last year, shortly before the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and the arrival of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. But in June, after weeks of internal debate, the justices accepted these two appeals.

One was filed by a white woman in Louisville whose son was denied a transfer to attend kindergarten in a school that needed black rather than white students in order to keep its black population at the district's required minimum of 15 percent.

The other was filed by parents in Seattle who organized as a corporation to oppose the plan there, which applies only to the city's 10 high schools. A racial "tiebreaker," used when a high school attracts more students than there are places, intends to keep the schools within 15 percent of the district's overall makeup, which is 60 percent nonwhite.

Before the arguments on Monday, the challenge for the school board lawyers defending the plans, along with their allies in the civil rights community, had appeared to be to persuade the justices that the appropriate analogy was not to affirmative action, a freighted subject for the court in which benefits are bestowed on one group and withheld from another, but rather to integration, in which the goal is to educate everyone as equally as possible.

But by the end of the tense two hours of argument, that effort had not so much failed as it had become irrelevant. Lawyers for the school systems found themselves struggling, under the justices' questioning, to meet the even more basic challenge of explaining why the plans should be seen as something different from the intentional segregation that the court struck down in Brown v. Board of Education.

For example, Michael F. Madden, the Seattle district's lawyer, tried to argue that because the Seattle high schools were "basically comparable," and "everyone gets a seat," the court should not view the plan as "a selective or merit-based system where we adjudge one student to be better than the other."

It was, Mr. Madden said, "a distributive system" that was "quite wholly dissimilar to a merit or selective-based system."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. countered, "Saying that this doesn't involve individualized determinations simply highlights the fact that the decision to distribute, as you put it, was based on skin color and not any other factor."

He added: "I mean, everyone got a seat in Brown as well. But because they were assigned to those seats on the basis of race, it violated equal protection. How is your argument that there's no problem here because everybody gets a seat distinguishable?"

"Because segregation is harmful," Mr. Madden replied.

"It's an assignment on the basis of race, correct?" the chief justice persisted.

It was, Mr. Madden replied as his 30 minutes ran out and the red light came on, an effort "to bring students together in a mix that is not too far from their community."

As the arguments proceeded, the court's more liberal members appeared increasingly and visibly dispirited. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg tried unsuccessfully to turn the chief justice's colloquy with Mr. Madden in a different direction. The question of whether "using racial integration is the same as segregation," she said, was "pretty far from the kind of headlines that attended the Brown decision."

Bringing "white and black children together on the same school bench," Justice Ginsburg continued, "seems to be worlds apart from saying we'll separate them."

Justice Stephen G. Breyer let his frustration show in several exchanges with Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, who argued the Bush administration's position as a "friend of the court" for the challengers and against the school systems in both cases.

"Think, go back to Cooper v. Aaron," Justice Breyer told the solicitor general, referring during the argument in the Louisville case to the court's 1958 decision enforcing a desegregation order in Little Rock, Ark. "Go back to the case where this court with paratroopers had to use tremendous means to get those children into the school. That's because the society was divided."

He continued: "Here we have a society, black and white, who elect school board members who together have voted to have this form of integration. Why, given that change in society, which is a good one, how can the Constitution be interpreted in a way that would require us, the judges, to go in and make them take the black children out of the school?"

"Well, I understand that, Justice Breyer," Mr. Clement said. "But I think the answer to that is that the lesson of history in this area is that racial classifications are not ones where we should just let local school board officials do what they think is right."

The Louisville plan, adopted in 2000 as the formerly segregated district emerged from 25 years of federal court supervision, provides that all schools should have a black student enrollment of no lower than 15 percent and no greater than 50 percent. The district as a whole, which includes suburban areas of Jefferson County as well as the city of Louisville, is about one-third black.

Mr. Clement said the 15-to-50-percent range was a "strict racial band" that was not sufficiently "narrowly tailored" to satisfy the "strict scrutiny" to which the court's precedents subject government actions that are based on race. The administration's position is that those choosing to adjust the racial balance in their schools should do so by “race-neutral means,” like magnet schools that attract children across racial lines.

“There’s a fundamental difference between whether or not the policy manages to avoid classifying people on the basis of their race,” the solicitor general said.

Justice David H. Souter asked Mr. Clement why this position was not just another way of saying that “the important thing is simply to hide the ball.” If improving the racial mix was the objective, Justice Souter asked, “why can’t they do that candidly?”

There were “several responses,” Mr. Clement answered. “One is that the Constitution puts a particular premium on avoiding express racial classifications.”

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy asked the lawyers a series of questions designed to test the outer reaches of their positions. Could a school district deliberately place a new school in a location designed to supply a racially mixed student body, he asked, and appeared displeased when Harry J. F. Korrell, the lawyer representing the parents challenging the Seattle plan, answered no.

While his questions suggested that he would not rule out any and all policies undertaken with a knowledge of the probable racial consequences, Justice Kennedy made clear his distaste for the policies at issue in these cases, Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District, No. 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, No. 05-915.

To Mr. Madden, the Seattle district’s lawyer, Justice Kennedy said that unlike magnet schools, special resources, or school location decisions, “you’re characterizing each student by reason of the color of his or her skin.”

He continued: “That is quite a different means. And it seems to me that that should only be, if ever allowed, allowed as a last resort.” <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Supreme Court Could Rule Against Use Of Race For Public School Diversity (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 5, 2006

The Supreme Court appeared headed on Monday toward a ruling that will sharply limit, if not eliminate, the use of race as a factor in assigning students to public schools to achieve diversity.

During two hours of oral argument, Justice Anthony Kennedy, whose vote may determine the outcome of the case, seemed deeply skeptical of the constitutionality of using race as a factor, especially in a school district that has already been declared "unitary" and ended efforts to desegregate.

"If we, for the first time, say that a system that has achieved unitary status ... can turn around and use individual skin color. ... We've never said that," Kennedy exclaimed at one point. "That takes us on a very perilous course."

A ruling against the use of race could have a broad impact in school districts nationwide that use a variety of race-conscious methods to cure racial imbalances caused by housing patterns. Civil rights leaders who were among the spectators packing the courtroom Monday were pessimistic afterward.

"If they are inclined to view these voluntary measures in the same light as segregation and any use of race is constitutionally suspect, then God help us," said Ted Shaw, director and counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund. "I'm not going to predict defeat, but it's an uphill fight after what we heard today."

At issue in Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education were programs aimed at achieving racial diversity and balance throughout the public schools of Seattle and Louisville, Ky., respectively.

Parents whose children were not admitted to their school of choice because they would have upset the desired racial mix challenged the programs. But in both cases, appeals courts upheld the programs.

One measure of the tenor of the arguments Monday was the repeated effort by Justice Stephen Breyer to remind his colleagues about long-standing Court precedents, ranging from Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education to Cooper v. Aaron, which in his view support the use of race to achieve public school diversity.

Swann, the 1971 ruling that allowed the use of busing and racial balancing to eliminate lingering segregation, was repeatedly cited by Breyer. Once desegregation is achieved through these measures, Breyer said almost plaintively, "How could the Constitution ... tell the school board it cannot make that effort anymore, it can't do what it's been doing, and we'll send the children back to their black schools and their white schools?"

Teddy Gordon, representing the Louisville parents who challenged the school board's use of race, replied that race-based remedies are no longer appropriate once past desegregation programs have ended. "Once you've achieved the unitary status, you no longer get to carve out that exception to the Fourteenth Amendment," Gordon said.

Louisville School Board lawyer Francis Mellen Jr. responded by arguing that the program has effectively maintained the desegregation that was achieved after a court order started the process in the 1970s. "This case presents a story of a board of education that has replaced a desegregation decree with a student assignment plan that works."

Justices David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and John Paul Stevens to a lesser extent, also seemed determined through their questioning to salvage the argument in favor of race-conscious school programs. Souter, for example, pointed out that the only harm Seattle or Louisville students suffer because of the race factor is that they might not get to go to their first-choice schools. But unlike university affirmative action programs that might result in qualified white students not gaining admission, the elementary and secondary schools will still educate all students in the district. "The principal benefit is the education, not the choice of schools," Souter said.

But Harry Korrell, who represented the Seattle parents who challenged that city's program, said the use of race as a factor "strikes at the heart of the equal protection clause, which commands that government treat people as individuals, not simply as members of a racial class."

The only sign from Kennedy that he might not rule out all uses of race came when he repeatedly asked whether a school board could choose the site of a new school with the goal of achieving racial balance in light of residential demographics. Korrell said if racial equality was the sole goal, it would be unconstitutional. But he allowed that if race was just one of several factors, it might be permissible if analyzed in the same way the Court has handled race-based redrawing of voting districts.

Solicitor General Paul Clement argued that "in the real world," race is rarely the only factor in such decisions, implying that they could be permitted if other factors predominate. Clement participated in both cases, arguing against the use of race. He said race-neutral means are still available to school boards to achieve a racial mix, adding that "the lesson of history" is to oppose racial classifications by local school boards.

Silent during the entire two hours was Justice Clarence Thomas, the Court's only African-American member. In past rulings and speeches, Thomas has made it clear he opposes affirmative action and thinks it stigmatizes blacks. He has also argued that black students don't necessarily get a better education just because white students are in their midst.

At one point late in the arguments, Thomas leaned forward as if to start asking a question or making a comment, but he apparently thought better of it and leaned back again, allowing the clock to run out on arguments in what could be the most important civil rights cases in years.

Court Hears Cases On Schools And Race (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Supreme Court deliberations are private, but yesterday's oral arguments on whether it is constitutional to allow school systems to use race in making school assignments became as much a public debate between the divided justices as a questioning of lawyers.

And after two hours, it seemed to reflect a court majority highly skeptical of the proposition that the benefits of racially diverse public schools can justify any restriction on an individual's constitutional right to equal protection.

"You're characterizing each student by reason of the color of his or her skin," Justice Anthony Kennedy told a lawyer representing the Seattle school board. "And it seems to me that that should only be, if ever allowed, allowed as a last resort."

The ultimate decision is likely to be one of the most defining of the court headed by the new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr., and a powerful statement about where the nation stands more than 50 years after Brown v. Board of Education demanded an end to segregated schools.

The court, encouraged by the Bush administration, has grown increasingly distrustful of racial classifications, and it reached out to take up the cases challenging schools in Seattle and Louisville even though appeals courts had upheld them as constitutional.

Because of the stakes, the day at the court took on a feeling of great import -- there were demonstrations on the plaza out front, some people camped overnight in freezing temperatures to secure a spot in the courtroom, and the lines for members of the bar began forming before dawn. More than 50 organizations weighed in with supporting briefs, mostly on the side of the school boards.

With the departure of Sandra Day O'Connor, Kennedy is seen as the justice mostly likely to depart from his normally conservative outlook. His active questioning of lawyers representing the school boards, who have been sued by white parents whose children were denied their first choice of schools, was the most closely watched.

He noted that even the Bush administration, which intervened on behalf of the white parents, said in its brief that "school districts have an unquestioned interest in reducing minority isolation," but it added that only if it were achieved by "race-neutral means."

"Isn't it odd jurisprudence where we have an objective that we state in one set of terms but a means for achieving it in another set of terms?" he asked Solicitor General Paul D. Clement.

But he also repeatedly questioned the constitutionality of allowing a school system, especially one that has remedied past discrimination, to make school assignment decisions based "solely on skin color." Kennedy seemed to disapprove of the school boards' argument that students weren't being harmed because they still were getting school placements.

"You know, it's like saying everybody can have a meal but only people with separate skin can get the dessert," he said.

In the cases at issue -- Parents Involved in Community Schools Inc. v. Seattle School District and Meredith v. Jefferson County (Ky.) Board of Education-- both systems offer parents and students a choice of schools, partly to achieve a level of integration that wouldn't otherwise be possible because of racially segregated housing patterns.

Both set goals for white and minority representation at schools and, along with other factors, made decisions about school assignments based on a student's race. The previous time Seattle used the system -- it has stopped because of the litigation -- about 100 minority students and 200 white students didn't get their first choice.

The Louisville-Jefferson County plan was implemented after the school system emerged from a 25-year desegregation plan overseen by the federal courts. The goal was to maintain the racial integration it had achieved.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg noted that the federal government was now challenging a system it had once championed.

"What's constitutionally required one day gets constitutionally prohibited the next day," she mused. "That's very odd."

Along with the other liberal justices -- John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Stephen G. Breyer -- she seemed to agree that a limited use of race to maintain a more integrated system should be sanctioned.

It set up an interesting debate among the justices in which the liberals argued for a deference to local officials who have found a system that for the most part their constituents like, and conservatives arguing for the strict color-blind protections of the 14th Amendment.

Roberts noted that in segregated school systems, students were also guaranteed a spot, but "because they were assigned to those seats on the basis of race, it violated equal protection."

Ginsburg responded that questioning whether using racial criterion to achieve integration "is the same as segregation, it seems to me is pretty far from the kind of headlines that attended the Brown decision."

Justices Reconsider Race-based School Admissions (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday explored the question of how far districts can go in ensuring diverse public schools, hearing cases from parents in Louisville, Ky., and Seattle who argue it is wrong to use race as a factor in assigning students to schools.

At issue is whether students can be denied admission to their top choice of public school and assigned elsewhere in order to keep the schools racially mixed.

Attorneys for the school districts argued race is just one of several factors taken into account and usually isn't the main factor. But they said without the plans it would be very difficult to prevent more schools from being segregated by choice or by reflecting the racial makeup of the neighborhood.

"Ultimately, we'd have a resegregated school system," said Francis Mellen Jr., who represented the Louisville schools.

Louisville's schools followed a systemwide federally mandated desegregation plan for 25 years and the board ultimately decided to keep much of it in place. Mr. Mellen said it is a success story that has support from both black and white parents.

Lawyers challenging the programs, including a representative from the Justice Department, said a racially diverse school is a fine goal, but there are ways to achieve it without using what amounts to unfair racial quotas.

"This strikes at the heart of the Equal Protection Clause [of the 14th Amendment], which commands that government treat people as individuals, not simply as members of a racial class," said Harry Korrell, who represented a group of Seattle parents.

The court's more liberal justices seemed to have no problem with using race to keep schools mixed and said the plaintiffs' thinking simply doesn't compute. "It's very hard for me to see how you can have a racial objective, but a nonracial means to get there," said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Conservative justices -- including Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr., the court's two newest members, appointed by President Bush -- did not seem thrilled with the programs.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who could be the deciding vote, said the Seattle program, which applies to high school students, seems to be saying that "everybody can have a meal," but only some people get "dessert," since certain students are denied access to schools they want owing to their race.

Mr. Korrell said that happened to about 300 Seattle high school students, both black and white.

Michael F. Madden, representing the Seattle school district, argued that the students aren't being denied admission; rather, the seats are simply being distributed. But Justice Roberts said, "The decision to distribute, as you put it, was based on skin color and not any other factor."

Rulings in the cases are expected to be handed down by the end of June.

Repeated reference was made yesterday to a 2003 case in which the Supreme Court OK'd a law school affirmative-action program at the University of Michigan.

Mr. Madden said it is hard to compare the Seattle case, since it doesn't deny one student a better education than another student. "This is not like being denied access to a state's flagship university," he said.

Outside of the court, Theodore M. Shaw, director of the NAACP's Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said that if the court rules against these programs "it will be a reversal of historic proportions."

He said Justice Kennedy was especially "active" in the questioning and is usually difficult to convince on desegregation cases.

Court Appears Likely To Bar School 'Racial Balancing' (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court justices, hearing arguments on school integration, signaled today that they are likely to bar racial guidelines for assigning students to the public schools.

Such a ruling would deal a blow to civil rights lawyers and to school officials nationwide who had hoped to maintain a semblance of classroom integration in cities whose neighborhoods are divided along racial lines.

It would be a major victory for those who have called for "color blind" decision-making by public officials.

At issue today were the integration guidelines adopted by the schools boards in Seattle and Louisville, Ky. They were challenged by parents of the small number of students, most of them white, who were denied their first choice in schools because of race.

All the justices who spoke up during the argument agreed that racial integration is a laudable goal. However, a narrow majority of them, in comments and questions, said the Constitution forbade shifting children from one school to another based on their race.

"Outright racial balancing is patently unconstitutional," said Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a centrist who often casts the deciding vote. "And that seems to be what you have here," he told the lawyer defending Seattle's program, whose guidelines gave "nonwhite" students first choice for enrolling in its most popular, predominantly white high schools.

Agreeing with Kennedy, Chief Justice John G. Roberts said, "The purpose of the equal protection clause is to ensure that people are treated as individuals rather than based on the color of their skin."

No students have been excluded from school because of their race, responded Michael Madden, the school board's lawyer. They may be assigned to a "different [but] basically a comparable school."

"Everyone got a seat in Brown as well," replied Roberts, referring to the landmark decision that struck down racial segregation. "But because they were assigned to those seats on the basis of race, it violated equal protection."

Madden disputed the comparison between forced segregation and voluntary integration. "Segregation is harmful" to students, while integration "has benefits," he said.

Achieving racial diversity "is certainly an admirable goal," said Justice Antonin Scalia. "Even if the objective is O.K., you cannot achieve it by any means whatsoever.... I thought one of the absolute restrictions [in the Constitution] is that you cannot judge and classify people on the basis of their race."

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. also skeptically questioned the school lawyers. Justice Clarence Thomas, though he said nothing today, has always insisted that public officials may not treat individuals differently because of their race.

Until today, civil rights lawyers held out hope that Kennedy — and perhaps Roberts — might vote to uphold the local school boards that pursued voluntary school integration. But both made clear that they believe explicitly that race-based plans cannot stand.

School Desegregation Faces Big Test (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In twin cases that could define the 21st-century meaning of Brown v. Board of Education, the Supreme Court weighed arguments for barring local school boards from voluntarily adopting race-conscious integration plans.

Both sides in the cases claim to be asking for a modern-day interpretation of the Brown decision, the landmark 1954 ruling that abolished official segregation in public education. The cases pit parents challenging race-conscious enrollment plans, who say Brown forbids any consideration of race, against an education establishment that argues that the legacy of American segregation requires continued efforts to foster integration.

At stake, education officials say, are hundreds of integration plans voluntarily adopted by school boards from Lynn, Mass., to St. Petersburg, Fla.

With four justices seen as likely to oppose such programs, and four others as likely to find them constitutional, the focus was on Justice Anthony Kennedy. In comments yesterday, Justice Kennedy suggested discomfort with race-conscious school assignments, regardless of their assertedly benign purposes.

Justice Kennedy appeared to accept the idea that government sometimes can factor race in its decisions, such as considering the racial composition of various neighborhoods when considering sites for new schools, so they would draw a diverse enrollment. But programs that classify specific individuals by race are "perilous," he said.

One case that came before the court yesterday involved Seattle, a city that never suffered official segregation and whose enrollment policy allows students to select any of 10 high schools. When a particular school has more applicants than seats, officials use several tiebreaking factors -- including race -- to attain an enrollment that roughly mirrors the citywide student population. Whites account for 40% of the population, with blacks, Asian-Americans, Hispanics and Native Americans making up the remaining 60%.

The second case came from Louisville, Ky., which once ran a dual school system that reserved some campuses for whites, others for blacks. A 1975 federal court order imposed mandatory busing to desegregate the schools. A judge dissolved the order in 2000, finding the schools had been successfully desegregated.

Local authorities, seeking to maintain integrated campuses, decided to continue the desegregation policy, which aims to keep black enrollment at each school between 15% and 50%. As a whole, the system's enrollment is 34% black.

A parent group in Seattle and a white parent in Louisville sued in the two respective cases, contending that racial classifications violated the 14th Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. Federal appeals courts disagreed, and the parents, backed by the Bush administration, petitioned the Supreme Court.

A half-century ago, the Brown decision set in motion an aggressive, court-driven effort to root out segregation in public schools. In that case, a unanimous Supreme Court stunned the nation by declaring "separate educational facilities...inherently unequal," and thus unconstitutional. A generation of court-ordered busing to desegregate black and white student enrollment followed, a contentious policy that drove some white families to suburbs from cities in an effort to avoid participation.

But with official segregation a fading memory, the justices have confronted the more difficult question of when government can consider race for purportedly beneficial purposes and not to cure state-mandated discrimination. The court's precedents call for strict scrutiny of race-conscious polices to ensure that they are "narrowly tailored" to achieve a "compelling governmental purpose."

The court has struck down government contracting programs that gave an advantage to minority-owned businesses. But in 2003 it upheld race-conscious criteria at the University of Michigan law school, because "attaining a diverse student body" was a compelling interest.

The dynamics were different yesterday. Not only were the institutions elementary and secondary schools rather than universities, but the author of the 5-to-4 Michigan decision, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, has been replaced with Samuel Alito. Like Chief Justice John Roberts, Justice Alito worked as a lawyer in the Reagan administration, which strongly opposed most programs that took account of race. At yesterday's arguments, the two new justices seemed to hew to those views, as did Justice Antonin Scalia. Justice Clarence Thomas, who by custom never speaks at arguments, consistently has opposed race-conscious programs.

The court's four more liberal members suggested that U.S. society still bears the legacy of the nation's history of racial discrimination and that school officials should be free to craft enrollment policies to promote diversity. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg observed that in 1975, Louisville officials had been forced to accept a desegregation plan, but after the court order was lifted, decided "it's worked rather well, so we'll keep it." How can "what's constitutionally required one day" be "constitutionally prohibited the next day?" she said. "That's very odd."

But the Louisville schools' attorney, Francis Mellen, said prior official segregation was irrelevant to his argument. "We stand on the same footing as the Seattle district, as a unitary district," he said in reply to a question from Chief Justice Roberts.

A decision is expected by the end of the court's term, in June.

Separately, the justices declined to hear a petition from R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. to toss out a lawsuit from a longtime smoker.

Outside, A 'Fight For Equality' (WP)

By Keith L. Alexander

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Chanting slogans and waving signs, thousands of demonstrators -- mostly high school and college students and teachers -- gathered yesterday on the steps of the Supreme Court to support the use of race in programs to maintain school integration.

Demonstrators from as far as California, along with students from Washington area high schools and universities, braved the breezy, 40-degree weather and gathered on the court steps as early as Sunday night to protest a case that the demonstrators said could reinstitute school segregation. Then, holding signs saying "Fight for Equality" and chanting "by any means necessary," they marched down Independence Avenue for a rally at the Lincoln Memorial.

Inside the court, the justices considered arguments in the case, which challenges school diversity programs that take into account the race of students. The demonstrators agreed with attorneys for schools in Seattle and Louisville, who argued that race remains a necessary tool.

On the steps of the memorial, student leaders defended affirmative action policies in public schools and demanded school improvements. Three busloads of students from the District's Ballou Senior High School called for better facilities.

"We want better computers," said Brenda Bell, 15, a Ballou sophomore. "No dripping ceiling. We have broken water fountains. We have mice. Our schools should be as nice as schools everywhere else in this city."

Charles J. Ogletree Jr., a Harvard Law School professor and one of the organizers of the march, said the biggest difference between yesterday's demonstration and previous marches was the role of teenagers and young adults.

"Young people were leading this effort to preserve opportunities for the children of tomorrow," Ogletree said. "This wasn't the usual suspects. It was the youth who saw this as such an important effort that they had to mount this movement. And they did so in a very impressive way."

Organizers estimated that as many as 5,000 demonstrators gathered outside the Supreme Court, but the number declined as the day wore on. By the time the march reached the steps of the Lincoln Memorial at noon, about 1,000 remained.

Students wearing paraphernalia from Howard University, Hampton University, the University of Michigan, Morehouse College, Clark Atlanta University and other colleges raised their fists and chanted, "Give kids good schools."

About 30 students from Hampton University left their campus in Hampton, Va., at 5:30 a.m. on a chartered bus to arrive in time for the demonstration. "We wanted to support the cause and make sure our voice was heard," said Hampton student Dominique Green, 18.

Dozens of people camped out on the steps of the Supreme Court to be among the 50 or so members of the general public to receive tickets to hear the arguments in the courtroom. Anurima Bhargava, 30, an NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund lawyer, said she and her mother, Ranjana, 60, arrived at 9:45 p.m. Sunday and waited through the night, wrapped in sleeping blankets, to get tickets for the arguments for her father, Vijay.

At one point, the steps between the Lincoln Memorial and the Reflecting Pool were transformed into a church scene. Speaker Rodney Jeremiah Reynolds, a freshman at Yale University, said he hoped that one day the nation would not need affirmative action, "but that day has not come yet."

Supreme Court Justices Face New Arguments On Desegregation, Racial Preferences (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 5, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Demonstrators in favor of racial preferences and bearing "Fight For Equality" placards descended on the Supreme Court Monday as justices prepared to hear fresh arguments in cases testing when race may be used as a basis for assigning students to public schools.

The cases could produce the most important decisions on school integration in the U.S. in decades.

Parents in two cities are challenging school assignment plans that factor in a student's race in an effort to have individual school populations approximate the racial makeup of the entire system. Federal appeals courts have upheld both programs.

On the sidewalk in front of the Supreme Court, hundreds of demonstrators marched to dramatize their issue. A parent-teachers group from Chicago and several civil rights groups were among those sponsoring the demonstration.

Demonstrators chanted "Equal education, not segregation" and "We won't go to the back of the bus, integration is a must." Some held signs that read "Stop racism now."

"It's ridiculous to separate us. We worked hard to get everyone together. Why separate us now?" said Jade Johnson, 15, a Washington high school student. Johnson said she came to the demonstration instead of going to school because the issue is important and affects the whole country.

The school policies in contention are designed to keep schools from segregating along the same lines as neighborhoods. In the Pacific coast city of Seattle, only high school students are affected. The plan in another city, Louisville, Kentucky, applies systemwide.

"The plan has prevented the resegregation that inevitably would result from the community's segregated housing patterns and that most likely would produce many schools that might be perceived as 'failing,'" the Seattle school district said in its brief to the high court.

The Bush administration has taken the side of the parents who are suing the school districts, much as it intervened on behalf of college and graduate students who challenged racial preferences policies known as affirmative action before the Supreme Court in 2003.

In 2003, the court upheld race-conscious admissions in higher education in a 5-4 opinion by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor, however, has since retired and been replaced by conservative Justice Samuel Alito. Lawyers on both sides of the issue presume that Alito is inclined to oppose the school plans.

About 400 of the 15,000 U.S. school districts are under court orders to desegregate. It is believed that hundreds more voluntarily take race into account.

There are no firm figures, although the Pacific Legal Foundation said up to 1,000 districts voluntarily use race as a factor in school assignments, drawing boundaries, deciding where to locate new buildings and in other ways. The foundation opposes race-based policies.

Stop Discriminating By Race (USAT)

By Douglas Kmiec

In a phrase often cited to show the Supreme Court's disdain for racial preference, Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote in a 1995 ruling (quoting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor): "At the heart of the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that government must treat citizens as individuals, not as components of a racial … class."

The Seattle and Louisville school districts have not honored this basic precept of equality. Excluding students from a desired public school on the basis of race is as wrong today as it was in 1954 when the court decided Brown v. Board of Education. Treating students as "white" or "non-white" statistics should be unanimously rejected.

The supporters of racial balancing are not the descendants of Brown, which desegregated public schools, but of Plessy v. Ferguson, which upheld the pernicious "separate but equal" doctrine in the late 19th century. Just as the Plessy majority obtusely asserted that if separation meant inferiority it was only because the minority chose "to put that construction upon it," so too the advocates of today's rigid ratios of white and non-white students can see no harm. The harm, however, is palpable. And it is to all races, since it indulges the ugly stereotype that skin color determines thought and action.

Race may be an aspect of our personal lives for good (racial pride) or ill, and diversity in viewpoint is attractive in educational settings. That is why the Supreme Court allowed public universities in Grutter v. Bollinger (2003) to consider race along with other factors in admissions decisions. But the court was adamant: Racial balancing is always unconstitutional. The school districts violated that principle, and worse. Seattle's differentiation of white from non-white, for example, lumps together those of African, Asian, Latino or Native American heritage. When a student declines to disclose racial ancestry, the schools use "visual inspection." Admission by skin pigment is not academic diversity.

It is speculated that the usually collegial, and often unanimous, court led by Chief Justice John Roberts might divide sharply on this one. It shouldn't. The moral authority asserted by Earl Warren to banish race stands foursquare behind his young, articulate successor. The way to end racial discrimination is to stop discriminating by race — not to invite and embed the practice in the decision-making of thousands of schools.

52 Years Later, Integration Faces New Supreme Court Test (USAT)

Since the historic 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education began dismantling separate schooling for black and white children, the Supreme Court has spent a half-century painstakingly working out a fair way of making America's classrooms more racially diverse.

The results can be seen nearly everywhere you look. African-Americans head major companies. The two most recent secretaries of State are black. A vibrant, educated black middle class has sprung up, and colleges actively seek black students to enrich their campuses, expanding that middle class further.

So it was ominous Monday to hear Supreme Court justices sounding hostile to voluntary — and popular — desegregation plans in Seattle and Louisville. If the justices rule them unconstitutional, the tenuous advance of equal opportunity could be undermined or even reversed.

As with anything involving race, the system of desegregation and affirmative action that has evolved under the court's watchful eye is controversial. Whites sometimes feel slighted, and it is whites who brought the Seattle and Louisville cases to court.

Both cities assigned students to schools in part to ensure that the schools are racially diverse, and parents whose children were temporarily denied admission to the schools they preferred sued, claiming racial bias.

Lower courts ruled against them, and just a year ago, the issue seemed settled. The court refused to hear a challenge to a desegregation plan in Lynn, Mass., that is similar to the Louisville plan.

But then Justice Sandra Day O'Connor retired and was replaced by Justice Samuel Alito, who civil rights advocates fear is the crucial fifth vote to undo the two plans — and others in hundreds of school districts that follow similar guidelines to achieve diversity.

In 2003, O'Connor was the fifth vote in a pivotal 5-4 decision that said the University of Michigan Law School could consider race as a factor in admissions, as long as there was no explicit quota for admitting black applicants. The court noted that diversity promotes “cross-racial understanding and the breaking down of racial stereotypes” and gives students invaluable skills that “can only be developed through exposure to widely diverse people, cultures, ideas, and viewpoints.”

That is the reason Louisville and Seattle tried to diversify their schools. Another reason was that students in overwhelming black or Hispanic schools consistently underperform.

The plans of both cities are complex, trying to balance family preferences against diversity and other non-racial considerations, but they are widely accepted in those communities, and they work.

But they appear far less popular at the court. Court watchers came away thinking the school diversity plans will be in trouble when the court rules early next year. Justice Anthony Kennedy, the likely swing vote now, said at one point that Seattle's plan seems to hinge in some cases “solely on skin color … it's like saying everybody can have a meal, but only (certain people) can get the dessert.”

More telling was the answer to a question Kennedy asked about what has happened to Seattle schools since the school board suspended the plan after an adverse court ruling in 2001. Kennedy wondered whether the schools had integrated on their own.

The facts should sober him. In 2000, white enrollment at predominantly non-white Franklin High School was 25%; by 2005 it was down to 10%. Without the plan, Seattle's schools have gone backwards. The high court shouldn't lead a charge to ensure similar results around the nation.

Truck Driver Convicted For Deaths In Smuggling Case (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO, The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0102201

HOUSTON (AP) — Now that a jury has convicted a truck driver for his role in the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt, his defense attorneys said they are focused on one thing: sparing him a death sentence.

The federal jury convicted Tyrone Williams on Monday of all 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting he faced for ferrying illegal immigrants during a May 2003 smuggling attempt from South Texas to Houston.

His airtight tractor-trailer was packed with more than 70 immigrants who punched out taillights and screamed for help when the heat inside the tomblike trailer became deadly. Nineteen of the immigrants died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation.

On the 20 death penalty eligible counts Williams faced in his retrial, the new jury found that his actions resulted in the death of a person, sending the trial to a punishment phase. That phase is set to begin Wednesday and last about a week.

Jurors will decide whether Williams should be sentenced to death or up to life in prison.

Craig Washington, Williams' defense attorney, said he plans on presenting testimony from about 20 witnesses. He wouldn't comment on who would testify on Williams' behalf or speculate on what will be key to his case.

"The jury has to decide whether to take another human being's life. So everything is on the table when they do that. And everything about a human being that the jury wants to know to decide whether the person lives or dies is important," said a visibly shaken Washington.

Prosecutors say Williams merits a death sentence because he was responsible for the deaths by not freeing the immigrants or turning on the trailer's air conditioning, which could have saved their lives. Some survivors testified they thought the air conditioning had been turned on.

Prosecutors declined comment on the verdict, but during a court hearing after the jury's decision was read, said they would be presenting 25 to 26 witnesses during the punishment phase and concentrating on how the crime was committed.

Williams had no visible reaction when the verdict was read, but hugged Washington, a former Houston congressman, before being led away by U.S. marshals.

Washington said his client transported the illegal immigrants but wasn't responsible for their deaths because he didn't know they were dying until it was too late. Washington blamed another smuggling ring member for causing the deaths by overstuffing the trailer.

Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop near Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston.

Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen who lived in Schenectady, N.Y., is the only one of 14 people charged in the case who is facing the death penalty.

This was the second time Williams was tried for the smuggling deaths.

Last year, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury couldn't agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the decision, saying the verdict didn't count because the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

The new jury deliberated for more than four days, beginning Nov. 27 and taking a three-day weekend. They returned the verdict after deliberating for about two more hours Monday.

Douglas McNabb, a Houston attorney who specializes in federal criminal defense, said Williams' team of defense lawyers has an "uphill climb" during the punishment phase.

"Primarily the government is going to argue that not only what he did was intentional, but that it was such a heinous offense that the defendant has no redemptive value at all and should be executed," he said.

Trucker Guilty In Migrant Deaths (LAT)

By Lianne Hart, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

The Texas driver could get the death penalty. A trek in his hot trailer was fatal to 19 people.

HOUSTON — A Texas jury Monday convicted a truck driver on all 58 counts against him for his role in the deaths of 19 people during a bungled human smuggling attempt.

Tyrone Williams, 35, faces a possible death sentence or life in prison. The punishment phase of the trial will start Wednesday and is expected to last about a week.

Williams stared ahead and showed no emotion when the verdict was read, but later hugged his lawyer, Craig Washington, before being led away by U.S. marshals.

"I'm deeply disappointed," Washington said outside the courtroom.

Prosecutors declined to comment on the verdict, but told U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal that they expect to call about 25 witnesses during the sentencing trial.

In May 2003, Williams hauled more than 70 illegal immigrants in a sweltering trailer from south Texas to a truck stop near Houston. As temperatures inside the trailer rose, the increasingly desperate riders peeled off their clothes, punched out tail lights for air and shouted for help.

By the time Williams opened the door about 3 1/2 hours later, 17 people had died of dehydration, overheating or suffocation. Two others died later.

Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop and fled to Houston, 100 miles away. He was arrested after walking into a hospital complaining of anxiety.

During the trial, the jury of seven women and five men watched as grieving family members from Mexico, Honduras, El Salvador and the Dominican Republic identified their relatives from grisly photos. One showed a 5-year-old boy who had died in his father's arms.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Rodriguez told jurors that Williams was a "vile and heartless truck driver" who ignored the suffering of the riders.

Williams' lawyers said he didn't know how many people were packed into his trailer, and didn't understand the immigrants' cries for help, which were in Spanish.

Williams' first trial ended in a hung jury in March 2005.

Of the 14 people charged in the case, Williams is the only defendant to face death. His lawyers have said that Williams, who is black, was singled out because of his race.

Trucker Convicted In Deaths Of 19 Illegal Immigrants (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

HOUSTON, Dec. 4 — A truck driver was found guilty of all charges Monday and faces possible execution in the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants who suffocated in his airless trailer in South Texas in 2003.

In a retrial of the nation's deadliest human trafficking case, the federal jury that convicted the driver, Tyrone M. Williams, 35, of Schenectady, N.Y., begins hearing testimony Wednesday on whether to give Mr. Williams the first death sentence under a 12-year-old "alien smuggling" statute or a lesser term of up to life in prison.

The milk trailer, piled with bodies and 55 survivors, was found abandoned at a truck stop near Victoria, Tex., in the early hours of May 14, 2003.

Mr. Williams, a legal immigrant from Jamaica, sat impassively through 58 recitations of "guilty" as the verdict form was read, then embraced his lawyer, Craig A. Washington. Asked afterward how his client had taken the news, Mr. Washington, a former Texas congressman, said, "Better than me."

Mr. Washington, whose trial defense conceded Mr. Williams's role as a smuggler but challenged his awareness of the victims' suffering, said he planned to put on about 20 witnesses to testify about mitigating factors in Mr. Williams's history.

The lead prosecutor, Daniel C. Rodriguez, an assistant United States attorney who had painted Mr. Williams as "vile and heartless," declined to comment until the punishment phase was concluded.

Mr. Williams's first trial ended in March 2005 with an incomplete verdict later thrown out by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. Jurors had found Mr. Williams guilty on 38 of the 58 counts but deadlocked on the others, including conspiracy resulting in death, a charge carrying possible capital punishment. Jurors also could not agree on how to answer questions assessing Mr. Williams's degree of culpability.

Monday's verdict, on the fifth day of deliberations, found him guilty of all 58 counts: conspiracy plus counts of harboring, transporting and transporting resulting in death for each of the 19 victims. The jurors also found him culpable as a principal offender, out for "private financial gain."

Evidence in the trials portrayed Mr. Williams as a milk trucker and sometime drug courier who had been recruited by a smuggling ring to transport 60 illegal immigrants on a similar run from the border about a week earlier and who then took $7,500 to carry a group from Harlingen, Tex., past a Border Patrol checkpoint in Sarita to a waiting van and pickup truck.

But the relief vehicles became stuck at the checkpoint, and Mr. Williams, with the truck's refrigeration turned off, was directed by the smugglers to continue toward Houston.

A companion in the cab, Fatima Holloway, who was traveling along for a drug deal, testified for the government that Mr. Williams ignored the banging of his passengers as they succumbed to airlessness, dehydration and temperatures as high as 173 degrees, finally clawing out a taillight in a desperate bid to breathe.

The first to die, a survivor testified in English, was a 5-year-old Mexican boy who expired in his father's arms, crying, "Daddy, Daddy, I'm dying." Sixteen more people suffocated before Mr. Williams finally halted the truck in Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston, and two more died later in the hospital.

How many were crammed into the 18-wheeler remains unclear. The dead and survivors total 74, but some riders may have escaped when Mr. Williams unlocked the doors.

The jurors asked to review a particularly graphic piece of evidence: a videotape from the Victoria truck stop in which Mr. Williams and Ms. Holloway seem composed while buying 55 bottles of water — just as one of the survivors staggers in pleading for help.

Mr. Williams and Ms. Holloway fled in the cab, and Mr. Williams was arrested later in a Houston medical center where he had sought treatment for stress.

Of 14 defendants charged in the case, Mr. Williams is the 11th to be convicted and the only one to face the death penalty. Seven, including ringleaders of the scheme, have been sentenced to long prison terms, and three are awaiting sentencing. Two had their charges dismissed, and one man is a fugitive.

In the first trial, Mr. Washington raised a defense of racial discrimination, arguing that Mr. Williams, who is black, had been singled out for execution because of his race. Judge Vanessa D. Gilmore pressed prosecutors to explain their reasoning and, when they refused, said she intended to inform the jury.

The Fifth Circuit, in throwing out the partial verdict, ruled racial questions out of the case and, citing Judge Gilmore's heavy schedule, reassigned the case to Judge Lee H. Rosenthal.

In what some legal experts saw as a defense misstep this time, Mr. Williams, apparently against Mr. Washington's advice, declined to concede the identities of the victims, requiring the government to call relatives whose grief-stricken testimony clearly anguished the jury.

First Trial's Juror Says Williams Not Alone (HC)

By Harvey Rice, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 5, 2006

Holdout felt others shared the blame for deaths

One of the jurors in Tyrone Williams' first trial, which ended with a hung jury in March 2005, said he held out to spare the truck driver from a death sentence because he believed others shared responsibility for the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants.

"I couldn't see them giving the death sentence to one person," said Horace Rains, 79, a merchant seaman who lives in east Harris County.

Williams was one of 14 people charged in the failed smuggling attempt that left 19 illegal immigrants dead in the back of a tractor trailer near Victoria in 2003. He is the only one to face a possible death sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0102204

Rains says he and a woman , whose name he could not recall, kept the 2005 jury from reaching a unanimous verdict. His revelation was made possible by U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal's decision to lift a gag order issued by the judge who presided over Williams' first trial.

U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore gave an oral order to jurors at the end of the first trial not to speak with the news media or attorneys after they were discharged.

Story held until verdictGilmore lifted a written gag order in May this year after the case was transferred to Rosenthal, but not the oral order to jurors. The Houston Chronicle asked Rosenthal to lift the oral order and provide a list of jurors because reporters were prevented from interviewing them after the trial.

Rosenthal refused to make the jury list available because of a standing policy by Houston federal courts forbidding the release of juror information. She lifted the gag order, however, and said jurors were free to contact the Chronicle.

Rains contacted the Chronicle after a new jury had heard eight days of testimony in Williams' retrial. The Chronicle delayed publishing the story until the new jury reached a verdict.

The jury found Williams guilty of 58 smuggling counts Monday. The penalty phase of the trial begins Wednesday.

Rains was juror No. 3 in the first trial. That panel failed to reach a verdict on a smuggling conspiracy count, which carried the death penalty, and 19 counts of harboring illegal immigrants.

The jury did find Williams guilty of 38 smuggling transportation counts, 19 carrying a possible death sentence, but failed to answer special questions for each count, including whether Williams had a primary responsibility for the deaths or was an aider and abettor.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that failing to answer those questions amounted to a failure to reach a verdict.

No intentionRains said he and a woman juror refused to answer the special questions because they believed it would have been tantamount to a death sentence.

"That part would have made them give him the death sentence," Rains said. "A lot of them wanted him to get the death sentence."

If the holdouts had voted with the majority, the trial would have gone to a penalty phase in which prosecutors would have to prove Williams deserved the death penalty.

Rains said he supports the death penalty but not for Williams.

"I don't believe he had any intention of letting those people die," he said. "He didn't shut the door. He didn't know how many people were in there."

Rains said Abelardo Flores, the smuggler who recruited Williams and provided key prosecution testimony, was just as guilty.

Flores pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against Williams in return for the prosecution's support of a reduced sentence. He is awaiting sentencing.

Prosecutors Interview Two Shot By Police In Queens (NYT)

By Al Baker And William K. Rashbaum

Prosecutors from the Queens district attorney's office conducted bedside hospital interviews yesterday with the two men wounded in a hail of 50 police bullets that claimed the life of Sean Bell, the first time investigators have heard from any direct participants in the Nov. 25 shooting, a lawyer for the two men said.

In separate interviews, the two men, Trent Benefield, 23, and Joseph Guzman, 31, told prosecutors what their lawyers have been saying publicly for days about the shooting, according to the lawyer, Sanford A. Rubenstein.

The two said that only they and Mr. Bell, who was 23, were in or near the car when the shooting erupted — contradicting accounts from some officers involved that a fourth man was with the group and may have been armed.

Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman also said that the five police officers who opened fire on them did not identify themselves and that they had no idea that they were facing the police, Mr. Rubenstein said. He was one of three lawyers present as a team of assistant district attorneys and members of the district attorney's staff questioned the men in their rooms at Mary Immaculate Hospital.

Richard A. Brown, the Queens district attorney, is gathering facts about the case, which he has said will go before a grand jury.

For days, the Police Department has been seeking a fourth man who officers and a civilian witness quoted by the police say was wearing a beige jacket and who law enforcement officials believe may have been with Mr. Bell, Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman.

One of the detectives who fired, according to a person briefed on his version of events, said the fourth man was in Mr. Bell's car. The civilian witness, who looked down from an apartment window after she heard gunshots, described seeing a man in a beige jacket fleeing the scene, the police said.

Mr. Rubenstein and others, including Charlie King, a lawyer who is representing several men who were in Mr. Bell's bachelor party that morning and who witnessed the shooting, have insisted that the police are wrong. "There was no fourth man in the car or next to the car," Mr. Rubenstein said.

Mr. Rubenstein said Mr. Guzman and Mr. Benefield told prosecutors that the undercover officer who fired the first shots, a 28-year-old six-year veteran of the department, "did not identify himself either through a shield or a verbal command. Period."

As with the back-and-forth over the "fourth man," Mr. Rubenstein's statements served to create a clear line separating the versions of events being given by those close to the wounded men and those close to the police officers. A person briefed on the account of that undercover detective has said that that detective got in front of Mr. Bell's car, pulled out his gun and, with his police badge around his neck, identified himself as an officer.

That detective and the other officers fired after Mr. Bell drove into the detective and an unmarked police van, the police said. The officers suspected that one of the men had a gun, but no gun was later found, the police have said.

Mr. Rubenstein declined to offer further specifics about the officials' questions or his clients' answers. But he said the exchange marked the beginning of his clients' cooperation with prosecutors.

"What's next is for the district attorney to continue his initial investigation, which they are in the process of conducting," Mr. Rubenstein said. "Any witnesses who saw what happened should come forward, either directly to the district attorney's office or contact me, and we will see to it that they get the opportunity to come forward to the district attorney's office."

Kevin Ryan, a spokesman for the district attorney's office, would not discuss details of the interviews.

A law enforcement official involved in the investigation said that as the medical conditions of the two men improve, and the inquiry moves forward, officials expect to speak to them again. "As long as they were medically ready to talk, we want to talk to them," the official said. "Even though we're not setting a deadline, we're going to move expeditiously."

The five police officers who fired the shots have not yet spoken to the police or prosecutors.

"The Internal Affairs Division has conducted inquires and provided all information to the Queens district attorney," Paul J. Browne, the Police Department's chief spokesman, said yesterday when asked about the statements Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman made to prosecutors.

As the investigation moves forward, prosecutors are seeking to gather as much independent evidence as they can — from witness accounts, forensics and ballistics to information about the events leading up to the shootings, including surveillance video from inside and outside the club, phone records and radio transmissions from the officers and other material, the official involved in the investigation has said.

Among other steps prosecutors will take to get ready for their grand jury presentation, they will prepare a detailed timeline, starting at the point where the officers began their tour of duty on the night of Nov. 24 but focusing mainly on the minutes leading up to the shooting and on the shooting itself, according to the official. Some points along the timeline will be firmer than others, set by benchmarks like radio transmissions, cellphone records and other more determinate factors, the official said.

Prosecutors will also put together detailed profiles of each of the officers, the official said.

Michael J. Palladino, president of the Detectives Endowment Association, said he and the president of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, Patrick J. Lynch, met yesterday with Mr. Brown and Jack Ryan, Mr. Brown's chief assistant, for about 30 minutes.

Mr. Palladino said that he wanted to know when the case would be presented to a grand jury and "wanted to come away with a comfort level" that the four detectives and one police officer involved in the shooting "would have a level playing field" in Mr. Brown's investigation.

"Because I think they're entitled to a fair and impartial investigation, and most importantly, they are entitled to due process," Mr. Palladino said.

He said he came away from the meeting with a sense that the five would be treated fairly.

Appearing last night on "Larry King Live," Mr. Bell's fiancée, Nicole Paultre, said that she had spoken to Mr. Guzman and Mr. Benefield in the hospital and that they had believed they were about to be carjacked that morning on the street. "They were afraid," she said.

Ms. Paultre was wearing the wedding ring that Mr. Bell never got to place on her hand. She said that he had been buried with his ring.

"I'm actually, to be honest, not angry," she said. "I'm more just trying to be strong. I just want justice. Me and my family just want justice."

Meanwhile, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, in Florida yesterday, said that while people "have a right to express themselves" about the shooting, he found "disgusting and disgraceful" some demonstrators' signs, which read "Death to Pigs." <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Lauderdale Mayor, Union Call Critics 'Reckless' For Condemning Police Shooting (FLSUNSEN)

By Akilah Johnson, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, December 5, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE -- Standing on the steps of City Hall on Monday, the mayor and police union called the actions of some elected officials and the NAACP "irresponsible" and "reckless" after the fourth fatal shooting by Fort Lauderdale police this year.

The community has rushed to condemn officers Robert Norvis and Todd Hill before the investigation into the Nov. 28 shooting is finished, said Jack Lokeinsky, president of the Fort Lauderdale Fraternal Order of Police.

Norvis, 35, and Hill, 33, tried to stop a stolen Mitsubishi SUV. They opened fire, police said, after the driver put the SUV in reverse and accelerated toward the officers. Driver Troy Eddines was killed and passenger Travis Jackson was wounded.

"Judge incidents after all the facts are ascertained, and not before," Lokeinsky said Monday with a diverse crowd of more than 75 officers standing behind him. "That did not happen in this case. Elected officials have an obligation to attempt to defuse, not incite the community."

That statement came after a chaotic community meeting Thursday at the Mizell Center, where hundreds of residents demanded answers.

On Monday, Mayor Jim Naugle stood among the sea of police blue.

"The posturing of some in the community trying to stir things up, to me, is really wrong," Naugle said of Commissioner Carlton Moore and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "People were acting like something was wrong in this incident, and that is reckless and irresponsible."

Moore, two state legislators and the NAACP called for state and federal investigations into the shooting. The FBI has begun a civil rights investigation.

The NAACP plans to ask federal officials to broaden their investigation and look at all recent Fort Lauderdale police shootings, as well as the department's policies and practices, particularly those concerning use of force.

"When it comes to investigating our own, this department is an open book," Lokeinsky said, adding that Fort Lauderdale has a Citizens Police Review Board.

A grand jury will decide if the shooting was justified, Naugle said. "And the grand jury is the people ... us."

DOJ_NMG_0102207

Moore and Marsha Ellison, president of the Fort Lauderdale branch of the NAACP, said Monday that they are not provoking the public but expressing concerns that exist among northwest Fort Lauderdale residents.

Moore said the police department is a public entity, and the public, therefore, has every right to scrutinize it.

"Are they saying they can't be questioned?" he asked.

One criticism has been that the department seems more concerned with highlighting Eddines' and Jackson's lengthy criminal records instead of figuring out what happened.

Police now are trying to do the same to him, Moore said. A Broward Sheriff's deputy stopped Moore on Sunday when a check of his license plate indicated it was registered to the wrong car, said sheriff's spokesman Elliot Cohen. The stop occurred about 7:50 a.m. in the 600 block of Northwest 27th Avenue.

Turns out, it was the correct license plate, but Moore's driver's license was suspended, Cohen said. Moore was ticketed for driving with a suspended license with knowledge. His license was suspended more than a year ago for failure to pay traffic fines, officials said.

"All of a sudden Carlton is the issue," Moore said Monday. "Anything but the police."

Panel Discusses Atlanta Police Shooting (NSDY/AP)

By Errin Haines, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 5, 2006

ATLANTA -- Civil rights leaders, clergy and city officials met Monday with residents of a northwest Atlanta neighborhood to discuss how to ease tensions between them and police after officers serving a warrant killed an elderly woman at her home.

Many in the audience had questions for Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington, who said he was committed to a thorough investigation into the Nov. 21 fatal shooting of Kathryn Johnston.

"I assure you that we are going to do everything we can to make sure we get to the bottom of this tragedy," Pennington said. "We need to do a lot of healing."

Pennington said he was not able to comment on specifics of the case, which has been turned over to the FBI and Georgia Bureau of Investigation.

Diana Myers, 46, who has lived in the neighborhood for 17 years, called the meeting a farce.

"They didn't answer none of our questions," Myers said. "They didn't say nothing. But our community, we're not letting this go. We have to change our community."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which hosted the meeting, has called for the establishment of a civilian review board with the power to subpoena witnesses and a return to community policing.

Johnston -- who family members said was 92, but was 88 according to the county medical examiner -- was home alone when plainclothes officers burst in, searching for drugs. Police said she opened fire with a revolver, wounding three officers before she was shot.

The officers said they obtained the "no-knock" warrant earlier that day after they said an informant bought drugs at the house from a man who has not been arrested.

The informant later denied buying drugs at Johnston's home and said he was told by police to lie about the incident, according to Pennington. The chief said the informant, who's in protective custody, is a key part of the FBI-led investigation.

Black Lawmakers Set To Take Crucial Posts Face Pressure (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — The impending Democratic takeover of Congress will elevate more blacks to positions of power in the Capitol than ever: 4 major House committee chairmen, as many as 16 subcommittee chairmen, the third-ranking House Democratic leader and a senator considered a credible candidate for his party's presidential nomination.

It is so much power that Representative Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat set to be chairman of the pivotal Ways and Means Committee, said he hesitated to speak about it publicly. "I don't want to scare the hell out of people," Mr. Rangel said, "that blacks are now in charge of the committees and so, therefore, watch out."

While celebrating their rise to prominence, black lawmakers face conflicting pressures from their traditional supporters on one side and the Democratic leaders on the other. Many African-American lawmakers represent poor, predominantly black districts created to ensure black representation under voting rights laws. Their safely Democratic seats have helped them rise in seniority ahead of colleagues from more politically heterogeneous districts. Many lean well to the left of the Democratic caucus as a whole.

Traditional party allies like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and some members of the Congressional Black Caucus say they expect their newly powerful champions like Mr. Rangel, 76, to push a long-stalled agenda that includes hearings or a commission on reparations for slavery, guaranteeing voting rights for convicted felons, prohibiting racial profiling by police or customs officers, restricting gun sales, and sharply increasing the compensation paid to people displaced by Hurricane Katrina.

But like other leaders of the larger Democratic caucus, the black lawmakers are being cautioned to be mindful of a broader audience that includes voters in Republican-leaning swing districts, where those initiatives can be politically perilous. And black lawmakers say they feel pressure to appeal to a broader audience because their names and faces often appear as emblems of their party's liberalism in what they consider racially tinged campaign appeals by their opponents.

"It's going to be a delicate balance for the chairmen," said Representative Melvin Watt, the North Carolina Democrat who is chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus. "They want to be progressive in their agenda, but they don't want the public to react negatively to what they are doing, because they know you are leading up to a 2008 presidential election." (Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who is black, could be a presidential candidate.)

Mr. Watt and others emphasized that the Democratic leadership had already embraced some black caucus priorities, like raising the minimum wage and increasing education subsidies. But the black caucus is still preparing its own agenda of items left off the Democratic leadership's program for the first 100 days of the new Congress, including more aid for the victims of Hurricane Katrina, many of whom were black.

The number of African-Americans in Congress has grown to 43 from just 13 at the founding of the Congressional Black Caucus in 1969. But although the 2006 election elevated some caucus members to prominence, it did not add to the group's numbers. Its 43 members still make up less than 10 percent of the House and 1 percent of the Senate. By comparison, blacks make up about 13 percent of the population.

The previous high mark for black power in Congress was in 1993-4, when three blacks served as chairmen of less significant House committees, said David Bositis, a researcher at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, an African-American research and policy group. In addition, Carol Moseley Braun of Illinois, the second black senator since Reconstruction, was elected in 1992.

Many black lawmakers maintain that since then Republican partisans have often played to the racial animosities of some white voters by focusing attention on the black lawmakers who would be committee chairmen if the Democrats controlled the House. Republican speeches and other appeals often emphasized that Mr. Rangel would take over the Ways and Means Committee and that Representative John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, at 77 the dean of the black caucus, was in line to lead the Judiciary Committee.

Weeks before the midterm elections, the Republican strategist Mary Matalin told The Washington Post that the party was seeking to "hammer home what a Pelosi-Rangel-Conyers House would really mean," linking the two black members to Representative Nancy Pelosi, a liberal white Democrat from San Francisco in line to be House speaker. Black lawmakers say the Republican attacks usually fail to mention their white liberal counterparts like Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin, soon to be chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Richard A. Viguerie, a conservative direct mail pioneer, said the political liability was not the lawmakers' race but the impression that the Democrats were "a party of special interests."

"With the feminists, the homosexual groups, the other interest groups, you put it all together with the black interest groups and it does not look like America," Mr. Viguerie said, predicting that the theme would "get pounded" in conservative talk radio and other outlets during the next Congress.

"We have to be very careful," said William Lacy Clay Sr., a former Democratic representative from Missouri who was a founding member of the Congressional Black Caucus and chairman of the postal committee before the Republican takeover in 1994. (His son, William Lacy Clay Jr., now holds his seat.) "You can bet your life we do not live in a color-blind society," the elder Mr. Clay said.

Some lawmakers, though, said the Democratic victories this year showed that racially charged attacks were losing their edge. "It didn't work," said Representative Bennie Thompson, 58, a Mississippi Democrat who is set to be chairman of the Homeland Security Committee.

Mr. Thompson said he would not shy away from potentially controversial measures intended to undo the effects of discrimination, including ensuring that a part of domestic security contracts went to firms owned by African-Americans and other minorities, that contractors hired members of minority groups, that research money went to historically black colleges, and that border security officers did not single out travelers on the basis of race or ethnicity.

Representative William Lacy Clay Jr. said black lawmakers should not get distracted by the concerns of the larger Democratic caucus. "We need to stay focused as a caucus on the people who sent us there," Mr. Clay said, "and remember we are the black caucus."

Mr. Conyers, who has sponsored a bill creating a commission to study the idea of reparations, and Representative Juanita Millender-McDonald, a 68-year-old California Democrat who is set to lead the House Administration Committee, both declined to discuss potential agendas until the caucus formally selected the new chairmen.

Mr. Rangel, however, said he was conscious that as Ways and Means chairman he would be accountable to a different constituency, including what he called "wannabe Democrats" — moderate freshman elected in Republican-leaning districts.

So instead, Mr. Rangel said, he will advocate policies to help the disadvantaged of all races, which could help blacks as well. "When God hit with Katrina, she didn't give a damn about color at all," he said, "but she sure did give the poor people a hard road to travel." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Pioneering Fire Chief Fights For Her Job Amid Lawsuits (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

CHICAGO, Dec. 4 — Two years ago, when Bonnie Bleskachek was named fire chief in Minneapolis, it made news far beyond Minnesota because she was the first openly lesbian firefighter to achieve that rank in the professional fire service of a major city.

Hailed as a pioneer, Chief Bleskachek was showered with praise for her years of hard work. Perhaps no one was more pleased with the appointment than Mayor R. T. Rybak, a supporter of gay rights who made the promotion a media event.

But last Wednesday, it became clear that everything had changed. Citing a lack of confidence in Chief Bleskachek's management style, Mr. Rybak asked the City Council to fire her.

The move was made after suits were filed against the city and Chief Bleskachek that accused her of playing sexual politics, retaliating against a former partner, acting as a lustful predator and showing bias against at least one heterosexual male firefighter.

"All of that information has been presented to us in great detail," Mr. Rybak said. "I have to be honest. I very much wanted Bonnie Bleskachek to succeed."

Chief Bleskachek says that she did succeed and that is precisely why she is entangled in such a case.

"Being an out lesbian, which the mayor really wanted to push, the first openly lesbian fire chief, made me an easy target," she said. "The sharks smelled blood in the water."

John A. Klassen, an employment lawyer representing the plaintiffs in three of the four suits against Chief Bleskachek, rejected that argument.

"None of these cases are antilesbian," Mr. Klassen said. "These cases are about discrimination."

He added, "It's unfortunate that someone who could have been a beacon" for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender people "was engaging in what everybody views as stereotypically male harassment behaviors."

The suits, including one by a former partner of Chief Bleskachek, depict a firehouse culture where lesbians and their allies enjoyed favors and people who crossed them risked punishment.

Chief Bleskachek said the complaints were nonsense, calculated to prey on some of the public's worst fears about gay men and lesbians in power. Of her accusers, she said, "They knew it would be tantalizing and salacious and that the City Council would run, turn tail and run the other way."

The city has settled or is in the process of settling three suits for modest sums. That, Chief Bleskachek, said, angered her most of all.

"I wanted to have my day in court, to be deposed, to force these people to produce some proof," she said. "It's a devastating blow to my career, my reputation, my everything."

The Minneapolis Fire Department had made strides in dismantling barriers to women and minorities, being held up as a model. It was widely considered one of the best places in the country to work as a firefighter, particularly for women.

The national average for women in firefighting agencies is 2.5 percent; in Minneapolis, 71 of 435 members, or 16 percent, of the Fire Department are women.

Last year, the department was first in the country for the number of women in the ranks, according to Women in the Fire Service, an advocacy group in Madison, Wis.

It was not always that way. In the late 1970s, the department was sued over a lack of diversity. It remained under federal oversight until 2000, when it was clear that a lack of diversity was no longer a problem.

Some credit goes to Chief Bleskachek, 43 supporters have said. In 1996, she was a co-founder of the Minnesota Women's Firefighter Association, helping prepare women for firefighting careers and offering professional development to women who sought leadership posts.

Minneapolis has not decided whether the department still has a place for Chief Bleskachek, but she said she wanted to be part of it.

"I've worked too hard for years," she said. "If I'm such a terrible manager, if I'm such a bad leader, where are the red flags in my past? The only thing I can come up with is that this is a whole lot of homophobia and sexism."

A plaintiff, Firefighter Jennifer Cornell, is a former partner of Chief Bleskachek. They share custody of the chief's two children.

Firefighter Cornell said in court papers that Chief Bleskachek, out of vengeance and pride, nullified the results of a test for promotion to battalion chief on which she performed well because Chief Bleskachek's current partner, also a firefighter, did not pass.

Another plaintiff, Firefighter Kathleen Mullen, had been a friend of Chief Bleskachek for years, until the chief started dating Capt. Mary Maresca, who used to go out with Firefighter Mullen.

Firefighter Mullen passed the first part of the battalion chief's test, only to have the remainder of the test canceled. She said the results were thrown out to prevent her promotion and in retaliation for not approving of Chief Bleskachek's current relationship.

Chief Bleskachek said that a panel of city officials had found some test questions flawed and that she had stopped the entire test.

The two cases were settled. Firefighter Cornell had sought $300,000. She received $69,000 and a guaranteed promotion. Firefighter Mullen received a backdated promotion and $29,000.

After the first two suits were filed, a third firefighter, Kristina Lemon, filed a legal complaint stating that 10 years ago Chief Bleskachek pursued an unwanted romantic relationship with her. After being spurned, Firefighter Lemon said, Chief Bleskachek used her increasing power over the years to penalize her.

In the complaint, Firefighter Lemon described a loud argument when Chief Bleskachek demanded that she admit romantic feelings. At another time, Firefighter Lemon said in the complaint, Chief Bleskachek told her that she had "sexual dreams" about her.

"The defense for that is pretty simple," said Jerry Burg, a lawyer for Chief Bleskachek. "It didn't happen. These two people haven't talked in 10 years, and Kristina is making it up."

Firefighter Lemon's case is in the final stages of settlement, said her lawyer, R. Daniel Rasmus. He would not discuss the terms.

A fourth suit was filed against Chief Bleskachek and her current partner, Captain Maresca, by Firefighter Elondo J. Wright, who says he suffered discrimination because he is not gay and not a woman. The federal case is in the early stages.

In his complaint, Firefighter Wright said that he was called a home wrecker after joining an all-female crew headed by Captain Maresca and that he was denied opportunities for advancement. He also said he saw the women "behaving in a physically inappropriate manner" while on duty at the firehouse, where they had adjoining rooms.

Captain Maresca declined to comment.

Amid the accusations less than a year after her reappointment to a second term, Chief Bleskachek said her head was spinning.

"It's been brutal," she said. "I still feel like I'm recovering from shock." <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Minneapolis Likely To Oust Lesbian Fire Chief (WP)

By Kari Lydersen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Two years ago, Minneapolis, known for its civic diversity and tolerance, made national headlines for naming Bonnie Bleskachek the first openly lesbian fire chief of a major U.S. city.

Now city officials are cringing in the face of four lawsuits filed against her.

The city has settled two lawsuits with women firefighters who allege that sexual favoritism on Bleskachek's part stunted their careers in the department. A sexual harassment suit from a third female firefighter and a gender discrimination claim from a male employee are pending.

Last week, city officials were briefed on an investigation being conducted by a local law firm into Bleskachek's performance as chief. After the briefing, Mayor R.T. Rybak announced that a proposed deal that would have given Bleskachek severance pay and demoted her within the department is off the table. Instead, the city may move to fire her from the force, pending the completion of the investigation.

"The only thing decided is a broad consensus from the mayor and City Council that she be removed from the fire chief position," said Rybak's spokesman, Jeremy Hanson.

Bleskachek, 43, is furious that the city has settled the lawsuits rather than taking them to trial, where she could have told her side of the story.

"They have no evidence at all; this is all based on conjecture and hurt feelings," she said, in her home in a pleasant, modest south Minneapolis neighborhood.

There is no doubt the Fire Department is rife with personal dramas and romantic entanglements. One of the lawsuits against Bleskachek was filed by Jennifer Cornell, 35, the chief's ex-partner of six years, who shares custody of their two children. Another suit was brought by Kathleen Mullen, 43, a longtime friend who had dated Bleskachek's current girlfriend.

A third complaint is from a woman who says Bleskachek flirted with her and then punished her professionally after she declined the advances. Bleskachek counters that the firefighter, Kristina Lemon, was the one who professed attraction to her a decade ago and that she became angry when Bleskachek disciplined her last year for a physical altercation with another firefighter in a burning building.

In February, Cornell and Mullen were the only ones to pass the first portion of a test to promote two employees to battalion chief. Shortly afterward, Bleskachek and several other department officials scrapped the test and left the two positions vacant. Mullen and Cornell charge that the move thwarted their careers and was taken because Bleskachek's current partner, Mary Maresca, had failed the test.

Bleskachek said that the test had been hastily prepared and that officials were shocked that even after a preparatory college class, only two out of 13 firefighters passed. "The test was flawed," she said. "There were questions with more than one answer and ones that were poorly written."

In September, the city settled with Cornell for $65,000 and Mullen for $29,000. Mullen was retroactively promoted to battalion chief, and Cornell was promised a promotion within two years.

"Both of those women had a lot to lose by suing the city and would only have done it if it was absolutely necessary," said John A. Klassen, the attorney for Cornell, Mullen and Elondo Wright, 39, a black male firefighter who recently filed a civil rights lawsuit against Bleskachek, Maresca and the city.

Wright's lawsuit alleges that he was harassed after he was transferred to an all-female fire company overseen by Maresca in 2002. He says Maresca forced him to train long hours late into the night while other firefighters were relaxing, and he alleges that from 1999 to 2005, women supervisors gave him 86 informal disciplinary write-ups, while four male supervisors gave him a total of four. Bleskachek was Maresca's supervisor at the time.

"We're battling the public perception that where there's smoke there's fire," said Bleskachek's attorney, Jerry Burg. "But Bonnie was really a small player in the story of Elondo Wright."

The Minneapolis Fire Department had no women firefighters until 1986, though it was under a federal consent decree to increase diversity. When Bleskachek joined in 1989, she said women faced constant harassment by men.

She is credited with aggressively recruiting women and co-founding the Minnesota Women Fire Fighters Association, which helps women prepare for the entrance test. The national group Women in the Fire Service says 70 of the 447 Minneapolis firefighters are female, the highest percentage of any major department in the country.

Even Bleskachek's critics admire her firefighting and management skills.

"She's a very bright, competent individual who train-wrecked her career by letting personal relationships and abuse of her office cloud what could have been an enormously promising career," Klassen said.

Tom Thornberg, president of Minneapolis Fire Fighters Local 82, said union members are grateful to Bleskachek for convincing the city to establish minimum staffing levels, which it had never had.

National and local gay rights groups declined to comment on the situation but said Minneapolis is considered a leader in gay rights. Klassen says pride in this reputation backfired.

"The city's desire to hold itself out as a diverse, accepting community plays a role in this whole tragedy," he said. "The mayor didn't really look at his candidate well enough to see if she could handle it."

Md. Court Urged To Toss Out Ban On Gay Marriage (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

An attorney for 19 gay and lesbian Maryland residents urged the state's highest court yesterday to strike down a law banning same-sex marriage, saying there is "no constitutionally sufficient justification" for denying his clients and their children protections that only marriage affords.

During an hour-long argument in a crowded chamber of the Court of Appeals in Annapolis, attorney Kenneth Y. Choe of the American Civil Liberties Union invoked the civil rights struggle and said the ability to marry is a fundamental right that belongs to all Marylanders, not only to those for whom that right has always been recognized.

"Despite the fact that plaintiffs have formed committed relationships and loving households, the state excludes them and their children from the numerous important protections that come with marriage solely because the person whom they love is a person of the same sex," he said.

On behalf of the state, Assistant Attorney General Robert A. Zarnoch urged the court to let stand the statute that defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman. Arguing that the judiciary should defer to the legislature, Zarnoch noted that no federal or state appellate court in the country has held that, as the plaintiffs argue, there is a fundamental right to same-sex marriage.

"An invalidation of Maryland's law would have the unfortunate consequence of placing these issues outside the arena of public debate, outside the legislative and democratic process," Zarnoch said.

The court took the case after the state appealed a ruling by Baltimore Circuit Court Judge M. Brooke Murdock, who held in January that the 1973 law banning same-sex marriage is discriminatory and "cannot withstand constitutional challenge." In anticipation of an appeal, Murdock stayed her decision when she announced it.

With Murdock's ruling, Maryland was thrust deep into a debate that has raged across the country at least since 1996, when Congress passed a law barring federal recognition of same-sex marriages and allowing states to do the same.

Massachusetts alone recognizes same-sex marriage, but several states and the District allow domestic partnerships or civil unions that offer some of the rights of marriage.

Plaintiffs, activists on both sides and legal observers packed the wood-paneled courtroom in Annapolis yesterday in what was one of the court's most well-attended sessions in recent memory. The potential audience was wider still; the court began a webcast of its proceedings Thursday.

The judges asked few questions, and little hint of their leanings could be detected. Judge Dale R. Cathell was notably vocal during Choe's presentation, when he interjected five times -- once to ask whether in some instances the proper function of the court was, as Zarnoch had suggested, to defer to the legislature.

Later, on the steps of the courthouse, the legal abstractions faded as the plaintiffs described the protections they do not have because their relationships are not legally recognized: inheritance and adoption rights, decisions about life support, hospital visitation.

Patrick Wojahn, a disabilities lawyer, said his partner, Dave Kolesar, a broadcast engineer, had experimental brain surgery some time ago. Wojahn worried that he might not be able to ride in an ambulance if Kolesar's medical condition recurred and he had to be taken to a hospital.

"We just want to have the security to know that if something happens to him, or to me even, we will be able to be there for each other," Wojahn said.

Among those on the steps was RoseMarie Briggs of the Family Leader Network, a national lobbying organization that backs a constitutional amendment prohibiting same-sex marriage. She said children who are raised "in the home with their married mother and father in a low-conflict marriage" are more likely to succeed in school and to avoid such social hazards as illegal drug use.

"Our laws should reflect what is best for children, not what is best for adults," she said.

In court, Zarnoch argued that the disputed statute is "gender-neutral" because it does not benefit or burden one sex more than the other.

He also argued that gay men and lesbians do not constitute a "suspect class," a designation applied to racial minorities and other groups that have faced discrimination and are held to be deserving of special protections under the law.

Such classes, Zarnoch said, are typically politically powerless. By contrast, he said, "in Maryland, we have openly gay legislators who, in fact, are legislative powerhouses in leadership."

Choe disputed that, saying that if gays and lesbians were politically powerful, they would have been able to achieve their aims through the legislature rather than in court.

For And Against Same-Sex Marriage At Maryland's Highest Court (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Dec. 4 (AP) — The state has no rational basis for denying same-sex couples the fundamental right to marriage, a lawyer for plaintiffs in a gay-marriage case told Maryland's highest court on Monday.

A lawyer for the state argued that Maryland's 1973 ban on same-sex marriage did not constitute gender discrimination because it applied equally to men and women and that the question on same-sex marriage should be decided by the legislature.

"There is no fundamental constitutional right to same-sex marriage," said the lawyer, Robert Zarnoch, counsel to the General Assembly.

DOJ_NMG_0102214

Nine same-sex couples and a gay man whose partner is dead filed a lawsuit in 2004 against court clerks who denied their applications for marriage licenses. In January, Judge M. Brooke Murdock of the Circuit Court for Baltimore struck down the law defining marriage as a union between one man and one woman, and the state immediately appealed.

The highest court, the Court of Appeals, gave no indication of how it would rule.

Kenneth Choe, an American Civil Liberties Union lawyer who argued on behalf of the plaintiffs, said they were not trying to undermine the religious institution of marriage. Instead, they are seeking the ability to make medical decisions for one another and to provide legal and financial stability for themselves and their children.

Mr. Choe's argument centered on whether the state had a rational basis to deny same-sex couples the right to marry. "It is not enough that there is a reason for including the included class," he said. "There must also be a reason for excluding the excluded class."

"The state could grant right-handed people but not left-handed people the right to marry simply by observing that marriage benefits right-handed people and their children," he said.

In his rebuttal, Mr. Zarnoch argued that such a statute would be "wholly arbitrary," but that the same-sex marriage ban was not. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

State, ACLU Square Off Over Same-sex 'Marriage' (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- Lawyers for the state of Maryland yesterday said there is no constitutional right for same-sex "marriage," but advocates for homosexuals argued that marriage is a fundamental right for all state residents.

"There is no fundamental, constitutional right to same-sex marriage," Robert A. Zarnoch, an assistant state attorney general, told the state Court of Appeals.

Kenneth Y. Choe, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, said that state law should not exclude homosexual couples from "marrying" because they have "committed relationships and loving households."

"Fundamental rights belong to all Marylanders," Mr. Choe said. "They do not belong only to those who have historically enjoyed them."

The seven-member Court of Appeals -- the state's highest court -- heard arguments in a lawsuit brought by nine same-sex couples and one homosexual man seeking to "marry." The court is expected to issue a ruling in weeks.

The lawsuit challenges a 1973 amendment to the state constitution that defines marriage as a union only between one man and one woman.

Representing the state, Mr. Zarnoch said the lawsuit seeks to redefine the law and the institution of marriage. He recommended that the court allow the legislature to settle the issue.

"The General Assembly is the proper venue to weigh these issues," said Mr. Zarnoch, adding that if the court were to redefine marriage, it would have "the unfortunate consequence of placing these issues outside the area of public debate."

The state's case rests largely on the original intent of the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the state constitution and on the authority of the legislature to change laws.

Enacted in 1972, the ERA was created to eliminate discrimination against men or women based on sex.

The lawsuit aims to include "sexual orientation" under the term "sex."

However, the state made clear that the lawmakers who passed the ERA specifically did not want homosexual "marriage" to be allowed under the statute.

High courts of several other states have ruled that their ERAs do not cover sexual orientation and cannot be used to justify same-sex "marriage."

Mr. Choe of the ACLU said the court should not let the legislature decide the matter and asked the judges not to "capitulate."

Judge Dale R. Cathell took issue with Mr. Choe's characterization.

"I don't equate due deference to the word capitulation ... . This court doesn't have a history of capitulation," Judge Cathell said, drawing laughter from the packed courtroom.

The state is appealing a ruling in favor of the plaintiffs issued in January by Baltimore Circuit Court Judge M. Brooke Murdoch.

Judge Murdoch ruled that maintaining traditional marriage "is not a legitimate state interest" if it discriminates against homosexuals.

Voters in 27 states, including seven in the most recent election, have opted to define marriage in their state constitutions as a union only between a man and a woman.

Last month, Arizona became the first state in which residents voted against a ban on same-sex "marriage."

In July, five state courts and one federal court issued rulings upholding traditional marriage laws similar to those in Maryland. Only Massachusetts allows same-sex "marriages."

Outside the courthouse after the hourlong hearing, Delegate Don Dwyer Jr. told reporters he would try again to put the marriage issue to the voters in the coming legislative session.

Mr. Dwyer, Anne Arundel County Republican, has failed to win enough support for the measure in the Democrat-controlled legislature in the last few years.

Before Mr. Dwyer addressed reporters, the 19 plaintiffs stood behind Mr. Choe and Dan Furmansky, executive director of Equality Maryland, a homosexual lobbying group.

"The only truth that really matters today is the truth that is love, the love of these couples behind me," Mr. Furmansky said. "They love each other very, very, very much."

Mr. Zarnoch disagreed. "You can't just change the state family law overnight on a court decision," he said.

U.S. Panel Rejects Plan For Paper Ballots (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

GAITHERSBURG, Md., Dec. 4 (AP) — A federal advisory panel rejected a recommendation on Monday that states use just voting machines whose results could be independently verified.

The panel, drafting guidelines for the United States Election Assistance Commission, deadlocked, 6 to 6, on a proposal that would have required electronic machines to produce paper records or other independent means of checking results. Eight votes were needed to pass the recommendation.

The resolution, proposed by Ronald Rivest, a computer scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, closely mirrored a report that warned that paperless voting machines were vulnerable to errors and fraud and could not be made secure.

Some opponents of the proposal said that they supported paper records but that the requirement could overwhelm state election boards.

Congress created the panel after the counting problems in 2000. The meeting on Monday was at the National Institute of Standards and Technology, which is advising the panel on technology. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Federal Panel Rebuffs Guidelines That Insist On A Paper Trail (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

A federal advisory group rejected a measure yesterday that would have discouraged states from using electronic voting systems that lack an independent means of verifying their results, according to a spokeswoman for the National Institute of Standards and Technology.

Members of the Technical Guidelines Development Committee, a group created by Congress to advise the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, deadlocked 6 to 6 on the proposal at a meeting held at the NIST headquarters in Gaithersburg. Eight votes are needed to pass a measure on the 15-member committee.

NIST spokeswoman Jan Kosko said the proposal was introduced by Ronald Rivest, a computer science professor at MIT who heads a subcommittee on transparency and security.

Rivest told committee members that software errors in paperless machines could go undetected, leading to a situation in which "an election result is wrong and you have no evidence to show that it's wrong."

Committee member Brit Williams, a computer scientist who has conducted certification evaluations of Georgia's paperless electronic voting system, opposed the measure. "You are talking about basically a reinstallation of the entire voting system hardware," he said.

Five states -- Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland and South Carolina -- use machines without a paper record exclusively. Eleven states and the District either use them in some jurisdictions or allow voters to chose whether to use them or some other voting system.

The proposal was based on draft recommendations developed by scientists at NIST, who said in a document released last week that voting machines that do not produce a paper record of each vote "cannot be made secure."

The committee is beginning to prepare technical guidelines that the Election Assistance Commission is expected to adopt next year but that would not be implemented until 2009 or 2010. The guidelines are not binding, but many states require election officials to use voting systems that meet national criteria.

Echoing the work of the NIST scientists, Rivest's proposal suggested guidelines that reject systems "in which the correctness of the election results is dependent on the correctness of the software."

Utah, Using Olive Branch, Tries To Add Seat In House (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

SALT LAKE CITY, Dec. 4 — The State of Utah and the District of Columbia are perhaps the oddest imaginable political allies in a nation of polarized partisan loyalties, alike in few things other than bankable predictability: Washington Democratic, Utah Republican.

But they share outrage that each does not have more influence in Congress, and Utah took a big step toward a marriage of convenience Monday when legislators here approved a plan that would give the state a fourth Congressional seat before the next census and Washington its first voting representation ever.

The plan by Utah, which was denied a fourth seat after the 2000 census because the government did not count thousands of residents who were away serving as missionaries for the Mormon Church, faces big hurdles.

Still, the gulf of political difference between the state and the District is the very glue that offers both of them some hope Congress will give its required approval: one of the newly created seats would almost certainly be Democratic, the other Republican, with no net change in the balance of power.

Both sides also express hope that the measure can be adopted in the current lame-duck session of Congress, though time is running short.

Even here, the idea has its opponents, who cite the constitutional provision that reserves Congressional representation for the states.

But as the voting neared on Monday, Republicans, who have overwhelming control of the Legislature, urged their members to stay focused on what Utah would get from the bargain. What Congress does or does not do for Washington is not Utah's business, they said.

"Our purpose here today is really just to substitute one map for another," said Representative David Clark, a Republican who sponsored the measure on the House floor, where it passed by 51 to 19 after clearing the Senate earlier in the day on a vote of 23 to 4.

A spokesman for Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., a Republican, said he would sign the bill.

Advocates for the District exulted.

"It's great news for Utah, great news for D.C.," said Ilir Zherka, executive director of DC Vote, a nonprofit group that works for Congressional representation.

“We’ve been able to keep an unusual coalition together,” Mr. Zherka added. “This is the most momentum this issue has had in 30 years.”

Backers of the Congressional bill that would adopt the idea, enlarging the House to 437 members from its current 435, said they hoped the action by Utah would add momentum and lead to approval in the final days of the current Congress.

But both houses are expected to adjourn by the end of the week, and House leadership aides of both parties said Monday that it was very unlikely the bill would make it to the House floor before then. It is not even currently on the floor schedule, they said.

If the legislation stalls, the new Democratic majority could resurrect it after taking control in January. But the Democrats want to make certain that any changes in the Congressional boundaries do not threaten Representative Jim Matheson, the party’s lone lawmaker from Utah.

Democrats in the Legislature said they saw no such problem: if the plan is adopted, Mr. Matheson’s new district will be heavily concentrated in the area of Salt Lake City, where the party is strong.

Despite the overwhelming backing for the measure, some legislators here continued to see it as wrongheaded and perhaps unconstitutional.

One Republican who voted no, Representative Julie Fisher, noted the state’s rapid population growth and its expectations for the next census, saying, “We will get our seat anyway in 2010, without selling short our nation’s most revered document.” <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Utah Redistricting Brings D.C. Closer To Vote (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

D.C. officials yesterday cheered the Utah Legislature's approval of a redistricting map that is key to the District's voting rights bill, saying the development brings city residents one step closer to having a vote in the House.

"I do think we can move this bill," said D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat who co-sponsored the D.C. Voting Rights Act. "The main problem is time."

Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty, who met with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi last week and discussed the bill's prospects, said that Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, told him she would move aggressively for the bill.

"I remain optimistic that the bill will move this week," said Mr. Fenty, a Democrat. "And if it doesn't, I'm hopeful it will be at the top of the legislative agenda in 2007."

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Mrs. Pelosi, said the bill would be a priority for Democratic lawmakers if introduced again next year.

The Utah Legislature yesterday approved a map dividing the state into four congressional districts. The redistricting map was required by lawmakers to move the Voting Rights Act proposal, which has been put forward by Mrs. Norton and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican.

The plan would give the largely Democratic District a seat in the House and add a fourth seat for largely Republican Utah. It also would expand the House permanently from 435 to 437 members.

But the chances of the measure making it out of the House Judiciary Committee and through both chambers of the Republican-controlled Congress before lawmakers adjourn this month are shrinking.

The bill was not on the House floor schedule issued last week, although bills can be added to the docket.

A House senior leadership aide said yesterday there had been "zero discussions" about bringing the bill to the floor this week.

And an aide for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said the chances of the bill passing the Senate this session are "rather slim" because the squeezed time frame doesn't allow for much debate.

Mrs. Norton also said some House Republicans have suggested changes to the bill beyond the Utah redistricting. But she remained hopeful that the measure could move forward.

"We can't do the impossible, but we can certainly keep pressing for this bill as long as this session is still alive," Mrs. Norton said. "Even with all the uncertainty, we're not willing to throw in the towel."

If lawmakers fail to pass the bill before the current session expires, Mr. Davis is expected to reintroduce it immediately after the next session begins Jan. 4.

David Marin, a spokesman for Mr. Davis, said the bill's supporters are holding out hope that it will be introduced this week.

"There are a lot of calls going around to a lot of very influential people," Mr. Marin said. "We're still optimistic."

D.C. Vote, a nonprofit advocacy group, is expected to visit congressional offices today in an effort to have the bill brought to a vote.

Ilir Zherka, executive director of the group, said he expects about 60 advocates to visit about 80 congressional offices, using yesterday's vote in Utah as momentum to have the bill heard this year.

"It's definitely still an uphill battle," Mr. Zherka said. "The effort in Congress is to do as little as possible and get out, and our effort is to add things to their list. This bill is still in the mix."

Without Further Delay (WP)

THE PEOPLE of the District of Columbia shouldn't have to wait another minute, let alone another month, to get the full voting representation in government that is their due as Americans. A bill to give the District a vote in the House of Representatives is pending, but for reasons that are as unclear as they are unacceptable, it may not be brought to a vote. Instead of idly watching the hours tick down in the final days of a generally useless legislative year, the 109th Congress should muster the political will to right a 200-year-old wrong.

A significant step was taken yesterday with the Utah legislature's approval of a redistricting plan that carves out an extra congressional seat for the fast-growing state. The resourceful proposal to give the District a voting seat hinges on balancing it against an additional seat for Utah, which just missed qualifying for one more legislator after the last census. The House would increase in size by two, to 437; because it's presumed that Utah voters would elect a Republican and District voters a Democrat, party politics are neutralized. Now that Utah's political leaders have agreed on the shape of a redistricting map, they may prod the Republican leadership to take action.

Some might argue that a lame-duck Congress shouldn't enact far-reaching reform. But this bill has been four painstaking years in the making. It enjoys widespread bipartisan support, and there is no organized opposition to it. Indeed, how could there be? Legal scholars of all political persuasions have testified to its soundness and, as Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said, "It's hard to make a straight-faced argument that the capital of the free world shouldn't have a vote in Congress." If President Bush would like to argue against democracy for the District, he should do so openly; otherwise he should openly support this bill. The same goes for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

That the bill got this far is a testament to Mr. Davis and his partnership with Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), the District's nonvoting delegate in the House. If the bill languishes this year, Mr. Davis has vowed to make it the first bill he introduces in the new Congress. But that carries risks. Will the Republicans who signed on this year stay committed? Will Democrats balk at the seat for Utah? New questions mean potential new delays. All the while D.C. residents continue to pay federal taxes and go off to war without a say in making policy.

That's fundamentally wrong. That's why the 109th Congress couldn't come up with a better ending than one titled "The District of Columbia Fair and Equal House Voting Rights Act of 2006."

House To Consider Abortion Anesthesia Bill (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

DOJ_NMG_0102219

In a parting gesture by social conservatives before Republicans relinquish control, House leaders plan to bring up a bill tomorrow that would declare that fetuses feel pain and require abortion providers to offer pregnant patients anesthesia for their unborn child.

The scheduled vote may be the last on abortion-related legislation for years. That's because Democratic leaders hope to avoid confrontations over hot-button social issues that divide their caucus, and focus instead on military and pocketbook issues.

But Republicans and antiabortion activists signaled yesterday that they intend to press hard on social issues, even those that failed to gain traction during GOP control, to separate moderate-to-conservative Democrats from their more liberal leaders.

"The Democrats are facing an interesting situation because they ran to the right in this election," said Wendy Wright, president of the conservative group Concerned Women for America. "They promised one thing to America with their campaigning. The question is, will they live up to that image? Running and hiding is not a solution."

Democrats are shying from the fight. Party leaders in the House have declared tomorrow's decision "a vote of conscience" and will not try to sway the outcome. House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) does not plan to speak on the bill, a rarity for her.

The fetal pain bill is coming up nearly as an afterthought, in the final week of a lame-duck session of Congress. House Republican leaders are using expedited procedures to bring it to a vote, meaning it will take a two-thirds vote of the chamber to pass. Its supporters are setting expectations low.

"Hopefully, we get a majority," said Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.), the bill's author. "Two-thirds is hard on anything, except if it's a post office."

Even if the bill can muster a two-thirds vote, it cannot pass the Senate before Congress adjourns.

But social conservatives see an opportunity to test Democrats' evolving position on abortion, a position that has become more amenable to incremental curbs on ending pregnancies and more vocal about reducing the number of abortions. Under Republican control, Congress passed a ban on the late-term abortion method called "partial birth" abortion by its foes and passed the Unborn Victims of Violence Act, which increased penalties for crimes that harm a fetus.

At first blush, the Unborn Child Pain Awareness Act would seem to be anathema to abortion rights groups. It requires abortion providers to tell a woman whose pregnacy is 20 weeks past fertilization "there is substantial evidence" that the fetus will feel pain during the procedure -- a point hotly debated among physicians and pain specialists.

The woman would then have to sign a form accepting or declining anesthesia for her fetus. Some medical groups interpret the language to mean that the fetus would have to have an application of anesthesia separate from the mother's, a procedure that many abortion clinics are not capable of providing.

Even the bill's definition of pregnancy -- beginning at the moment of fertilization, rather than at implantation in the uterus -- is problematic to some abortion rights groups, since it would legislatively establish that some forms of birth control induce abortion by blocking implantation after fertilization.

Backers of the bill have framed it as a common-sense extension of existing state laws that mandate that patients receive information about abortion procedures before giving their consent.

"This is just a compassion piece of legislation to take informed consent to the level it should be at," said Rep. Phil Gingrey (R-Ga.), an obstetrician and antiabortion conservative.

While the measure has provoked strong opposition from Planned Parenthood and the National Abortion Federation, NARAL Pro-Choice America, perhaps the nation's leading abortion rights group, has stayed neutral.

"Pro-choice Americans have always believed that women deserve access to all the information relevant to their reproductive health decisions. For some women, that includes information related to fetal anesthesia options," Nancy Keenan, NARAL's president, has said in a statement on the bill.

Democratic leaders cited NARAL's position when they decided against trying to influence the vote. Democratic leadership aides said yesterday that they are leery of Republicans charging that they are already out of touch with mainstream values, even before they assume power.

Citing those divisions, the National Right to Life Committee's Douglas Johnson dared Democrats to vote against the bill. If it passes the House, Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) will try to pass it in the Senate by a unanimous voice vote.

"Somebody will object," Johnson said. "We want to know who that person is."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

'Without honor'

Yesterday, when we called on John "Jack" McDermott, who supervised the Watergate investigation as special agent in charge (SAC) of the FBI's Washington Field Office, he was awaiting a scheduled visit from a Hollywood screenwriter.

The big question now is whether Hollywood will listen.

"Tom Hanks has already paid Mark Felt's family for the rights to write the screenplay on 'Deep Throat,' and I can only surmise that they will only be willing to proceed with this if Hanks were planning on projecting Felt in a heroic manner. You don't make too many films about the devil," Mr. McDermott tells Inside the Beltway.

"Our aim is to see if we can inject some degree of perspective in this thing," he says. "So I plan to accommodate them by making myself available for the sole purpose to get the proper slant on this thing -- projected in a way consistent with accuracy. You try to save what you can -- keep this from becoming historic revisionism."

Mr. McDermott makes no secret of his disdain for former FBI Deputy Director W. Mark Felt, who after decades of secrecy has conceded to being "Deep Throat." The retired SAC has charged that Mr. Felt's repeated leaks to the press not only compromised the Watergate probe, but placed witnesses in jeopardy.

"[A]ll other arguments seeking to justify Felt's actions are trash," says Mr. McDermott, handing this column yesterday a three-page, unpublished summary he has written surrounding Mr. Felt's secret role in Watergate.

"Felt was the bureau's Benedict Arnold," Mr. McDermott opines. "Having been entrusted with the highest levels of military command by [Gen. George] Washington and his staff, Arnold betrayed his oath, his country and his fellow citizen-soldiers to pursue his own ambitions. Felt did no less to the bureau and his fellow agents.

"Let's not fool ourselves," he says. "The bureau's reputation for faithfulness and unselfish devotion to duty has been seriously diminished by this foul episode."

Mr. McDermott acknowledges having "long admired most of Tom Hanks' work product," however, the retired SAC is concerned that the Hollywood actor and director is "sold" on a belief that "Deep Throat" is a champion of truth that otherwise would have been suppressed, rather than a cowardly bushwhacker, disloyal to his fellow agents and his oath of office."

He concludes that "some have called Felt a hero; but heroes don't lurk in the shadows for 33 years. ... The man is without honor."

Mr. McDermott retired in September 1979 as the FBI's deputy associate director.

Spoken by Spanish

Rob Toonkel, director of communications for U.S. English Inc., called our attention yesterday to a new Zogby International poll finding that 65 percent of Hispanics favor making English the official language of the United States.

He says the results of the poll of 903 Hispanic adults "challenges the long-standing claim that Hispanics generally oppose official-English measures. "

"Friday the 13th of April, 2029, could be a very unlucky day for planet Earth," according to the article penned by David Noland. "At 4:36 a.m. Greenwich Mean Time, a 25-million-ton, 820-foot-wide asteroid called 99942 Apophis will slice across the orbit of the moon and barrel toward Earth at more than 28,000 miles per hour.

"The huge pockmarked rock, two-thirds the size of Devils Tower in Wyoming, will pack the energy of 65,000 Hiroshima bombs -- enough to wipe out a small country or kick up an 800-foot tsunami. On this day, however, Apophis is not expected to live up to its namesake, the ancient Egyptian god of darkness and destruction. Scientists are 99.7 percent certain it will pass at a distance of 18,800 to 20,800 miles. We will have dodged a cosmic bullet. Maybe."

Mr. Noland points out that NASA "is taking a wait-and-see attitude."

FCC May Ask Commissioner With Conflict To Break Tie On AT&T-BellSouth Merger (USAT)

By Paul Davidson, Usa Today

USA Today, December 5, 2006

Moving to break a deadlock over approval of AT&T's (T) purchase of BellSouth (BLS), the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission said he will ask a recused commissioner to cast the tie-breaking vote.

For nearly two months, the FCC has been split 2-2 along party lines, with Democrats Jonathan Adelstein and Michel Copps pressing for tough conditions on the $80 billion deal, which would create the nation's largest phone company.

The impasse has forced three postponements of votes on the merger and talks broke down again Friday over Democrats' demands for non-discrimination assurances for AT&T's broadband traffic and reduced wholesale prices.

In a letter to congressional leaders Friday, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who favors no conditions on the deal, said he will ask fellow Republican Robert McDowell to break the stalemate.

McDowell disqualified himself because he previously worked as a lobbyist for a trade group that opposed the deal. Martin told lawmakers a recused commissioner may be authorized to vote if the government's interests outweigh any ethical concerns. He said he has asked the FCC general counsel to determine if McDowell may vote.

Enlisting McDowell could "spark various ethical/legal complaints" and a political ruckus with leaders in the new Democratic-controlled Congress, Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin said in a report.

The FCC hopes to clear the deal at its Dec. 20 meeting, before the new Congress takes over in January. Levin predicted McDowell would "seek some sort of compromise" but would lean toward Martin's view.

In a statement, Copps said "taking a mulligan by starting over with (McDowell involved) would create more problems than it resolves" and "short-circuit discussions."

Recent talks broke down partly over Democrats' efforts to prevent AT&T's DSL broadband service from offering faster downloads to websites that pay higher fees. AT&T agreed not to prioritize traffic on a portion of its network, rather than throughout its network, say people with direct knowledge of the discussions.

AT&T also bristled at demands for binding arbitration to settle disputes over the wholesale prices it charges rivals to lease its network for business services.

AT&T has been more receptive to Democrats' requests to charge lower prices for its stand-alone broadband service, say people with knowledge of the discussions. As a condition of the AT&T-SBC merger, the company agreed to offer DSL without also requiring customers to buy AT&T phone service. That way, consumers could choose a rival Internet-based phone service, such as Vonage. But competitors have complained that AT&T's pricing gives consumers no incentive to buy standalone DSL. AT&T says its prices are competitive.

To win FCC approval for its acquisition of BellSouth, AT&T has offered other concessions, such as $10-a-month DSL service for 30 months and expansion of its broadband service in rural areas. Such offers may be withdrawn if McDowell joins the discussions.

FCC clearance is the final regulatory hurdle for the deal, which has been approved by the Justice Department and 18 states.

'Rubber-Stamp' Inference Riles Federal Judge At Telecom Merger Hearing (LAW)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, December 5, 2006

Fireworks in a Washington, D.C., courtroom don't necessarily signal bad news for two telecommunications mergers under review by a federal judge, but they may portend a battle over merger law.

On Nov. 30, District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan heard the latest round of arguments in his review of the mergers between Verizon Communications Inc. and MCI Inc., and SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., which the Department of Justice approved in 2005.

Sullivan, months into a congressionally mandated review of the merger, was taken aback when Verizon's lawyer bluntly suggested the judge had little power to unwind the deals.

"This merger is not going to be unscrambled by anything this court does," senior Verizon lawyer John Thorne told Sullivan.

The startled judge -- who has repeatedly said he intends to conduct an independent review and "won't be a rubber stamp" for the government -- nearly came off the bench. Leaning forward, he glared at Thorne and asked the Verizon attorney to explain his opinion of the judge's authority and the importance of the Tunney Act proceeding.

Thorne, who is well-versed in antitrust law, replied, "If a transaction is largely good, it should close."

Sullivan's irritation aside, Thorne's view of restricted judicial authority is shared by many antitrust experts.

Thorne concluded that anti-competitive issues posed by a merger, which in this case resulted in the telecoms being ordered to let competitors lease lines into some 700 buildings in about a dozen markets, can be dealt with after a deal closes through the Tunney Act process.

Continuing to glare at Thorne, Sullivan said, "Maybe Congress should make it clear that mergers couldn't close until there has been judicial review," he said.

As Thorne finally sat down, Sullivan said, "I'm going to do an independent review and we'll see where the merger stands at that point."

Despite Sullivan's tough words, other antitrust experts say the judge, in fact, has little power to rewrite the Justice Department's two merger approvals.

In merger cases where DOJ predicts anti-competitive harm and negotiates divestitures or other remedies with the merging parties to resolve the problems, the agency must submit any remedies for approval by a federal judge. The Tunney Act, a law enacted in the 1970s and amended in 2004, mandates that process.

The current Tunney Act proceeding is the first subjected to hearings since the Congress moved to strengthen the law two years ago.

DOJ's practice has been to allow mergers to close prior to the Tunney Act hearings. In many cases, including the two telecom mergers now under judicial review, the agency does not require execution of the divestitures until the Tunney process concludes.

In most merger cases, DOJ simultaneously files with a district court the complaint outlining the competitive harms as well as the negotiated consent decree spelling out the proposed remedies.

Most of the time, in what has been characterized as a rubber-stamp process, judges quietly approve the consent decree.

But for all Sullivan's concern, he is left with two choices. He can decide that the required divestitures are in the public interest, and enter an order approving them, or he can decide they are not sufficient.

If he rules against the remedies, DOJ would go back and reconsider their options, DOJ lawyer Claude Scott told the court. Should that happen, the divestiture requirements could be dropped, eliminating the need for any further court action.

"I know you don't have to file anything," in these cases, Sullivan told Scott. In an effort to introduce a little levity, he grinned. "Are you sorry you did? Just kidding."

If the DOJ decided to appeal the decision, as at least one lawyer arguing against the deal predicted, the matter would shift to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where the chief judge is Douglas Ginsburg, a Reagan appointee and a former assistant attorney general for antitrust at DOJ. Depending on how far Sullivan goes, Ginsburg and other judges on the appeal court panel could see the Tunney Act process as infringing on prosecutorial discretion, according to a lawyer who requested anonymity.

"And that might not be the best thing for consumers," because without the Tunney Act, it's not clear why divestitures are required to protect consumers, the lawyer said.

In the AT&T and Verizon mergers, however, trade groups for rivals of the big telecommunications companies have vociferously opposed the remedies, arguing that in fact the mergers themselves should never have been approved.

In court, Justice Department lawyers have gone out their way to avoid the rubber-stamp analogy while still arguing that Sullivan's role is limited to judging whether the remedies are sufficient to fix the mergers' perceived harm to competition.

"You do have a role in looking at this remedy," Scott said when Sullivan queried him after the exchange with Thorne.

Sullivan, however, has repeatedly said he isn't sure he is limited to just determining whether the remedy fits the harms alleged in the complaint.

Therein lies the rub, according to antitrust lawyers watching the case. While the Tunney Act does allow judicial scrutiny of the remedy, the decision of whether to require any divestitures is a matter of prosecutorial discretion that lies with the antitrust regulators.

As in the case of AT&T Inc.'s subsequent purchase of BellSouth Corp., DOJ found no anti-competitive harm, and consequently that deal didn't require any judicial review. Sullivan noted that and queried whether DOJ's decision not to impose conditions on the BellSouth deal was intended to avoid another Tunney act review.

"The government chose not to file a complaint in a case that was on the heels of this case," Sullivan said to Scott. "Does this alter the landscape"?

Scott said no.

So far, Sullivan, a Clinton appointee, has conducted public hearings, ordered DOJ to produce nonpublic documents, and allowed lawyers for the diverse opponents, such as industry groups CompTel and AcTel, and even the New York State Attorney General's office, to review and comment on the matter.

During the hearing, Sullivan said he might hold an evidentiary hearing before issuing his ruling.

Kentucky Congressman Raises Concerns About Delta Merger (LOUBIZ)

Louisville (KY) Business First, December 5, 2006

Kentucky congressman Geoff Davis is encouraging the U.S. Attorney General and Transportation Secretary to conduct a "full and careful review" of US Airways' efforts to merge with Delta Air Lines.

In letters dated Dec. 1, Davis told both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Transportation Secretary Mary Peters that he is "very concerned about the significant loss of competition and the likely impact on air fares this merger could create."

"The tremendous overlap of the route networks of these carriers would cause significant consolidation, reducing flight choices and increasing already expensive fares for our consumers," he wrote. "This potential merger affects thousands of jobs, and Delta/Comair has an economic impact for our region in the billions."

Atlanta-based Delta (Pink Sheets: DALRQ) operates its second-largest hub at the Cincinnati/Northern Kentucky International Airport in Hebron, Ky. That hub, which also contains the headquarters of Comair, Delta's regional carrier subsidiary, employs an estimated 10,000 people and has an economic impact of nearly $4 billion, according to a news release issued Monday by Davis, a Boone County Republican representing Kentucky's Fourth District.

"We feel that Delta and its employees, through extraordinary sacrifice and hard work, are making tremendous progress on their restructuring plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a strong and independent carrier," Davis wrote to Peters and Gonzales. "The interests of all may be best served by ensuring they remain on this course."

US Airways made its $8 billion merger offer public on Nov. 15 when the airline released a letter to Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein outlining its unsolicited bid. Grinstein already had rebuffed the offers privately and has continued to argue that Delta and the public would be best served if it emerges from bankruptcy as an independent, stand-alone airline.

Mercury News Reduces Number Of Layoffs After Bargaining Session (AP)

By Rachel Konrad, Ap Business Writer

AP, December 5, 2006

San Francisco (AP) -- After a 20-hour bargaining session ended Monday morning, the San Jose Mercury News and its union reached a tentative agreement on a two-year contract that reduced the number of workers to be laid off.

The 263,000-circulation daily newspaper will eliminate 27.5 full-time positions, down from the 69 positions originally slated to be cut.

The paper, which employs 490 members of the San Jose Newspaper Guild, guaranteed it would not lay off more union workers through June. Managers will notify employees of the layoffs by Tuesday morning.

Laid off workers may receive two weeks pay for every year of service, up to 10 weeks of salary, and two months of paid health care.

The reduction in layoffs was welcome news among reporters, photographers and other editorial workers, who wore black Monday to show solidarity with soon-departed colleagues.

"Nobody wants to see good journalists and friends walk out the door," said columnist and guild member Mike Cassidy. "But I'm encouraged because it shows that the owners of the paper do have a concern for quality journalism and are willing to try to work with the unions to remain the paper it is."

Newspaper spokesman Dan Breeden confirmed terms of the agreement but would not comment further.

Luther Jackson, executive officer of San Jose Newspaper Guild, did not immediately return calls Monday.

The contract provides 2 percent annual wage increases and a $1,000 bonus meant to help reduce the sting of a new health plan that requires members to pay at least 20 percent of premiums.

The company froze its pension plan and replaced it with a 401K matching contribution of up to 3 percent if an employee contributes 6 percent.

Despite concessions, the agreement offers a measure of stability in a newsroom rattled by corporate turmoil.

MediaNews Group Inc., the nation's fourth-largest newspaper publisher, acquired the Mercury News, the Monterey County Herald and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. earlier this year in a complex deal valued at $1 billion. MediaNews also owns the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers.

The Mercury News was previously owned by Knight Ridder, the nation's second largest newspaper publisher, which put itself up for sale late last year under pressure from shareholders unhappy with a sagging stock price. The slump reflected investors' souring sentiments about traditional media as the Internet siphons away advertising revenue.

The new contract, which expires in October 2008, permits MediaNews to coordinate news coverage and advertising with other papers in the chain.

Late last month, a federal judge issued a temporary restraining order on the San Francisco Chronicle, whose parent company, Hearst Corp., appeared interested in collaborating with MediaNews on local distribution and national advertising sales. U.S. District Judge Susan Illston said such a deal would possibly violate antitrust laws.

Plaintiffs In Iowa Microsoft Case Won't Call Gates, Ballmer As Witnessess (AP)

By David Pitt, The Associated Press

AP, December 5, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa – The attorney representing plaintiffs in one of the few state-level class-action antitrust lawsuits left against Microsoft announced today that she would not call Chairman Bill Gates and CEO Steve Ballmer as witnesses.

Roxanne Conlin won a judge's ruling prior to the trial that would have forced Gates and Ballmer to travel to Des Moines for direct questioning even though the two executives were expected to testify later in the case when Microsoft presents its defense.

Judge Scott Rosenberg's ruling indicated that Gates and Ballmer would be required to travel to Des Moines from Washington only once. That would have allowed Microsoft attorneys to question the two men directly — in effect presenting part of their defense in the middle of the plaintiffs' case.

Conlin released a statement today that said the decision was reached to avoid any potential confusion by jurors.

"I am concerned such a disruption of our case may create unnecessary confusion for the jurors," Conlin said. "There is absolutely no reason to have such a disruption in light of the defense's promise to call Bill Gates as a witness."

The Iowa lawsuit claims Microsoft violated Iowa's competition laws and seeks about $330 million for Iowans who have purchased the software maker's products since 1994.

Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis said Friday that many of the allegations Conlin is making are 15 to 20 years old and the company resolved many of the issues years ago. Wallis said the case is about whether Iowans paid fair prices for computer software, and the company will show that consumers received a good value for their money.

The lawsuit was originally filed in 2000, after federal antitrust actions against Microsoft were settled. It has already been before the Iowa Supreme Court three times on various legal issues and been sent back to Polk County District Court for trial.

Conlin will be allowed to play a 10-hour unflattering 1998 deposition by Gates from another lawsuit that shows a fidgety, nervous looking chief executive.

She has said the videotape will give jurors "good insight into the motivation and business practices of Microsoft."

Microsoft has planned on calling Gates and Ballmer as witnesses from the outset of the trial and said Conlin's change in strategy does not affect their case.

"This does not change our strategy one iota. Bill Gates and Steve Ballmer are coming to Iowa to testify in our case," Wallis said. "They're looking forward to telling our story as we have said all along."

The change will mean Gates and Ballmer will come later next year. Both men are expected to be on the witness stand for about four days.

The jury of seven men and five women have been told the case will likely last about six months.

Bank Of N.Y. To Buy Mellon Financial In $16.5B Deal (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, December 5, 2006

Bank of New York said Monday it will buy Mellon Financial for $16.5 billion in stock, creating an investor service behemoth and one of the world's largest asset managers.

The combined company, to be called Bank of New York Mellon, will rank first worldwide with $16.6 trillion of assets under custody, says globalcustody.net (custody services distribute cash and dividends held in trust on behalf of the trust owners). It will be in the top 10 of the world's largest asset managers, overseeing more than $1.1 trillion of assets, says David George, analyst at A.G. Edwards.

Investors seemed to agree. Shares of Bank of New York gained $4.27 to $39.75, and Mellon gained $2.73 to $42.78. Investors were so pleased because the expectations for the merger are “reasonable and realistic,” says Gerard Cassidy, analyst at RBC Capital Markets.

The deal is significant for the industry because it results in:

•Cost savings. The combined firm plans to slash pretax costs by 8.5% or $700 million a year in a three-year plan. Part will be accomplished by cutting 3,900 of 40,000 jobs. The restructuring plan is expected to cost $1.3 billion. Cassidy thinks that after everything is done, the new company might save more and spend less to restructure.

•Pressure to consolidate. Being big is a major advantage in the asset custody business, where firms are paid relatively small amounts to handle routine back-office tasks, Fitzwater says. “In this sector, scale is huge,” he says.

The new combined company will put major pressure on smaller firms to combine so they can compete, Cassidy says.

As large as the Bank of New York's buy of Mellon is, it's just the latest in a frenzied year for financial M&A. The deal is the industry's second-largest this year and 12th-largest ever, Thomson Financial says.

It's not surprising to see strong M&A activity in the financial industry since the stocks have done so well, says Anant Sundaram, finance professor at the Tuck School of Business. Banks are on the hunt for deals using their rich stock, he says. Bank CEOs are telling themselves: “Everyone is doing it (merging), so let me do it also,” he says.

Banking On Market Complexities (WSJ)

By Clint Riley

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Bank of New York Co.'s proposed takeover of Mellon Financial Corp. reveals a new pot-of-gold in the investment industry: The increasingly complicated, global investment strategies used by hedge funds and other sophisticated money managers has been a boom for banks that keep track of all those trades.

If the $16.5 billion stock deal is approved by regulators and shareholders, that business now would have a new leader: The combined Bank of New York Mellon Corp. would have $16.6 trillion in assets under custody -- overseeing trade processing, internal accounting, fund administration and other such services for hedge funds, retirement plans, mutual funds and government entities. That figure would catapult the company ahead of J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., which oversees about $12.9 trillion under custody.

WSJ's Clint Riley explains2 why the merger "is meant to be."

The new company would have another $1.1 trillion in assets under management, making investment decisions on behalf of mostly big institutional clients, putting it in the top 10 global asset managers.

Share prices for both companies rallied on the news, with the Bank of New York up 12% and Mellon up nearly 7% for a total combined stock market value of $47.5 billion.

Investors bid up prices for the other two big stand-alone custody banks' shares, with Northern Trust Corp. and State Street Corp. jumping amid speculation that they could become takeover targets or steal customers from their merging rivals. Prices for smaller asset servicers in the U.S. and abroad also rose, including Investors Financial Services Corp.

"This is about the future and not about the past," said Robert P. Kelly, Mellon's chief executive, who will become chief executive of the combined company if the deal is completed as planned, in mid-2007. "We are in a consolidating industry and we are in businesses that are becoming more global."

Hedge funds and institutional investors, including governments in emerging markets, are making a larger number of often-complicated investments across multiple asset classes in many countries, sometimes simultaneously through several trading strategies.

MORE ON THE MERGER

• Tale of the Tape: Merging Assets3

• Analysts React: 'Strategic Sense'4

• Read the full text5 of the companies' statement on the merger agreement.

The complexity of dealing with varied regulations, currency conversions and accounting differences world-wide is forcing many asset managers, which once serviced their own trades, to outsource the work to larger and better-equipped financial institutions with global reach.

To keep up with investing trends, banks and asset servicing firms are employing sophisticated technology, including software that can quickly translate foreign language, track currency transactions and ensure compliance with constantly shifting regulations.

Such technology is costly to develop and maintain. Those with the broadest client bases have the advantage of spreading such costs, allowing them to reap higher returns.

'Guaranteed' Profits

That is part of what is driving consolidation in the industry, which previously had been confined to acquisitions of smaller players, including some overseas.

The Bank of New York brings its scale and expertise in asset servicing, as well as short-term lending to traders and trade clearing -- the business guaranteeing that all parties in a trade will make good on their commitments.

This potentially lucrative business would provide about 71% of the new company's annual revenue, or $8.9 billion of the $12.5 billion total.

The remaining $3.6 billion, or 29%, would come from asset and wealth management, Mellon's forte.

DOJ_NMG_0102227

Most of Mellon's business is as a money manager for big institutional clients, but it also advises the struggling mutual-fund family Dreyfus Funds.

Despite its well-known brand name, investors have been pulling more money out of Dreyfus stock and bond funds than they put in for the past three years, according to Financial Research Corp.

The combined company would be based in New York and have 40,000 employees in 36 countries.

It said cost-cutting from the proposed takeover should save the new company $700 million a year in pretax expenses, or about 8.5%. It hopes to cut about 3,900 jobs over three years, through attrition "where possible."

Bowing to Mellon's iconic status in its hometown of Pittsburgh, the new company plans to base some of its divisions there and add jobs.

Current shareholders of Bank of New York will control more than 60% of the new company, while Mellon's current management team will largely take over day-to-day operations of the company. The current chairman and chief executive of Bank of New York, Thomas A. Renyi, will stay on for 18 months as executive chairman and play a key role in its integration.

"This is a combination that is coming out of strength," said Mr. Renyi in an interview. "Now is the time to play on a global stage."

The deal, described by the banks as a merger of equals, brings together two storied financial institutions that analysts have speculated for years would join forces.

Mellon was founded by the family of industrialist Andrew Mellon, the other, the brain child of Alexander Hamilton. Both men were once U.S. Treasury secretaries; Hamilton was its founder, and his visage today graces the $10 bill.

"Hamilton and Mellon are probably drinking scotch right now," quipped Gerard Cassidy, a bank analyst for RBC Capital Markets.

Back in early 1998, Mr. Renyi approached Mellon with a so-called bear hug -- a merger offer to a corporate board that falls short of a hostile takeover bid. The idea was harshly rejected by Mellon's board, then led by Frank V. Cahouet.

The Challenge to Renyi

"Our board does not believe you have the commitment or the experience to implement a strategy that capitalizes on the quality of the Mellon franchise and the value inherent in it," Mr. Cahouet told Mr. Renyi in a letter.

Mr. Renyi didn't let that deter him. For years, he had sought to have his bank viewed in a better light by investors and fellow bankers, arguing that it didn't deserve to be trading at cheaper valuations than its biggest competitors Mellon, State Street of Boston and Northern Trust of Chicago.

In late September, with Mellon under new leadership and the 60-year-old Mr. Renyi approaching retirement age, he decided that the timing was right to try again. He found a receptive audience in his counterpart at Mellon, Mr. Kelly, an expansion-minded bank executive who left Wachovia Corp. less than a year ago to head Mellon. Both men were acutely aware of the huge scale their companies needed to compete in the competitive business.

Though speculation was rampant that more consolidation was in the offing, Northern Trust and State Street tried to douse it. "We believe we have a strong future serving our clients and creating shareholder value as an independent company," said a Northern Trust spokesman.

A State Street spokeswoman said her company also doesn't feel it is under pressure to do a deal.

The deal also could prompt other big banks with such operations to move to strengthen their positions, including Citigroup Inc., which has a custody unit that is the fourth largest in the business. Asset services is a double-digit growth engine for Citigroup and J.P. Morgan.

Bank Of New York To Buy Mellon For $16.5 Billion (NYT)

By Peter Edmonston

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Bank of New York has agreed to acquire Mellon Financial of Pittsburgh in an all-stock transaction valued at $16.5 billion that will create the world's largest securities-servicing firm, the two companies announced today.

The combined entity will be called Bank of New York Mellon and have annual revenue of more than $12 billion.

The boards of both banking companies have approved the deal, which is expected to close early in the third quarter of 2007 and will immediately add to earnings, the companies said.

For Bank of New York, the deal will bolster its position as a leader in the securities servicing and processing business, which provides the backbone of the world's stock and bond markets. Earlier this year, Bank of New York nearly doubled the size of its corporate trust business, which handles record-keeping for debt issues, by agreeing to swap many of its retail branches for J.P. Morgan Chase's corporate trust unit.

The combined company will have $16.6 trillion in assets under custody and act as corporate trustee for an additional $8 trillion in assets.

"Mellon is going to have the opportunity to accelerate what is are very compelling growth rates for the company," said Thomas A. Renyi, Bank of New York's chairman and chief executive, during a presentation for investors and banking industry analysts today. "This is a combination that has extraordinarily similar and very complimentary businesses."

Wall Street viewed the deal favorably for both banking companies. Bank of New York's shares climbed $4.27, or 12 percent, to close at $39.75 today on the New York Stock Exchange, while Mellon's shares gained $2.73, or 6.8 percent, to $42.78.

While the deal ends a longstanding rivalry for both companies, it will bring together institutions whose heritage is tied to two titans of American business history. Mellon was founded more than a century ago by Judge Thomas Mellon, who handed over the business to his son Andrew; the Bank of New York was founded by Alexander Hamilton in 1784.

When the deal is completed, Bank of New York's shareholders will own 63 percent of the stock in the combined company, with Mellon's shareholders owning the remainder. Under the terms of the deal, Bank of New York's shareholders will receive 0.9434 shares of the combined company for each their current shares. Mellon's shareholders will exchange their stock on a one-for-one basis.

The combined company's board will have 10 members appointed by Bank of New York and eight members appointed by Mellon. Its headquarters will be in New York.

"Several business divisions" are expected to be based out of Pittsburgh, said Robert Kelly, Mellon's chairman and chief executive, who become chief executive of the combined company. Mr. Renyi will serve as executive chairman for 18 months after the transaction closes, to be succeeded as chairman by Mr. Kelly.

The companies said today that their merger would allow for annual cost reductions of about $700 million. The companies' combined work force of about 40,000 will be reduced by about 3,900 over three years, though specific businesses or locations where jobs are to be shed have not yet been determined.

Mr. Kelly joined Mellon in February, after activist investors had pushed the company for change in strategy. In his previous job as chief financial officer at Wachovia, Mr. Kelly led the Charlotte, N.C.-based banking company through a series of large acquisitions. Still, many analysts saw Mr. Kelly's hiring at Mellon as a sign that the company would not put itself up for sale any time soon. Shortly after his appointment, he told The New York Times that "I am not focused on M.&A."

Last month, Mr. Kelly gave a presentation to investors and analysts outlining his strategy for improving the company's margins and expanding its international presence. After the presentation, an analyst at Prudential securities, Michael Mayo, raised his rating on Mellon's stock to "overweight" from "underweight," writing in a research note that Mr. Kelly had "outlined a series of steps that should help liven up what we had considered a sleepy organization."

Mr. Mayo also noted that Mellon's securities-processing business would fare well if the stock market continued its recent rise. Each 10 percent increase in the stock market would bolster Mellon's revenue by 1 to 2 percent, he estimated.

Goldman Sachs and the law firm Sullivan & Cromwell advised Bank of New York in the transaction. Mellon was represented by UBS Investment Bank, Lazard and the law firms Simpson Thacher & Bartlett and Reed Smith. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Old-Line Institutions To Merge (WP/AP)

By Eileen Alt Powell

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 4 -- Bank of New York said Monday that it would take over Mellon Financial in a $16.5 billion all-stock deal that will create the world's largest securities servicing company.

The merger, which is projected to be completed by mid-2007, combines two financial institutions that are steeped in American history.

Bank of New York was founded in 1784 by Alexander Hamilton, who went on to become the first secretary of the U.S. Treasury. Mellon Financial, based in Pittsburgh, was founded in 1869 by the famous family of financiers and philanthropists.

The new company, which will preserve links to that heritage by calling itself Bank of New York Mellon, would become the world's leading asset servicer, with $16.6 trillion in assets under management. It also will rank among the top 10 global asset managers with more than $1.1 trillion in assets under management.

The companies, in announcing the deal, said it would result in the elimination of about 3,900 jobs, or nearly 10 percent of their combined work force of about 40,000. The reductions would be made through normal attrition "wherever possible," the companies said in a statement.

The deal was approved by each company's board of directors but requires approval by regulators and shareholders.

Investors appeared to signal support Monday: Bank of New York shares closed at $39.75, up 4.27; Mellon Financial closed at $42.78, up $2.73. Analyst David A. George with A.G. Edwards & Sons in St. Louis upgraded Mellon Financial to "buy" from "hold," saying "from our perspective, this is an excellent transaction as it creates a securities servicing and asset management behemoth that can rival any bank or asset manager in the world."

The announcement also said that Thomas Renyi, chairman and chief executive of Bank of New York, would lead the merger integration team as the new institution's executive chairman for 18 months. Mellon's chairman and chief executive, Robert P. Kelly, would be chief executive of the merged bank and then replace Renyi when he retires. Gerald L. Hassell, president of Bank of New York, will hold the same position in the new company.

Renyi, 60, has been chief executive of the New York bank since 1997 and chairman since 1998. Kelly, 52, who had been the chief financial officer of Wachovia in Charlotte, took over at Mellon last February with the retirement of longtime chief executive Martin G. McGuinn.

The new company would have its headquarters in New York.

The companies said they expected the combined company to cut costs by about $700 million a year and said the deal will result in restructuring charges of about $1.3 billion.

LSI Logic To Buy Agere In Bet On Data-Storage Chips (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

LSI Logic Corp. agreed to buy Agere Systems Inc. for stock valued at about $3.45 billion, placing a big bet on the market for chips used in data storage and networking.

The purchase agreement announced yesterday is the largest in the 25-year history of LSI. The Silicon Valley company pioneered the market for chips that companies customize for specific chores.

LSI Logic CEO Abhi Talwalkar2 tells CNBC that the purchase of Agere Systems brings together 4,300 engineers, 10,000 strong patent portfolio and "a competitive pipeline of innovation."

Abhi Talwalkar, a former Intel Corp. executive who became LSI's chief executive in May 2005, has narrowed the company's broad range of products to focus on chips for managing disk drives and communications between computers and data-storage systems. LSI chips also are used in consumer-electronic products.

Agere, of Allentown, Pa., traces its lineage to Bell Laboratories, the one-time research arm of AT&T Corp. that invented the transistor. Lucent Technologies Inc., which inherited those operations, spun Agere off in 2000. Agere also sells data-storage chips, as well as chips used in networking devices and cellphones.

Mr. Talwalkar said the deal creates a "formidable competitor" across all parts of the data-storage market, and bolsters LSI's position in networking and consumer electronics -- while assembling a big team of engineers with a massive collection of patents.

For Agere, being part of a larger company reassures customers about the future of its products. "We had some of our largest customers concerned at the size we were about our ability to move forward," said Richard Clemmer, its president and chief executive.

Under a definitive agreement between the companies, Agere shareholders will receive 2.16 shares of LSI for each Agere share they own, or a total of 379 million LSI shares. Based on LSI's closing price Friday, the companies estimated the value to Agere shareholders at about $4 billion, or $22.81 a share -- 28% above the closing price of Agere's shares on Friday.

Following the announcement of the deal, however, LSI's shares fell nearly 14%, or $1.44, to $9.12 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange, reducing the transaction value. Agere's shares rose 8.5%, or $1.51, to $19.30 on the NYSE.

Tim Luke, an analyst at Lehman Brothers, said some investors may be concerned about the price of the deal, particularly because LSI had seemed to be moving away from communications markets. "I think investors had been hoping they would be more focused," he said.

The companies expect to record cost savings starting next year, with annual savings of at least $125 million in 2008. The deal will slightly cut into earnings next year but "meaningfully" add to earnings in 2008, the companies said. LSI and Agere had combined revenue of $3.5 billion for the 12 months ended Sept. 30. The deal is expected to close in the first quarter.

Mr. Talwalkar will remain CEO of the combined companies, which will keep the LSI name and be based at LSI's headquarters in Milpitas, Calif. The deal must approved by regulators as well as shareholders of both companies.

Upon completion, Agere shareholders will own about 48% of the combined company and Agere will designate three seats on its nine-member board. LSI shareholders will own 52% of the combined company an designate the remaining six board seats.

Family Leads Management Bid For Vegas Casinos (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

A management-led $4.7 billion buyout offer for Station Casinos Inc. represents a way for the company's founding family to tighten its hold on Station at a time when competition is intensifying for Las Vegas residents, its core customers.

Station received an $82-per-share offer from a group led by Chairman and Chief Executive Frank Fertitta III; his brother, President Lorenzo Fertitta; and Colony Capital LLC. The Fertittas already own about 20% of Station, a Las Vegas-based company that owns and operates 16 so-called locals casinos aimed largely at suburban Las Vegas residents. The offer also calls for the assumption of more than $3.4 billion in Station debt.

WSJ reporter Randall Smith discusses2 why high profile Wall Street firms like Morgan Stanley are overcoming a traditional distaste for casinos by seeking to invest in them, albeit in a low-profile manner.

Spokespeople for Station and Colony declined to comment.

Speculation about a buyout of Station has circulated for weeks, and yesterday the offer sent the shares up more than 22%, ending the day at $84.90 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. That is $2.90 higher than the offer price, suggesting that investors expect a higher offer before a deal is reached.

Any deal for Station will likely be closely scrutinized because of management's involvement. Station says it appointed a special committee of independent directors to review the proposal.

The move comes as Station is facing tough competitive issues. Last month, the company lowered its fourth-quarter and 2007 earnings estimates. Station reported net income of $161.9 million in 2005 on revenue of $1.1 billion. It faces competition from Boyd Gaming Corp. and others angling for gamblers who live in Las Vegas, as opposed to tourists. The softening of the "locals" market is partly because of Station, which has built glamorous casino-resorts that have cannibalized its older properties.

It also comes amid a wave of interest in casino-industry buyouts. Gambling giant Harrah's Entertainment Inc. Oct. 2 received an $81-per-share offer from private equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group. That offer was quickly raised to $83.50 per share, according to people close to the situation, valuing the company at $15.5 billion.

Station has seen its long-term debt increase in the past year to more than $3.4 billion, partly on higher interest expense and loans used to finance stock buybacks. Station has repurchased about 19% of its common stock this year.

Questions have been raised about the company's stock compensation program, which has allowed the Fertitta family to realize about $300 million in stock-based compensation since 2002. In a May 4, 2005, proxy paper, research firm Glass Lewis & Co. said Station's "equity-based compensation practices are among the most expensive and liberal we have reviewed."

The Fertittas and other partners involved in the buyout offer, Blake Sartini and Delise Sartini, together own 27% of the outstanding Station shares, according to a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Mr. Sartini, a former Station board member, couldn't be reached to comment.

Casino analysts are split over whether outside bidders will make a run for Station. "Unlike Harrah's...we expect the Station management led LBO will not likely receive multiple offers and come to a quicker resolution than Harrah's," Robin Farley, analyst at UBS Investment Research in New York wrote in a research note. The Fertitta brothers already hold casino licenses in Nevada, making their path to a deal easier than the Harrah's suitors, who face complicated licensing issues.

Reckson Rejects Icahn's Late Bid (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Reckson Associates Realty Corp. has rejected a late bid from financier Carl Icahn and will hold a shareholder vote tomorrow seeking approval for its planned merger with SL Green Realty Corp.

Reckson's board issued a statement late last night saying that Mr. Icahn's cash-and-stock offer "does not meet the standard set forth in the SL Green merger agreement to permit discussions or negotiations" with American Real Estate Partners LP, which is 90%-owned by Mr. Icahn.

On Monday, Mr. Icahn faxed a letter to the independent board of Reckson, offering $1 billion in cash and $3.3 billion in a new class of stock in American Real Estate Partners, traded on the New York Stock Exchange. The proposal was considerably altered from his planned all-cash bid of $49 a share because he lost his two partners over the weekend.

The board's rejection of Mr. Icahn's proposal, by a vote of its independent directors last night, came even before Mr. Icahn issued his official bid, which he had said he would provide today to Reckson, a Uniondale, N.Y., real-estate investment trust.

The development is a victory for SL Green, of New York, another REIT, whose efforts to acquire Reckson hit a kink on Nov. 16 when Mr. Icahn and his then-partner, New York real-estate developer Harry Macklowe, jumped in with a surprise proposal. The partners announced they were willing to pay $4.6 billion for Reckson, trumping SL Green's $4.1 billion bid from Aug. 3. Reckson's directors began discussions with Messrs. Macklowe and Icahn, and last week it looked as if SL Green was losing ground when Mack-Cali Realty Corp., an Edison, N.J., REIT, was allowed to join the Icahn-Macklowe partnership. But over the weekend Mack-Cali and Mr. Macklowe both opted out, leaving Mr. Icahn alone in the bidding.

But the outcome is also surely a disappointment to many Reckson shareholders who had been excited about the considerably higher price originally proposed by Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe.

Mr. Macklowe wasn't available for comment. Mack-Cali said that after performing due diligence on Reckson's assets, it determined that bidding wasn't in the best interests of its shareholders. Mr. Icahn declined to discuss why his partners dropped out.

In his letter to Reckson, Mr. Icahn offered preferred units in American Real Estate Partners that would carry a 5% annual dividend and would be convertible for AREP units at the price of $104.50 per unit. Mr. Icahn's letter stated that, if the preferred units were valued at par, it would constitute a total consideration of $49 per share for Reckson -- his original proposed price. That would top a cash-and-stock SL Green bid that was valued at about $45.60 a share as of yesterday's close.

However, as soon as Mr. Icahn announced the proposal, some analysts immediately cast doubt on whether the offer would persuade Reckson to walk away from an agreement to be acquired by SL Green. The analysts said the newly created securities weren't as liquid as cash or common stock, making Mr. Icahn's bid difficult to value.

For Mr. Icahn "to come in at the 11th hour, with a bid that doesn't include the two local real-estate players and introduces a new security, it's going to make it tough for the board to go with that bid," said John Lutzius, chief executive of Green Street Advisors Inc., a Newport Beach, Calif., real-estate investment and trading firm.

And indeed by late last night, Reckson's statement from its independent directors was citing that very concern: "In making this determination, the Reckson board considered that there are substantial valuation issues associated with the securities being offered as part of the AREP proposal and that these securities could be valued at a substantial discount to par, which would reduce the proposal's economic value."

Earlier yesterday in an interview, Mr. Icahn had said that he was hopeful that Reckson would consider his bid, saying he believed traditional REIT investors would find the dividend on the preferred units attractive, and "if there's a question of liquidity, I think that will be taken care of once they are issued."

Both SL Green and Reckson had publicly questioned whether Mr. Icahn's bid was credible. But Mr. Icahn said he wanted to buy Reckson because it is a good value -- not to prove doubters wrong. "I didn't appreciate them saying that, but I don't make investment decisions of this magnitude based on just being a little miffed," he said.

To bolster his bid, Mr. Icahn had offered to immediately deposit $613 million into escrow if Reckson accepted his merger proposal, his letter states. That would have covered the $99.8 million breakup fee that would be owed to SL Green if Reckson went with another bidder. It also would have included a "good faith deposit" by Mr. Icahn that would be forfeited to Reckson if American Real Estate Partners didn't meet its merger-agreement obligations.

Reckson's shares fell $2.34, or 4.9%, to $45.75 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday; SL Green shares slipped 95 cents, or 0.7%, to $134 on the Big Board.

Gold Kist Accepts Pilgrim's Pride's Sweetened Bid (WSJ)

By Richard Gibson

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Gold Kist Inc.'s agreement to be acquired by Pilgrim's Pride Corp. for a sweetened $21-a-share bid ended a four-month standoff in a deal that would create the world's largest chicken processor.

Assuming the proposed transaction is completed, the combined company would leapfrog industry leader Tyson Foods Inc. as the largest processor of chicken. Tyson, which also processes beef and pork, would remain the world's largest meat company, with more than three times the annual sales.

The $1.1 billion offer was approved by Gold Kist's board Sunday after a weekend of negotiations over price. The accord came three days after the announcement that 67% of Gold Kist shareholders had tendered their stock despite repeated urgings from management that it was preferable to remain independent.

Shares of Pilgrim's Pride gained $2.52, or 9.9% to $27.90 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, while Gold Kist stock was up 90 cents, or 4.5%, to $20.87 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

In what Pilgrim's Pride executives called a "cordial" meeting in Dallas on Saturday and Sunday, Pilgrim's Pride sweetened its initial $20-a-share bid by $1, Gold Kist agreed to a takeover and Pilgrim's Pride was allowed to look at Gold Kist's nonpublic documents for the first time since it launched its unsolicited offer in August.

Rising grain prices, other competitive pressures and overseas concerns about avian flu have squeezed poultry processors in recent months. For the fiscal year ended Sept. 30, Pilgrim's Pride reported a net loss of $34.2 million, or 51 cents a share, on sales of $5.24 billion. Gold Kist reported a net loss for the year ended Oct. 1 of $17.7 million, or 35 cents a share, on sales of $2.13 billion.

To improve their results, both Pilgrim's Pride and Gold Kist have cut poultry production about 5% in recent months.

Combined annual sales of Pilgrim's Pride, based in Pittsburg, Texas, and Gold Kist, of Atlanta, would exceed $7.5 billion. Pilgrim's employs about 40,000 people and Gold Kist about 16,500, both primarily at facilities in the southeastern U.S.

Analysts estimated the acquisition would give Pilgrim's Pride a 27% share of the U.S. chicken market and put Tyson's share at 24%. Pilgrim's Pride Chief Executive O.B. Goolsby said that his company has "absolutely no intention of any plant closings" from the pending combination.

EU To Investigate Car Battery Merger (AP)

AP, December 5, 2006

EU to Investigate Merger in European Car Batteries Market

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- The European Union launched an antitrust investigation Monday into plans by German car battery maker VB Autobatterie to buy the car battery business of Italy's FIAMM group.

An initial review revealed "serious competition concerns," EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said in a statement.

Under EU rules, she has until April 23 to reach a final finding.

"When the largest producer of automotive starter batteries (in Europe) wants to acquire the third-largest manufacturer in an already highly concentrated market, the Commission must ensure that this would not adversely affect consumers," Kroes said.

VB and FIAMM make and market batteries for makers of cars, trucks and commercial vehicles as well as car parts and repair services. VB is a joint venture of Johnson Controls Inc. of Milwaukee and the German Robert Bosch GmbH, Europe's leading supplier of car starter batteries.

If VB buys FIAMM's battery business, the number of European suppliers would drop from three to two. Kroes said she also would examine any impact of the acquisition on the "independent aftermarket," which covers sales of replacement batteries.

Water War Brewing Along Mexico-California Border (AP)

By David Kravets

AP, December 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - The Bush administration urged a federal appeals court Monday to allow a section of a major canal separating California and Mexico to be lined with cement to stop millions of gallons of water from seeping south of the border each year.

The 82-mile-long All-American Canal, which gets life from the Colorado River, in part nourishes crops on both sides of the border about 100 miles east of San Diego along the Calexico-Mexicali border - where the lining is proposed. The U.S. government says Mexico already gets 489 billion gallons of Colorado River water legitimately each year under a 1944 treaty and isn't entitled to the seepage, which provides a farming lifeline in Mexico.

A Justice Department attorney, John Smeltzer, told a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that Mexicans have no right to the water, which is also the lifeblood for 500,000 acres of U.S. farmland.

The lining project will provide enough annual water for 135,000 new homes in the San Diego area.

DOJ_NMG_0102234

All three judges suggested while hearing oral arguments in the case Monday that people in Mexico might not have legal standing to assert a claim for the water in U.S. courts.

"How does a constitutional barrier against takings of property in the United States apply to somebody's property in Mexico?" Judge John Noonan asked.

The San Francisco-based appeals court temporarily blocked the $210 million, 23-mile-long lining construction project in August after Mexican business interests and U.S. environmental groups sued.

The lawsuit essentially claims that the Mexicans are entitled to the water. It says there would be a significant number of job losses on the Mexicali side of the Imperial Valley border as thousands of acres of crops would turn to dust, that Mexican wells would become polluted without the seepage and, among other things, migratory birds would be threatened if wetlands disappeared.

R. Gaylord Smith, an attorney for Consejo de Desarrollo Economico de Mexicali, a Mexican business group, argued that the U.S. has abandoned rights to the water.

Judge Sidney Thomas said the U.S. might have abandoned the water, but that doesn't mean "somebody else acquires it."

Malissa Hathaway, another attorney for the business group, said the societies of Mexicali in Mexico and adjacent Calexico on the U.S. side depend on one another, meaning the lining will affect the U.S.

"No one has looked at the economic effects of taking land out of production," she said.

Water consumption spurred by breakneck growth in Southern California prompted Western states to complain they weren't getting their share of Colorado River water. The dispute resulted in a water redistribution deal that included the lining project as California settled for less water.

Colorado River water first flowed to California's arid southeast in 1901 on the Alamo Canal, which dipped into Mexico. California farmers soon decided they needed a canal completely within the United States, leading to completion of the All-American in 1942.

Critics of the project say migrants may die crossing a lined canal because concrete will deprive desperate swimmers of tall grasses to grab. While the canal appears calm, migrants who cram onto inflatable rafts can be swept away by a fierce undercurrent.

The court did not indicate when it would rule.

The Mexican government is not a party to the case, but disapproved of the lining in court briefs.

The case is Consejo de Desarrollo Economico de Mexicali v. United States, 06-16345.

House To Vote On Senate's Offshore Drilling Plan (WP)

By Steven Mufson And Juliet Eilperin

Washington Post, December 5, 2006

The House is scheduled to vote today on a Senate plan for offshore oil and gas drilling that would open up new acreage in the Gulf of Mexico but that falls far short of an offshore drilling bill the House adopted earlier this year.

House Democratic leaders have decided not to take a position on the bill in order to avoid having to choose between different constituencies within the party's own ranks. Environmental groups oppose the drilling measure; the Sierra Club issued a statement saying that "it's time for Congress to stop appeasing Big Oil" and that "drilling is a bad deal for Americans."

Yet in the face of high energy prices, many Democrats support wider drilling to increase domestic natural gas supplies. And Louisiana Democrats avidly support the Senate bill because it would divert 37.5 percent of federal royalties to Gulf states for coastal restoration projects. Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) has been pushing especially hard for its passage.

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) opposes offshore drilling and is concerned about the loss of federal royalties, said spokeswoman Jennifer Crider. But Pelosi will not try to rally the Democratic caucus against the Senate bill.

Earlier this year, the House voted for an offshore drilling plan that would have opened the Atlantic and Pacific coastal waters to oil and gas drilling for the first time in a quarter-century. Senate leaders told House negotiators that there was no chance that approach could pass the Senate and that the House would have to go along with the Senate's version. House negotiators, led by outgoing House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.), resisted that compromise, but now key Republicans say they will accept the Senate version.

"What concerns me is that a month from now, when natural gas finds its way past $12 again, folks out there will be scratching their heads as to why we didn't pass a more comprehensive bill," Rep. John E. Peterson (R-Pa.) said in a statement.

The bill, which will be considered on an expedited basis, cannot be amended and requires the support of a two-thirds majority of the House.

Separately, the White House confirmed on Saturday that President Bush is considering lifting a 17-year-old moratorium on offshore drilling near Alaska's Aleutian Islands. The area was put off limits to drilling after the Exxon Valdez oil tanker spill in 1989.

The area, which includes Bristol Bay, is home to the world's largest wild salmon run along with commercial fisheries for red king crab, pollock and cod. According to the Sierra Club, commercial, sport and sustenance fishing in the region harvests more than 25 million fish a year and contributes $300 million to the local economy.

In 2003, Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) persuaded Congress to remove protections for Bristol Bay, but it has remained off limits to drilling until 2012 under a directive by President Bill Clinton.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) said, "As the Republican Party prepares to relinquish control of the House and Senate, they are attempting a last-minute giveaway of public lands as an early Christmas present to the big oil companies."

Drew Malcomb, a Minerals Management Service spokesman, said, "The north Aleutian Basin area is currently part of the five-year oil and gas leasing plan, but no drilling could occur there unless the presidential withdrawal was removed."

A few dozen environmental and tribal groups active in Alaska wrote an "open letter" to Bush on Friday, urging him to protect Bristol Bay.

Eric Siy, executive director of the Alaska Marine Conservation Council, an advocacy group, said that many tribal communities depend on the area for subsistence fishing. For them, Siy said, drilling in Bristol Bay "is like burning the pews to heat the church."

Some US Cities Grapple With An Unusual Problem: Too Many Churches (CSM)

By Amy Green

The Christian Science Monitor, December 5, 2006

ORLANDO, FLA.

It's rush hour in southeast Orlando - Sunday rush hour, that is.

About a dozen churches are within a few miles of one another, and more are under construction. Neighbors venturing out for bagels and other errands find themselves stuck in traffic, heads bowed not in faith but frustration. Some complain that the traffic persists all week, as religious, youth, sports, and other activities draw crowds after work and school.

"It's ridiculous," says Pat DeLanger, an accountant who was about to climb into her car on a recent Sunday with her teenage daughter after a service at St. Isaac Jogues Catholic Church. She lives less than a mile away, but expects her Sunday morning drive to stretch to 30 minutes once construction on another church across the street is complete. "We live right there. We probably could walk faster."

While communities traditionally zone against houses of ill-repute, not houses of worship, frustrations have grown since 2000, when then-President Clinton signed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act. The law doesn't exempt churches from zoning regulations, per se. But when religious groups say the rules would create "a substantial burden," officials must show a compelling reason for the limits. Sometimes, the results leave neighborhoods feeling helpless in the face of ecclesiastical development.

Across the country, local governments are challenging the law in court, says Marci Hamilton, a church-state scholar at Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University in New York. She believes the issue probably will reach the US Supreme Court.

"It's happening all over the country," Ms. Hamilton says. "I get an e-mail from a new neighborhood daily. It's unbelievable because of this law what religious entities are willing to impose on residential neighborhoods."

For their part, religious leaders say they are responding to growth in their communities by providing needed services. Growth among houses of worship - particularly megachurches - poses a delicate quandary for local leaders. In smaller communities, too many churches - because of their tax-exempt status - can even strain the economy.

The federal government exempts religious organizations from property taxes, but some cities have become creative in collecting money from churches, says Chris Hoene, research manager for the National League of Cities in Washington. For example, some have begun taxing religious organizations' profit-generating enterprises, such as publishing. Especially in communities that operate on small margins, a small change in the budget can mean a big difference.

"It's a growing concern, because ... the not-for-profit sector is continually noted as a fast-growing sector," Mr. Hoene says.

In Stafford, Texas, leaders decided that with 51 places of worship and only 300 acres left to develop, they had too many churches. This Houston suburb of 20,000 balloons on Sundays, since many of the worshippers commute from outside the community, says Mayor Leonard Scarcella. With no property tax, the city's budget was stretched. Leaders imposed new regulations that would subject anyone who wants to develop in Stafford to stricter review.

"We believe very strongly in God. If you want religion, you can get just about anything here," Mr. Scarcella says. "We don't have 51 of anything else.... We're looking into ways that we can maintain balance."

Tensions can run especially high over land residents hope to preserve for agriculture or conservation purposes.

In Maryland's Montgomery County, leaders zoned 93,000 acres as an agricultural reserve in 1980. The zoning allowed churches, and there were about 60 scattered around, says Royce Hanson, chairman of the county planning board. More than a year ago, several megachurches sought to develop in the area.

Neighbors balked, and leaders rejected building plans that would have required their own water and sewer systems. Religious organizations haven't sued yet, Mr. Hanson says, but they're not happy with the decision. The plans were "out of character with the rural area," he says. "Those of us who want to preserve the agricultural reserve believe it was a good solution."

In southeast Orlando, Faith Assembly of God is paying the city impact fees of up to $1 million to build a new location to hold its 6,000 members, the Rev. Robb Hawks says. He says the argument that places of worship don't pay for their own development is a fallacy. His church will hold weeklong activities at its current location, and hold worship services in its new home, which will be located right across from another large church.

Neighbors are concerned that the roads can't handle the development, but Mr. Hawks offers no apology for his church's growth. It's a reflection of Orlando's rampant development, he says.

"I find it fascinating that people will move into a housing development ... and the first thing they want to do is stop any developments going in around them," Hawks says. "People come ... looking for community, and where do you find community?... They go looking for a church to not only fulfill their spiritual needs but their social needs as well."

Administration Tried To Cut Payouts To Nuke Workers (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration repeatedly sought ways to limit payouts to nuclear weapons workers sickened by radiation and toxic material, according to a memo written by congressional investigators and obtained by USA TODAY.

The investigation focuses on a federal program created in 2000 to compensate people with cancers and other illnesses tied to their work at government and contractor-owned facilities involved in Cold War nuclear weapons production. About 98,000 cases have been filed under the program, and the Labor Department has approved compensation in about 24,000 of those cases. However, program records show that not all of those approved claims have been paid.

Since 2002, “there is a continuous stream of (administration) communications … strategizing on minimizing payouts,” according to the Nov. 30 memo by staff for the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Border Security and Claims. The memo, prepared for the panel's chairman, Rep. John Hostettler, R-Ind., summarizes and quotes from thousands of pages of records reviewed by the subcommittee in its probe.

The subcommittee holds a hearing today on the investigation. Hostettler is pressing ahead despite losing re-election last month, vowing to release key documents and urging Democrats to continue the probe when they take over in 2007.

Administration officials say the memos reflect internal brainstorming on how to avoid compensating workers who aren't eligible.

"We're not pursuing those ideas," says Shelby Hallmark, the Labor Department's director of workers' compensation programs. "What we've been doing all along is trying to ensure that the program is implemented in a way that is fair and consistent and in accord with the law."

Hostettler was not available for comment, but he said at a November hearing that records reviewed in the investigation "do not support" the administration's stance. "This program was supposed to assure workers … (that) their government was finally going to do right by them," he added. "Those tasked with implementing (it) have failed that purpose miserably, and they need to be exposed."

The program covers workers from about 350 facilities nationwide, as well as uranium miners. Claimants can get up to $150,000; some also can get paid for medical bills, lost wages and disability.

In a memo from October 2005, program director Hallmark complains to White House officials that the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, which reviews some claims, is adopting "extreme exaggerations of (worker exposure) on the grounds that every decision point must be as 'claimant favorable' as conceivably possible." The documents also show officials debating ways to change the balance of a program oversight panel by adding members skeptical of workers' claims.

"You've got bureaucrats pressuring the scientists, and when they can't get what they want, they try to squeeze the (adjudication) process wherever they can," says Richard Miller, a claimants' advocate with the Government Accountability Project. "These workers are dying with every day that goes by."

Nuclear Power Revival Could Encounter Hurdles (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration's plan for a "renaissance" in nuclear power may be crimped by tightening world-wide supplies of uranium and a lack of enrichment facilities to turn the uranium into fuel for power plants.

In a recent setback, an accident in October flooded the world's largest uranium mine, which was set to open in Canada next year. That nudged prices for processed uranium ore, already up more than 800% since 2001, even higher.

Meanwhile, enrichment facilities, which turn uranium into fuel for nuclear power plants, have already pledged their services because of growing interest in nuclear fuel by other countries. The result is that the U.S. is relying more than before on Russia, which provides about half the enriched nuclear fuel used in this country.

Uranium is extracted from mines and processed into a form called "yellowcake." The yellowcake, in turn, is processed at enrichment plants, into fuel for nuclear-power plants. A far more time-consuming process is required to turn yellowcake into fuel for nuclear weapons.

Spurred by President Bush, who for years has touted nuclear power as a clean, safe way to generate electricity, the owners of U.S. utilities have made plans for at least 30 new U.S. nuclear power plants.

The administration is calling its plan a "renaissance," as it would revive a domestic industry that has been dormant for decades. The most recent time a utility ordered a new nuclear power plant in the U.S. was 1973.

Spurring the renaissance isn't just the tax breaks the administration is offering for the first six plants. Some utilities also are looking to nuclear power because of the soaring prices of natural gas and the prospect of controls on fossil-fuel generated power. Possible climate-change legislation wouldn't affect nuclear power, which doesn't generate the same pollutants.

However, the "Ad Hoc Utility Group," an industry collective that represents 85% of the utilities involved in producing nuclear power is nervous about securing adequate fuel supplies for nuclear power plants over the next 10 years. The group is lobbying the administration to allow Russia to sell enriched fuel directly to U.S. utilities.

That effort is opposed by USEC Inc., the Bethesda, Md., company that acts as the U.S. agent for Russian enriched fuel under a 1993 agreement that requires Russia to supply $12 billion of enriched uranium derived from its nuclear weapons to the U.S. USEC opposes the introduction of more Russian fuel, arguing that it could interfere with its plans to finance and build a new enrichment plant in the U.S.

The supply situation with uranium and enrichment facilities will be discussed today at an international gathering of nuclear power experts here. One speaker, Thomas L. Neff, a senior researcher at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, says the supply issues mean that "it will take heroic efforts to fuel the expected growth in nuclear power by 2015. Under the most positive assumptions you might just get there. But they may not pan out."

Mr. Neff, who has followed the nuclear fuel market for 30 years, blames the tightening uranium supply on a failure to open mines in the U.S. and elsewhere. Between 1987 and 2001, he says, stockpiles of processed uranium were "sold off really cheap." Some hedge funds, he adds, are exacerbating the situation by buying and holding uranium off the market in an effort to reap profits later.

The accident at the Canadian mine highlights the supply problem. In October, the ceiling of the nearly completed mine, located in Saskatchewan, collapsed and let in a flood of water. The mine's owner, Cameco Corp., says the mishap will delay completion for as long as three years. The mine could eventually supply 17% of the world's uranium demand, Cameco says.

The dwindling supply of uranium enrichment plants began after two U.S. facilities, built after World War II, shut down, leaving power-plant owners more dependent on the Russians. Natural uranium has less than 1% of the unstable isotope U-235, which must be concentrated to a level of 4% to 5% to make fuel for nuclear power plants. The concentration required to make nuclear weapons is closer to 90%. The concentration is done through a complex sifting process called enrichment.

USEC plans to build a $2 billion enrichment facility near Piketon, Ohio, scheduled to open around 2009, but it still must obtain the financing -- a concern for utility-plant owners who need an assured supply of fuel. The plant will use a type of high-speed centrifuges that haven't been commercially proven in the U.S. Currently USEC operates a plant near Paducah, Ky., built in the 1950s. "If anything happens to that, where do you go?" asks Jim Tramuto, a vice president of PG&E Corp., a San Francisco utility, and a leader of the Ad Hoc Utility Group.

"You want to have as many suppliers in the market as you can have," adds Mr. Tramuto, noting that most non-Russian suppliers already have promised their supplies of enriched uranium to buyers.

The Russians say they could supply more enriched uranium to the U.S., but they are blocked by an agreement with the Commerce Department that restricts their imports to the current levels managed by USEC. While the Russians have some additional near-term capacity, they say they will cut shipments to the U.S. in half after 2013, when the current agreement to use fuel derived from nuclear weapons ends.

"We're having our own nuclear renaissance," says Vladimir I. Rybachenkov, a counselor at the Russian embassy in Washington. He notes Russia recently announced plans to increase its use of nuclear power to generate electricity to 25% from 15%, which means it will need more of its uranium and enrichment facilities.

Still, Mr. Rybachenkov says, Russia is willing to help the U.S. if the limits on its near-term imports of enriched fuel are lifted. "If nothing happens by 2013, there will be a black hole in deliveries of enriched fuel for the U.S. from Russia," he predicts.

Clay Sell, deputy secretary of the U.S. Department of Energy and an architect of U.S. plans for more use of nuclear power, admits that there are near-term problems with both uranium and enrichment services, but adds: "We think it can all be managed."

His department is circulating a draft plan among U.S. power-plant owners that suggests that more enriched uranium fuel could be provided by "blending down" highly enriched uranium from retired U.S. nuclear warheads and by reprocessing uranium tails, or wastes from the process of enriching uranium for U.S. nuclear weapons.

"The higher uranium prices go, the more these tails look like money instead of trash," Mr. Sell says.

Getting more fuel from U.S. enrichment wastes, however, might require the Russians to enrich them, another option under discussion. Mr. Sell says the future U.S. supply picture may not be as bleak as the "black hole" described by Mr. Rybachenkov. "You've got to understand that a lot of what they're saying right now has to do with bargaining," he noted.

Media climate

Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican and chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, will hold a full committee hearing tomorrow on "Climate Change and the Media."

The hearing will look at how the media has presented scientific evidence regarding predictions of human-caused catastrophic global warming, the senator's office said.

"Senator Inhofe believes that poorly conceived policy decisions will result from the media's nonstop hyping of 'extreme scenarios' and dire climate predictions," said committee Communications Director Marc Morano. "This hearing will serve to advance the interests of sound science and encourage rational policy decisions."

Among those who are scheduled to testify at the hearing are geologist David Deming of the University of Oklahoma; paleoclimate researcher Bob Carter of Australia's James Cook University; Dan Gainor of the Business & Media Institute; Naomi Oreskes of the University of California at San Diego and professor Daniel Schrag of Harvard University.

The hearing will be held at 9:30 a.m. in 406 Dirksen Senate Office Building. It can be watched live on the Internet at http://epw.senate.gov/epwmultimedia/epwmultimedia.htm.

Brownback's step

Republican Sen. Sam Brownback said yesterday he is taking the first step toward a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

A vigorous abortion opponent, the Kansas senator pledged to make "issues of life," fiscal restraint and tax reform key components of his effort to woo supporters.

"I have decided, after much prayerful consideration, to consider a bid for the Republican nomination for the presidency," Mr. Brownback said. "There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture, and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion."

Mr. Brownback said he has formed a presidential exploratory committee, which will allow him to travel the country and raise money while gauging support for the Republican nomination, the Associated Press reports.

Thomas returns

Sen. Craig Thomas returned to work yesterday, about a month earlier than originally planned, after undergoing treatment for leukemia.

"I'm glad to be back," the Wyoming Republican told the Associated Press in a telephone interview from his office in Washington.

Mr. Thomas, 73, was released Saturday from Bethesda National Naval Medical Center. He began treatment for leukemia on Nov. 9.

He had said previously he didn't expect to return to the Senate until January.

Mr. Thomas won re-election last month to a third term while he was in the hospital, easily beating Democrat Dale Groutage with 70 percent of the vote.

Mr. Thomas said he continues taking medication and undergoing tests. "I think I'm through with the major treatment," he said.

The senator was diagnosed with acute myeloid leukemia, the most common form the cancer of the blood and bone marrow.

Dr. Brian Monahan, director of Hematology and Medical Oncology at the National Naval Medical Center, has said that most people with Mr. Thomas' physical condition and general health survive the cancer.

Amazing letter

"Washington has no shortage of bullies, but even we can't quite believe an October 27 letter that Sens. Jay Rockefeller and Olympia Snowe sent to ExxonMobil CEO Rex Tillerson. Its message: Start toeing the senators' line on climate change, or else," the Wall Street Journal says in an editorial.

The letter's essential point, the newspaper said, "is that the two senators believe global warming is a fact, and therefore all debate about the issue must stop and ExxonMobil should 'end its dangerous support of the [global warming] "deniers." ' Not only that, the company 'should repudiate its climate change denial campaign and make public its funding history.' And in extra penance for being 'one of the world's largest carbon emitters,' Exxon should spend that money on 'global remediation efforts.'

"The senators aren't dumb enough to risk an ethics inquiry by threatening specific consequences if Mr. Tillerson declines this offer he can't refuse. But in case the CEO doesn't understand his company's jeopardy, they add that 'ExxonMobil and its partners in denial have manufactured controversy, sown doubt, and impeded progress with strategies all-too-reminiscent of those used by the tobacco industry for so many years.' (Our emphasis.) The senators also graciously copied the Exxon board on their missive.

"This is amazing stuff. On the one hand, the senators say that everyone agrees on the facts and consequences of climate change. But at the same time they are so afraid of debate that they want Exxon to stop financing a doughty band of dissenters who can barely get their name in the paper. We respect the folks at the Competitive Enterprise Institute, but we didn't know until reading the Rockefeller-Snowe letter that they ran U.S. climate policy and led the mainstream media around by the nose, too. Congratulations."

Sebelius chosen

Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius will assume the chairmanship of the Democratic Governors' Association next year as the party enjoys its first gubernatorial majority in 12 years, officials said yesterday.

Mrs. Sebelius, who was elected to a second term last month, will succeed New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, said the officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to avoid upstaging an official announcement tomorrow.

Mrs. Sebelius, 58, prevailed in her Republican-leaning state with 58 percent of the vote on Nov. 7. Her vice chairman will be West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin III, who was elected in 2004, the Associated Press reports.

Civil rights award

The Congress of Racial Equality, one of the nation's oldest civil rights groups, has announced it will present an achievement award to Bishop Robert Morlino of the Catholic Diocese of Madison, Wis.

The award recognizes Bishop Morlino for exercising his free speech and religious free-exercise rights in the face of intense pressure designed to silence him -- and thereby chill the rights of others -- in the weeks preceding the recent marriage state constitutional amendment vote in Wisconsin. Bishop Morlino was targeted because he was the most visible proponent of the amendment measure banning same-sex "marriage" in Wisconsin, the group said.

For years, those seeking to invalidate America's marriage laws in court have attempted to advance their cause by invoking analogies to civil rights, the group said. This award is the first time that a major civil rights organization has publicly acknowledged the reality that the basic civil liberties of groups and individuals in America who believe in the protection of marriage are increasingly being challenged.

The award ceremony will take place Friday afternoon at St. Patrick's Cathedral in Madison.

Crude Awakening As Alternative Energy Heats Up, Environmental Concerns Grow (WSJ)

By Patrick Barta And Jane Spencer

Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

PONTIANAK, Indonesia -- Investors are pouring billions of dollars into "renewable" energy sources such as ethanol, biodiesel and solar power that promise to reduce the world's reliance on petroleum. But exploiting these alternatives may produce unintended environmental and economic consequences that offset the expected benefits.

Here on the island of Borneo, a thick haze often encloses this city of 500,000 people. The cause: forest fires that have blazed across the island. Many of them were set to clear land to produce palm oil -- a key ingredient in biodiesel, a clean-burning diesel fuel alternative.

The bluish smoke is at times so dense that it leaves the city dark and gloomy even at midday. The haze has sometimes closed Pontianak's airport and prompted local volunteers to distribute face-masks on city streets. From July through mid-October, Indonesian health officials reported 28,762 smog-related cases of respiratory illness across the country.

"I feel it in my breath when I breathe," said Imanuel Patasik, a 26-year-old delivery man, as he sat in one of Pontianak's many open-air coffee shops on a recent evening. When the smoke is really bad, he wears a mask to work, but still wakes up the next morning feeling sick. "It's part of life here," he sighed.

Seasonal rains have helped quell the fires over the past few weeks. But the miasma of smoke from Borneo and the island of Sumatra -- an annual phenomenon that blankets large parts of Southeast Asia in smog -- underscores a troubling dark side of the world's alternative-energy boom. Among other problems, the fires in Indonesia spew millions of tons of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, experts say. In doing so, they exacerbate the very global-warming concerns biofuels are meant to alleviate.

Such side effects are not an isolated problem. In Indonesia, Malaysia, Canada and elsewhere, forests are being slashed for new energy-yielding crops or other unconventional fuels. In India, environmental activists say, water tables are dropping as farmers try to boost production of ethanol-yielding sugar.

"Let's be brutally frank: [The push for alternative fuels] is going to cause significant changes for the environment," says Sean Darby, an equities analyst and expert on alternative energy companies at Nomura International in Hong Kong. He is most worried about the strain on water resources caused by accelerated crop production. Water, he says, is "just as precious" as oil.

Some experts are also concerned that crops for biofuels will compete with other farmland, possibly driving up global costs of basic food production.

It's not clear how serious these problems will become -- or whether they eventually will be resolved through new technologies and stricter environmental measures. Proponents of alternative energy, including some palm oil industry executives, say the dangers are exaggerated and are outweighed by the benefits new fuels promise.

"We're unfairly targeted," says M.R. Chandran, former chief executive of the Malaysian Palm Oil Association. He contends that the timber industry and local farmers are much to blame for destroying Indonesia's forests.

The alternative energy field "is almost like the Internet in terms of the pace of how fast all this is changing," says Chris Flavin, president of Worldwatch Institute, an environmental organization. He believes that new technologies could help resolve some concerns over collateral damage. One of the hottest, for example, is called cellulosic ethanol, which uses different kinds of waste -- including municipal garbage -- to create fuel.

In the U.S., questions about corn-based ethanol are swirling in academic and agricultural circles, in part because of the work of a Cornell University professor. David Pimentel, who teaches environmental policy, has long held doubts about the fuel's value. He argues that expanding corn production for biofuels would deplete water resources and pollute soils with added fertilizer and chemicals. It would also require huge volumes of traditional energy for farming equipment and ethanol-conversion facilities -- a toll that could nullify gains from the less-polluting fuel produced.

Other studies, including reports by researchers at the U.S. Department of Agriculture, have reached much more optimistic conclusions and have criticized Mr. Pimentel's methodology.

Big Implications for Business

Critiques of alternative energy -- even if they prove to be exaggerated -- could have big implications for business. Last year, investors globally poured a record $49 billion into energies such as solar power, ethanol and biodiesel, according to New Energy Finance, a London-based firm that specializes in analyzing renewable energies. That was a 60% increase from the previous year.

But commercializing many alternative fuels relies on political support in the form of government subsidies or tax incentives. So the rise of local resistance could jeopardize the new fuels' economic viability.

This is particularly true for palm oil, a once-mundane commodity whose price has climbed about 31% so far this year. The spike is partly attributable to demand for biofuels.

In October, a European Parliament committee recommended a ban on all biofuel made from palm oil, citing fears that the crop encourages deforestation in tropical countries. In Indonesia, activists helped block an $8 billion Chinese-backed project that would have created one of the world's largest palm-oil plantations.

And last month, one of Britain's largest power companies, RWE npower, a subsidiary of the German power giant RWE AG, said it would abandon a project that was to use several hundred thousand tons of palm oil a year to generate power. An environmental group, Friends of the Earth, had complained that the project would contribute to unsustainable global demand for palm oil, contributing to rain-forest destruction in South East Asia. RWE npower said it dropped the project because it couldn't secure an adequate supply of sustainably grown palm oil.

Most consumers still think of palm oil mainly as a source of cooking oil. The oil is squeezed from bunches of red fruit that grow on oil palms, primarily in Malaysia and Indonesia. But the oil can also be processed to make fuel. Then it's mixed with conventional diesel to form a hybrid energy source -- for instance, 80% regular diesel and 20% biofuel -- that can be pumped directly into fuel tanks.

Biodiesel offers lots of upsides. Renewable crops such as palm oil reduce the need for fossil fuels such as petroleum whose supplies are finite. It also burns more cleanly than carbon-based liquid fuel, releasing fewer of the gases thought to cause global warming.

As oil prices have surged, a number of companies, including Chevron Corp., have announced plans to build or invest in biodiesel plants. In a recent report, Credit Suisse analysts said there's enough refining capacity under development to produce as much as 20 million metric tons of fuel annually by late 2008. That capacity, more than twice that of today's levels, would "easily soak up" all the world's available palm oil -- creating even more demand for plantations.

Indonesian authorities hope to capitalize on such demand to bring economic growth to impoverished regions. The government is offering low-interest loans for plantation companies, with a goal of adding 3.7 million acres of new plantations over the next five years, an area more than half the size of New Hampshire. Officials maintain this can be done on designated land areas without causing widespread environmental damage.

Different Outcome

But what's happening on the ground in Borneo suggests a different outcome. Among the world's most fabled islands, Borneo -- which is divided between Indonesia and Malaysia -- is considered by environmentalists to be one of the last great tropical wildernesses. It's home to rare and unusual species, including the wild orangutan, the clouded leopard and the Sumatran rhinoceros.

It's also home to some of the world's last headhunters. The indigenous Dayaks resurrected the grisly practice as recently as the late 1990s in interethnic clashes. Some Dayaks still live in villages that can only be reached by river, and sleep in wooden "longhouse" buildings on stilts.

In the 1800s, Dutch and British traders began carving up parts of the island to produce rubber and other commodities. Later, Malaysian and Indonesian timber barons devastated millions of acres of forest logging tropical hardwoods. Today, only a little more than half of Borneo's once-ubiquitous forest cover remains, according to WWF, the global conservation organization.

Now, the palm-oil boom threatens what's left. In West Kalimantan, a province along the western coast, the palms cover about 988,000 acres or more, up from less than 37,000 acres in 1984. Fleets of orange and mustard-colored trucks ply the province's few paved roads, ferrying the oil to river ports.

The plantations have meant jobs and opportunities for many Dayak families. Some have even taken ownership stakes in the operations.

As residents are discovering, though, the spreading plantations have deleterious effects. They can alter water-catchment areas, destroy animal habitats and contribute to the months-long bouts of haze that spreads hundreds of kilometers across Southeast Asia.

As fires burn deep into the dry peat soil beneath Indonesia's forests, centuries of carbon trapped in the biomass are released into the atmosphere. A study presented last month at a U.N. Climate Change Conference in Nairobi showed that Indonesia is the world's third-biggest carbon emitter behind the U.S. and China, when emissions from fires and other factors are considered.

"Stopping these fires could be one way of getting rid of some significant carbon emissions to the atmosphere," says Susan Page, a senior lecturer at Britain's University of Leicester who studies carbon emissions in Southeast Asia.

To be sure, palm-oil plantations aren't the only cause of deforestation and smoke on Borneo. Loggers have degraded huge swathes of forest. And indigenous residents have long practiced their own form of slash-and-burn agriculture that involves setting fires to clear fields for planting.

But Indonesian environmental officials say plantation companies are exacerbating the problem, and some palm-oil executives concede their industry is partly to blame. Often, companies hack down the trees, leaving behind a mass of debris that must be removed before they can plant oil palms. The cheapest and easiest way is simply to torch it.

One new oil-palm plantation, four hours by dirt road from Pontianak, offers a glimpse of the fallout from the flames.

The plantation stretches across some 2,740 acres and features a series of blackened and largely bare hills. Charred stumps stick up from the soil and blistered tree trunks litter the ground. In the distance, a wall of misty jungle marks the border of the property.

Villagers nearby say smoke and flames from fires at the site destroyed fruit and rubber trees on which they relied. They also made many people in the area sick. One villager began acting like he was possessed and was placed in a cage where he remained for weeks, the village chief says.

Nearby, on a ridge overlooking the property, a man in a floppy sun hat who identifies himself as the plantation manager says he didn't know who started the fires. "We are one of the victims," says the man, Kong Tamcheng.

Mr. Kong says his employer, an Indonesian company called Incasi Raya Group, has a strict no-burning policy. He suggests the fire might have been started by a careless worker flicking cigarette butts, or by "interested parties" out to "smear" the company's reputation.

But Untad Dharmawan, director of environmental impact assessment for West Kalimantan, says Indonesian authorities are investigating nine palm-oil companies for illegal burning, including Incasi Raya Group and its manager, Mr. Kong. He displays a dossier of photos of the Incasi Raya site, adding that his department has witnesses with evidence the company started the fires.

Phone calls to Incasi Raya's office in Padang, Indonesia went unanswered.

Indonesian officials say they're doing the best they can to fight the fires and prevent illegal forest-clearing. Among other tactics, they hired two giant Russian planes to drop "water bombs" and launched projects to hand out water pumps to local villagers.

But they're hamstrung by tight budgets and the logistical difficulties of policing such a vast area with few roads. At best, "we can just minimize the spread" of fires, laments Mr. Dharmawan, the provincial environmental official.

Palm-oil companies, meanwhile, have joined with environment organizations, energy companies and others to set up a group known as the Roundtable on Sustainable Palm Oil that plans to certify plantation companies that follow guidelines to minimize ecological damage.

Back in Borneo, Tony Hartono, head of a local plantation association in West Kalimantan, says he still believes biodiesel derived from palm oil will play a big role in solving the world's energy problems. After all, "it's a renewable energy," he says. "It's our future."

Signs Of Energy (NYT)

It seemed to take forever, but the Bush administration has finally agreed to a strict timetable for establishing new energy efficiency standards for nearly two dozen commercial and residential appliances over the next five years. The agreement is good news for the environment. It is also a tribute to the persistence of 15 states, the Natural Resources Defense Council and various consumer groups that sued the Energy Department for failing to comply with longstanding Congressional mandates.

By some estimates, the new standards — covering items like dishwashers, ovens, clothes dryers, and heating and air-conditioning systems — could eventually save the amount of energy used by 12 million households, eliminate the need to build dozens of power plants and significantly cut emissions of carbon dioxide, the main global warming gas.

Congress ordered the Energy Department to make periodic updates in efficiency standards for appliances as part of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act of 1975. The Clinton administration strengthened standards for 10 appliances. But no new standards have been issued since 2001. In 2004, under pressure from manufacturers, the Bush administration actually tried to weaken standards for commercial air-conditioners, only to be rebuked by the courts.

In some cases, the technology already exists to meet stronger standards; the trick is to get manufacturers to incorporate them across the board. In other cases, the new standards would drive technology forward. The benefits are obvious, and Samuel Bodman, in his second year as secretary of energy, is to be commended for recognizing them.

FBI Computer System Faces Funding Gap (NSDY/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

WASHINGTON -- The FBI faces a $56.7 million funding gap as it builds a new computer system to replace a problem-riddled database of investigation files, Justice Department auditors said Monday.

With careful oversight, the Sentinel program still could be successful, auditors from the department's inspector general's office concluded. Even so, the Bush administration's funding request for this year's share of the $425 million system, set for completion in 2009, falls short of what the bureau said it needs keep it on track.

The FBI asked for an estimated $150 million in the fiscal year that began Oct. 1; the White House approved spending $100 million. Congress is not expected to approve the FBI's funding until next year.

A 112-page audit of the Sentinel system's progress "found that the FBI faces uncertainty" over how to meet the funding needs to continue building it.

Although the FBI expects to have about $50 million left over from earlier work on Sentinel and other bureau projects, auditors warned that pulling money from other programs "may have an adverse affect on the FBI's mission capabilities," the auditors said.

Responding, the FBI in a statement said the money needed "has long been identified from existing FBI balances, and will not impact operational programs."

The total cost for the computer program remains the same, the statement noted, adding that "at this time, Sentinel is within cost and schedule."

The funding concerns over Sentinel follow the FBI's decision last year to scrap a botched $170 million project to build a paperless case management system. FBI Director Robert Mueller abandoned the project, called Virtual Case File, after consultants said it was obsolete and riddled with problems.

Incoming Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., questioning whether the funding gap would bring cuts to the FBI's counterterrorism programs, said "mismanagement of this project seems to know no bounds."

"I remain seriously concerned about the handling of this project," Leahy said. "The American people cannot afford another fiasco."

Mueller is set to testify Wednesday at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on FBI oversight.

Sentinel is being built by Lockheed Martin contractors in four phases. Its designers currently are building an electronic records repository and a security network to limit its access.

FBI Computer Funding Is Uncertain (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

The Justice Department's inspector general warned yesterday that funding for the FBI's new Sentinel computer system is uncertain and that the program's final price tag could exceed its $425 million budget.

A 112-page audit by Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said that a current White House budget request includes only $100 million for Sentinel in fiscal 2007, although the FBI says it needs $57 million more to keep it going.

The FBI plans to make up the difference with leftover funds from other areas, but the audit warns that moving too much money "could erode the FBI's mission capability in counterterrorism, cybercrime and other important operational areas." Congress has yet to act on a budget for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1.

Sentinel is designed to give agents the ability to manage case files from computers at their desks. The audit is the second in a series of planned reviews by Fine's office; it warned in March that the FBI was at risk of repeating many of the same mistakes with Sentinel that it made with a failed attempt to build a computerized case management system, the Virtual Case File (VCF), to replace the FBI's antiquated paper-based system. VCF was abandoned in 2005 after costing the government $170 million.

Previous audits and reviews found that the FBI did a poor job of overseeing and managing VCF, and that the main contractor delivered a product that was incomplete and unusable.

In contrast to VCF, which was built from scratch, Sentinel will rely primarily on off-the-shelf commercial software adapted for the FBI. Lockheed Martin Corp. is slated to receive $305 million as the main contractor on the project, which is supposed to be begin operating by 2009.

Yesterday's audit also raised questions about the assumptions underlying the FBI's overall cost estimate, which is based on rough calculations and does not include $25 million in related improvements.

The FBI said in a statement that the extra money needed for the current fiscal year "has long been identified from existing FBI balances and will not impact operational programs." The bureau played down concerns about Sentinel's cost, saying the project "is within cost and schedule."

The newest report says the FBI has made "significant progress" in several key areas, including improving management controls and finding ways to ensure that the software will work as intended.

Fine made five specific recommendations to overcome various problems. FBI officials said they agreed with the ideas and had begun implementing them.

F.B.I. Overhaul Of Computers Is Facing A Gap Of $57 Million (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — The latest effort to overhaul the Federal Bureau of Investigation's antiquated computer system, still in its early stages, is already coming up short by $57 million, a Justice Department audit report concluded Monday.

The budget gap could force the F.B.I. to take money from law enforcement and other areas, the report by the Justice Department inspector general's office determined. It concluded that while the bureau had taken steps in the management of the project that provided a "reasonable assurance" of success, crucial financing and operational questions lingered.

The F.B.I. has struggled for more than a decade to modernize its computer systems and replace a record-keeping system that is still largely paper-driven — a task considered critical to strengthening antiterrorism operations. Widespread design and management problems last year forced the bureau to scrap the final phase of its case-automation system, known as Trilogy, after spending $170 million on the project.

Democrats said they planned to press Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., about the computer project when he appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday.

"After watching the F.B.I. waste five years and more than 170 million of taxpayer dollars on the Trilogy program, I remain seriously concerned about the handling of this project," Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will take over next month as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said Monday.

"The American people cannot afford another fiasco," Mr. Leahy said.

The findings by the inspector general came in the first status report that office has issued since March when the F.B.I. awarded the latest version of the project to Lockheed Martin. The company's part of the project, known as Sentinel, has an estimated value of $305 million.

For the current fiscal year, the Bush administration has sought $100 million for the Sentinel project, a request still pending in Congress. But the F.B.I. estimates that it actually needs $56.7 million more this year, the inspector general found.

The F.B.I. said in a statement on Monday that "the balance of $57 million has long been identified from existing F.B.I. balances, and will not impact operational programs." It said that "characterizations to the contrary are misleading."

The inspector general's report noted that the Sentinel project was still in its early stages, with the most difficult portions ahead. Nonetheless, it offered a somewhat more optimistic assessment than in the past.

"We believe that the processes the F.B.I. has established to manage and control the Sentinel project if implemented and carefully followed as Sentinel develops can provide reasonable assurance that Sentinel can be successful and that any deviations from cost, schedule, technical or performance baselines can be identified," it said.

In its formal response as part of the report, the F.B.I. said it welcomed the inspector general's findings and would be adopting all of the report's budget, management and staffing recommendations in an effort to keep the computer project on track. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Funding May Be A Sticking Point For FBI Tech Upgrade (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, December 5, 2006

The FBI is exercising more control over its $425 million information technology modernization effort than it did over the project's predecessor, but funding remains uncertain, according to an audit released Monday.

The FBI has made "significant progress" in addressing many initial concerns about the development of the case management system dubbed Sentinel, the Justice Department inspector general's office stated in the audit.

For instance, the FBI has made strides in staffing the project's program management office, auditors said. An October Government Accountability Office review found that the bureau had not properly analyzed its staffing needs.

But uncertainty about funding and cost estimates, and deficient contingency planning, must be addressed if the law enforcement agency is to avoid delays and other problems developing Sentinel, the IG report stated. This is particularly important as the project enters a high-risk second development phase in early 2007, it noted.

The FBI's fiscal 2007 budget request included $100 million for Sentinel, but an additional $56.7 million is needed to bridge the gap between requested funds and the program's requirements, the report stated.

According to the IG, about $50 million remains from the first phase of Sentinel and unspent balances in other accounts. But if the fiscal 2007 appropriation is less than the $100 million requested, reprogramming of other agency funds may be required to keep the project on track, the report stated. Reprogramming could diminish the agency's abilities in counterterrorism and cybercrime, the auditors said.

In a statement on the report, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said, "I remain seriously concerned about the handling of this project. The American people cannot afford another fiasco."

"Bush administration mismanagement of this project seems to know no bounds," Leahy said.

FBI Director Robert Mueller is scheduled to testify before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday.

Sentinel, a six-year effort to replace the failed Virtual Case File project, is intended to upgrade the FBI's old-fashioned paper-based system for managing investigations and information. Lockheed Martin Corp. won a $57 million task order in March to work on the first stage of the program, with options to earn $248 million for three additional phases.

Costs associated with Sentinel, such as changes to the FBI's National Name Check Program, security costs and employee salaries, were not included in the $425 million estimate for the project's overall costs, the report stated. Auditors estimated that more than $25 million in associated costs are not included in the FBI's estimate. An independent estimate of the project's price tag found that it could range from $329 million to $493 million, and would most likely fall at $438 million.

The IG recommended that the FBI update the project's estimated total cost as actual cost data becomes available, develop contingency plans for identified risks to the project and fill all vacancies in the program management office.

In a response to the report, the FBI agreed with all of the IG's recommendations.

Mollohan, Under FBI Probe, Is Poised To Control Bureau's Budget (BLOOM)

By Brian Faler And Michael Forsythe

Bloomberg, December 5, 2006

Dec. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Representative Alan Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat whose finances are being investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, is in line to take over the House panel that sets the bureau's budget.

Mollohan, 63, is the ranking Democrat on the appropriations subcommittee overseeing the Department of Justice, which includes the FBI. His party has a long-standing practice of awarding appropriations subcommittee chairmanships to senior members, and no other Democrat has announced plans to seek the post when the party assumes control of Congress next month.

The pending appointment poses an ethical dilemma for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, 66, who helped her party take control of Congress for the first time in 12 years by vowing to clean up a ``culture of corruption'' on Capitol Hill.

``If the Democrats want to be taken seriously as the party of ethics reform, then every time one of their members gets into trouble, they're going to have to take it seriously," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. Her organization is urging Mollohan to recuse himself from any decisions affecting the FBI's budget.

A spokesman for Pelosi, a California Democrat, didn't respond to repeated requests for a comment. Mollohan's office and the Justice Department declined to comment.

Net Worth

Earlier this year, the National Legal and Policy Center, a Falls Church, Virginia-based group that backs smaller government, filed a complaint with the department questioning an increase in Mollohan's net worth. For 2005, Mollohan and his wife reported assets worth $6.8 million to $25.7 million, up from $116,000 to $315,000 in 1999, when he restated financial disclosure forms after the group's complaint.

In May, Mollohan told the Washington Post that the FBI had subpoenaed a Washington-based real-estate company in which he had invested. In April, a nonprofit group set up under Mollohan's leadership, the Vandalia Heritage Foundation, said in a statement that it had been told by the FBI to expect a request for information.

Fairmont, West Virginia-based Vandalia and at least three other nonprofits have benefited from ``earmarks," specific projects inserted by lawmakers into spending measures, that Mollohan secured. Mollohan, in turn, received campaign donations and gifts to his family charity from the nonprofits or their employees, according to Federal Election Commission records.

Mollohan, who hasn't been charged with any crime, said in a June statement that his increase in net worth was a result of prudent real-estate investments.

A Rising Market

``We received a sizable inheritance, took on considerable financial risks and had the good fortune to be investing in a rising real-estate market," Mollohan said in the statement.

Mollohan stepped down in April from the House Ethics Committee in the wake of the investigation. He remained the ranking Democrat on the appropriations subcommittee, which also has jurisdiction over the Departments of State and Commerce.

Ken Boehm, chairman of the National Legal and Policy Center, urged Democrats to remove Mollohan from the appropriations committee and said appointing him chairman would represent a conflict of interest.

``Somebody who is under investigation should have no leverage over those investigating him, for reasons that are blindingly obvious," Boehm said. ``You can't have it both ways if in fact there's going to be a serious effort to root out what's called the `culture of corruption.'"

Backing Murtha

Mollohan's case is the third nettlesome personnel issue to face Pelosi since Democrats won control of Congress in the Nov. 7 midterm elections. Democrats rejected her preferred candidate for the No. 2 leadership job, Pennsylvania Representative John Murtha, in favor of Maryland Democrat Steny Hoyer amid complaints that Murtha had used his position on the defense appropriations subcommittee to direct federal dollars to political donors.

Pelosi later considered naming Representative Alcee Hastings of Florida, a former federal judge who had been impeached and removed from office, as head of the House Intelligence Committee. She ultimately named Silvestre Reyes of Texas to the job.

Drug Dealer Pleads Guilty In Cocaine Case Involving Mayor (NSDY/AP)

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. (AP) _ A former member of the Bridgeport Democratic Town Committee pleaded guilty Monday to federal cocaine charges, avoiding a trial that could have put pressure on Mayor John Fabrizi to testify.

Shawn Fardy, 36, convicted of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and distribution of cocaine, admitted buying cocaine from drug dealer Juan Marrero and then distributing some of that to others and keeping some for his own use. Marrero pleaded guilty in September.

Fabrizi admitted in June that he had used cocaine while he was in office and was getting treatment.

Fardy's attorney, Francis O'Reilly, has said prosecutors were relying on allegations that Fabrizi made against Fardy. Fabrizi met with the FBI at least twice and gave lengthy interviews that are contained in FBI reports, O'Reilly said.

Prosecutors have declined to comment on whether Fabrizi would be a government witness, but his name was among 41 people whose names may be mentioned during the trial or who may testify.

Jury selection was scheduled to start Tuesday. The trial was moved to New Haven after a judge found most prospective jurors were aware of the high profile case.

Fardy faces up to 20 years in prison and fines of $1 million when he is sentenced on Feb. 22.

Defense Attorney Pleads To Own Guilt (PALMBEACHP)

By Larry Keller, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), December 5, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Veteran criminal defense attorney John Garcia pleaded guilty Monday to federal charges of helping a drug dealer and former client conceal financial transactions and lying about it to drug enforcement agents.

U.S. District Court Judge Daniel T. K. Hurley called Garcia's admissions "an intensely sad day." He said Garcia, 45, of Lake Worth has represented many clients in his courtroom. "He has always done so with skill, with dignity. ... He's one of the outstanding members of the criminal bar."

Hurley set sentencing for Feb. 16. Garcia, married and the father of two daughters, will remain free on $100,000 bond until then. Sentencing guidelines call for a prison term of 18 to 24 months, defense attorney Richard Lubin said, but are not binding. Garcia also forfeited $75,000 to the government as a condition of his plea.

Garcia was arrested in September and charged with three counts of illegal money structuring and one count of making false statements to federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents. All are felonies.

His downfall began when agents began investigating drug dealer Joel McDermott in 2003 after learning he had a contract with Minto Homes for a $625,000 home in Wellington's Olympia development, and that he was making down payments with bank checks, not personal checks.

McDermott eventually was charged with and convicted of drug trafficking. He was sentenced to nearly 22 years in prison.

McDermott told federal agents that he gave Garcia $28,000 in drug profits in 2002, which Garcia deposited in his law practice trust account. Garcia then had two cashier's checks of $9,500 each and another for $9,000 issued to Minto Homes, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Carlton.

The next month, Garcia deposited $9,000 in McDermott drug profits into his personal account, which was used for the home, Carlton said. The scenario was repeated in September 2003, the government said.

By pleading guilty, Garcia admitted that he helped McDermott circumvent a law requiring financial institutions to report transactions of more than $10,000, the basis of the illegal money structuring charges. He also admitted lying to investigators about his own financial stake in the Wellington home and about buying cashier's checks.

Federal agents had a wiretap on McDermott's home from December 2003 through March 2004, Carlton disclosed. Garcia "was acting as a front on various business ventures" with McDermott, including renovations of a restaurant and a nightclub. Garcia lost thousands of dollars in those ventures, he said.

In one phone conversation between McDermott and Garcia that agents listened to, Garcia said his financial dealings, coupled with McDermott's lack of apparent employment, could be construed as money laundering, Carlton said. In return for Garcia's plea, the government agreed not to pursue the more serious money-laundering charges.

Garcia has been practicing law in Florida for more than 18 years. The Florida Bar cited him for "minor misconduct" in 1999.

Now that he's a felon, Garcia's law license will be suspended by the Bar. He faces possible disbarment. "There is a presumption of disbarment with a felony conviction," said Ken Marvin, director of lawyer regulation at the Florida Bar.

"It's a virtual certainty you're going to lose your right to practice law," Hurley told Garcia.

Afterward, defense attorney Lubin said Garcia's crimes weren't entirely motivated by financial gain. "He is generous to a fault," he said. "John is always helping people. He just helped this guy the wrong way."

West Palm Attorney Admits Helping Drug Trafficker, And Lying About It (FLSUNSEN)

By Missy Diaz, Sun-sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, December 5, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH -- Before the plea conference even got under way Monday morning, emotion overcame criminal defense attorney John Anthony Garcia.

At first Garcia sat stoically beside his attorney, Richard Lubin, as U.S. District Court Judge Daniel T. K. Hurley lauded Garcia's good work over the years representing his clients with "skill and dignity, " before acknowledging that Monday was "an intensely sad day."

Then, as he prepared to accept guilt on three counts of illegal money structuring and a count of lying to federal investigators, Garcia quietly choked back tears for a couple of minutes before regaining his composure and proceeding with the 90-minute hearing.

The charges against Garcia stem from his dealings with former client and convicted drug trafficker Joel McDermott, 32.

Garcia admitted to depositing $18,000 into his personal checking account -- once in 2002 and again in 2003 -- and $28,000 into his law firm's trust account to help McDermott buy a five-bedroom, $630,000 home in the Olympia community in Wellington. Garcia purchased Bank of America cashier's checks for McDermott, who's serving a 21-year federal prison sentence.

In early 2003, the Drug Enforcement Administration began investigating McDermott, who it suspected of trafficking in cocaine, ecstasy and marijuana, Prosecutor Stephen Carlton said. During that investigation, DEA agents came across records detailing the Olympia home, built by developer Minto Homes. McDermott made payments to Minto Homes with bank checks not from his own bank account. McDermott began cooperating with the DEA following his arrest for cocaine trafficking, telling agents that he gave drug-related profits to Garcia, who then bought the cashier's checks. The cash transactions were always under $10,000. Anything above that amount is required to be reported to the federal government.

The government has telephone wiretaps of conversations between Garcia and McDermott that show the men partnered in a "variety of business ventures," Carlton told the judge, adding that Garcia signed leases for a restaurant and a nightclub, though none of the ventures between the two turned a profit. The men can be heard commiserating over their financial losses in some of the phone conversations, the prosecutor said.

"John Garcia lost thousands," Carlton said.

The DEA gave McDermott $5,000 and had him ask Garcia to help him pay off a car loan. During the wiretapped conversation, Garcia can be heard willing to launder the funds, according to Carlton.

"For one thing, you don't have a job," Garcia explains to McDermott when asked how it could be considered money laundering.

The government eventually searched Garcia's West Palm Beach office and learned that he had used his firm's trust account to help McDermott. During a February interview by the feds, Garcia denied buying the cashier's checks for the Olympia home or having any financial interest in the property.

Garcia, a tall and handsome 45-year-old father of two, hung his head during much of Monday's colloquy. His wife Karen and a handful of the criminal defense bar showed their support from the gallery.

Garcia remains free on $100,000 bond. As part of his plea deal, he forfeited $75,000 to the government. Federal guidelines call for a prison term of 18 to 24 months, Lubin said, though Hurley will make the ultimate decision.

Sentencing has been set for Feb. 16. Garcia, who has represented many high-profile clients, included accused nanny killer Jerry Wiggins, is expected to lose his license to practice law as a result of the plea.

Outside court, Lubin said Garcia's renowned generosity led to his current troubles.

"John is always helping people and he just helped this guy in the wrong way this time," Lubin said.

Attorney Bert Winkler, who has known Garcia for nearly 20 years, dating back to their days as assistant public defenders, described him as a "generous individual and a genuinely good guy."

Colleague Franklin Prince recalled Garcia's quiet generosity in a variety of ways, from representing indigent clients to sponsoring youth soccer leagues and helping mentor young lawyers. He hopes the judge will consider those attributes when handing down a sentence.

"He's such a good friend, a hard-working lawyer and generous with his time and has helped many people over the past 18 years," Prince said. "John has a lot of friends that are supporting him and will be able to help in any way that is possible."

Supreme Court Lets Stand 55 - Year Term (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Filed at 10:30 a.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Supreme Court on Monday let stand a mandatory 55-year prison sentence, condemned as excessive by the federal judge who imposed it, for a man convicted of carrying a handgun during three marijuana deals.

Record producer Weldon Angelos received the minimum sentence under the law -- a harsher sentence than a child rapist or a terrorist who detonates a bomb aboard an aircraft would receive, according to his attorneys. The justices, without comment, left the prison term undisturbed.

Angelos was convicted of 16 counts of violating federal firearms, drug and money laundering laws in 2003. The charges stemmed from his sale of three 8-ounce bags of marijuana to an undercover informant.

He had a gun but never brandished or used it. Nevertheless, the three counts of possession of a firearm in a drug transaction required the mandatory minimum sentence.

Four former attorneys general and 145 former prosecutors and judges wrote in support of a lighter sentence for Angelos. Even the sentencing judge, U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell, an appointee of President Bush, called the sentence "unjust, cruel and irrational." But he said the law left him no choice.

Prosecutors said the sentence was appropriate and an appeals court agreed.

The case is Angelos v. U.S., 06-26.

Pentagon Resists Pleas For Help In Afghan Opium Fight (LAT)

By Josh Meyer, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

The DEA wants the military to take a larger role in stopping the drug trade, which experts say finances the insurgency.

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon, engaged in a difficult fight to defeat a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, has resisted entreaties from U.S. anti-narcotics officials to play an aggressive role in the faltering campaign to curb the country's opium trade.

Military units in Afghanistan largely overlook drug bazaars, rebuff some requests to take U.S. drug agents on raids and do little to counter the organized crime syndicates shipping the drug to Europe, Asia and, increasingly, the United States, according to officials and documents.

While the Pentagon and the Drug Enforcement Administration, or the DEA, have been at odds, poppy cultivation has exploded, increasing by more than half this year. Afghanistan supplies about 92% of the world's opium, and traffickers reap an estimated $2.3 billion in annual profits.

"It is surprising to me that we have allowed things to get to the point that they have," said Robert B. Charles, a former top State Department counter-narcotics official. "It we do not act aggressively against the narcotics threat now, all gains made to date will be washed out to sea."

The bumper crop of opium poppies, much of it from Taliban strongholds in southern Afghanistan, finances the insurgency the U.S. is trying to dismantle.

The DEA's advocates in Congress argue that the Pentagon could undermine the insurgency by combating the drugs that help finance it. Military officials say they can spare no resources from the task of fighting the Taliban and its allies.

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has said that Afghanistan's flourishing opium trade is a law enforcement problem, not a military one. It would be "mission creep" if the 21,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan were to turn their attention to opium, and it would also set a precedent for future combat operations, military officials say.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Afghanistan's police forces and British troops in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization peacekeeping operation have the primary responsibility for fighting the Afghan drug problem.

Military officials also fear that cracking down on opium traffickers could alienate the Afghan people and warlords who profit from the trade. An estimated one-eighth of the population is involved in poppy cultivation, and the opium trade is one-third of the country's economy.

The Pentagon has cooperated some with the DEA, but its resistance to doing more has drawn criticism from prominent congressmen, including Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the International Relations Committee.

Hyde and other lawmakers say the Bush administration is making a crucial mistake in not directing U.S. forces to collaborate with the DEA to take down those supplying the Taliban with cash, high-tech weapons and trucks.

"If we don't change the policy soon, and fight both drugs and terrorism simultaneously, Afghanistan may well fall into a failed narcotics state status," Hyde said in a statement.

Hyde has urged the White House and the Pentagon to look to Colombia as a model. Anti-narcotics agents there work closely with the military to target terrorism and drug trafficking.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai and other officials have asked for more help from the Pentagon, especially stronger support for the DEA.

"We are disappointed that there isn't more and closer cooperation between these two," said M. Ashraf Haidari, Afghanistan's Washington liaison to U.S. military and law enforcement agencies. "We have been saying this since 2003."

Haidari said the DEA and Afghan authorities needed "maximum military support both from ground and air." He complained that there was little coordination between the U.S. and international anti-drug efforts in Afghanistan.

The DEA has about 10 agents in Kabul, the Afghan capital, and rotates small teams of agents and intelligence analysts into the country, two at a time. The teams train and work with Afghan narcotics police, but also do their own investigations.

But DEA agents can't move about the mountainous terrain without helicopters and, in many cases, can't infiltrate well-protected drug operations without backup from troops.

Several dozen kingpins have emerged in the Afghan drug trade who are allied with the Taliban and Al Qaeda, current and former U.S. and Afghan officials said. In the last year, the drug bosses have become more brazen, richer and powerful.

U.S. and Afghan officials say the major traffickers and their hundreds of criminal associates prey on poor Afghan poppy farmers, openly run huge opium bazaars and labs that turn opium into heroin, and truck vast quantities of drugs into neighboring countries. They often return with night-vision goggles, land mines, sniper rifles and other high-tech weapons to use against U.S. and NATO forces.

Antonio Maria Costa, head of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, said in a recent interview that the location of major drug operations were "well-known to us and to the authorities." He said he recently watched a video of a heavily armed drug convoy of about 20 vehicles crossing into Iran.

"When you see narcotics trafficking that has the connotation of military operations, I am afraid we can only cope with them with military muscle," he said.

U.S. efforts have largely focused on small drug arrests and the State Department's program to eradicate poppy fields.

Publicly, DEA officials praise the Pentagon for its help and say coordination has improved. But two senior congressional aides said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy had been quietly campaigning for more Pentagon assistance.

"Behind closed doors she has been very adamant about how we need this stuff over there," a DEA official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Without the helicopters, we can't move. We're sure not going to go out in caravans with a couple of pistols."

Tandy testified in June that although DEA agents had developed leads in Afghanistan, the agency had "no operational infrastructure, assets or support to conduct operations" in Helmand province, where as much as half of Afghan heroin is grown and processed.

The Pentagon has promised as many as eight MI-17 helicopters for Afghan authorities to use in collaboration with U.S. military and law enforcement officials. But only two have arrived and are being used solely for training, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said. DEA officials cannot say when helicopters will be available for drug operations, he said.

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Todd Vician said that in the last two years U.S. troops had worked to support DEA efforts to combat the drug trade in Afghanistan "in the form of intelligence, planning, transportation of interdiction forces, medical evacuation and close air support if needed."

He also said Rumsfeld had authorized federal authorities, including DEA agents, to go on military operations in areas of known or suspected drug activity.

But in many cases the Pentagon has balked at drug interdiction efforts even when it had the resources, said a former senior U.S. anti-drug official, who declined to give details of what he said were classified operations.

"There were [drug] convoys where military people looked the other way, and situations where DEA sought [Pentagon] intelligence and it wasn't given to them," the former official said.

"DEA would identify a lab to go hit or a storage facility and [the Pentagon] would find a reason to ground the helicopters," the former official added. "They would say we don't want you to create a disturbance in an area where we're trying to chase down terrorists and the Taliban."

A recent congressional report said the DEA asked the Pentagon for airlifts on 26 occasions in 2005, and the requests were denied in all but three cases. The Pentagon said it had done better in 2006, approving 12 of 14 DEA requests for air support.

Several current and former DEA officials said the Pentagon efforts were mostly administrative and not related to raids and other enforcement efforts.

Hyde and Rep. Mark Steven Kirk (R-Ill.), a former naval intelligence officer, told Rumsfeld in an Oct. 12 letter that they wanted the Pentagon to allow DEA agents to ride along on more military missions in Afghanistan and to call them in when soldiers found a large drug stash or operation.

Eight days later, Rumsfeld wrote that he had asked one of his undersecretaries, Eric S. Edelman, "to look into this matter."

"We will get back to you as soon as possible," Rumsfeld wrote.

Hyde's aides say the congressman hasn't heard back.

60% Leap In Opium Production In 2006 (AN)

Asia News, December 4, 2006

Kabul (AsiaNews/Agencies) – Opium production in Afghanistan reached record highs this year despite international efforts to strangle it. This was recently revealed by the US government, in confirmation of a report by the UN Office on Drugs and Crime and the World Bank. In 2006, production is estimated to have grown by 61% after a 26% increase in 2005, for a total product of around 5,600 tons. This is 17 times more than the world's second producer: Myanmar. In the two main production provinces, Helmand in the southwest and Oruzgan in central Afghanistan, cultivation went up by 132%. Opium poppy covers only about 4% of cultivable land, but the crop is becoming more popular because it needs minimal care and irrigation. President Karzai declared opium as "Afghanistan's major enemy", worse than terrorism.

More than 90% of the world's heroin comes from Afghan opium. John Walters, White House drug policy chief, said the main causes for the failure to eradicate production were the resurgence of Taliban forces, which oppose US operations, and limited funds available for anti-narcotic and development programs.

But military sources believe the problem is more pervasive, with drug traffickers that have their own armies to pit against the force of 30,000 NATO soldiers deployed in the country. General James L. Jones, the supreme allied commander for NATO, said: "It would be wrong to say that this is just the Taliban… They [drug cartels] are buying their protection by funding other organizations, from criminal gangs to tribes, to inciting any kind of resistance to keep the government off of their back… They have their own capability to inflict damage, to make sure that the roads and the passages stay open and they get to where they want to go, even through Pakistan, Iran and Russia."

In Afghanistan, drugs fuel an industry of 2.6 billion dollars per year, a sum that equalled one-third of the country's GDP (Gross Domestic Product) in 2006. Although farmers who cultivate opium poppies receive only a small percentage of the profits, it is estimated that they earn 12 times as much income than for any other crop. So any attempts to eradicate cultivation meet violent local resistance.

This is one of the reasons why the Afghan government has prohibited aerial herbicide spraying, used by US anti-narcotic programs in Latin America. Instead, opium poppy plants in Afghanistan are destroyed by tractors. But only 38,500 of nearly 430,000 acres under cultivation were eradicated in 2006.

Panel Faults U.S.-Trained Afghan Police (NYT)

By James Glanz And David Rohde

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Five years after the fall of the Taliban, a joint report by the Pentagon and the State Department has found that the American-trained police force in Afghanistan is largely incapable of carrying out routine law enforcement work, and that managers of the $1.1 billion training program cannot say how many officers are actually on duty or where thousands of trucks and other equipment issued to police units have gone.

In fact, most police units had less than 50 percent of their authorized equipment on hand as of June, says the report, which was issued two weeks ago but is only now circulating among members of relevant Congressional committees.

In its most significant finding, the report said that no effective field training program had been established in Afghanistan, at least in part because of a slow, ineffectual start and understaffing.

Police training experts who have studied or had first-hand experience with the American effort in Afghanistan said they agreed with the report's findings, and some said they had warned for years that field training was the backbone of a strong program. But they said additional problems needed to be investigated, including the quality of private contractors and the cost and effectiveness of relying on them to train the police officers. In particular, the experts questioned why the report focused on United States government managers and only glancingly analyzed the performance of the principal contractor in Afghanistan, DynCorp International of Virginia.

Considering the state of the police force, an estimated $600 million per year will be needed indefinitely to sustain it, says the report, undertaken by the offices of the inspectors general at the Pentagon and the State Department. Howard J. Krongard is the inspector general at State, which led the work on the 97-page report, and Thomas F. Gimble holds the office at the Pentagon.

American advisers will also have to combat endemic corruption in the force, the report says.

Efforts to respond to some of the issues that the report identifies are already under way. Afghan and American officials recently announced that they had instituted an "auxiliary police" program at the end of the summer, which aims to hire 11,200 officers in parts of the country beset by Taliban attacks, primarily in the south.

But those officers receive only two of the standard eight weeks of training, and the police training experts say the program could worsen the situation. They say the new hastily created program could place ill-trained and poorly vetted officers in the field and allow militias and criminals to infiltrate the force.

An American official involved in the new effort said the program became necessary after southern governors besieged by Taliban attacks began hiring police officers on their own. American officials feared they were seeing the beginnings of de facto private militias.

"This was designed to avoid the creation of the militias," said the official, who was not authorized to comment publicly.

The training experts say the United States made some of the same mistakes in training police forces in Afghanistan that it made in Iraq, including offering far too little field training, tracking equipment poorly and relying on private contractors for the actual training. At the same time, those experts say, the failure to create viable police forces to keep order and enforce the law on a local level has played a pivotal role in undermining the American efforts to stabilize both countries.

In Afghanistan, the failure has contributed to the explosion in opium production, government corruption and the resurgence of the Taliban.

In Iraq, the challenge is even larger: Sectarian death squads have infiltrated the police force and helped push the country to what many are now calling a civil war.

"In both places we were extraordinarily late getting started," said Robert M. Perito, a policing expert at the United States Institute of Peace and a former National Security Council, State Department and Justice Department official. "In both places you have a dysfunctional Interior Ministry in control, and in both places the United States has tried to stand up a ministry advisory group to bring order out of chaos."

In an interview this fall, the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, said the violence in the country's south was partly a result of the lack of a viable force. He called for "much more support" from the United States and for an expansion of the country's force of roughly 70,000 officers.

"It is not that they are strong," he said, referring to the Taliban. "It is that we are not strong enough to defend ourselves."

Most of the $1.1 billion the United States has spent on the training program in Afghanistan has gone to DynCorp, a technical services company based in Falls Church, Va., with 14,000 employees in about 33 countries. DynCorp also won the largest part of the training work in Iraq; it received a total of $1.6 billion for its training and security work in Iraq and Afghanistan in the 2004, 2005 and 2006 fiscal years, according to Gregory Lagana, a company spokesman. The work accounted for roughly 30 percent of the company's revenue during those years. In May, the company raised $375 million in an initial public offering of its stock.

Under orders from the Defense Department, the company has deployed 377 police advisers to Afghanistan, roughly half the number the United States has deployed in Iraq. Police training experts say far more police advisers are needed in Afghanistan, which is roughly the same size as Iraq. The report says that management of the DynCorp contract by United States government officials in Afghanistan has fallen into a state of disarray; conflicting military and civilian bureaucracies could not even find a copy of the contract to clarify for auditors exactly what it called for.

The report does not suggest that DynCorp held any responsibility for the program's failures, but former Afghan officials and several American policing experts who have examined DynCorp's training on the ground say that the company is partly to blame for long delays and that the use of private contractors for training should be reviewed. Afghan officials have complained about the high cost of the advisers and have said that some have too little experience.

Ali Jalali, an Afghan-American military historian who served as interior minister from 2002 to 2005, said the expertise level of some DynCorp advisers sent to his ministry was mixed. He said he rejected the first group he was offered because their résumés were unimpressive. When a second group arrived, some were retired officers not up to the demands of working in Afghanistan, he said. Others knew virtually nothing about the country.

"They were good on patrols in Oklahoma City, Houston or Miami," said Mr. Jalali, now a professor at the National Defense University in Washington. "But not in a country where you faced rebuilding the police force."

Mr. Lagana defended the company's work and said State Department officials closely monitored their activities. He said the Interior Ministry advisers who drew complaints regarding their experience level were removed.

"We filled positions based on the requirements and salary levels authorized by the State Department," Mr. Lagana said. "As we went along, everyone realized we needed people with experience at higher levels in law enforcement."

Seth Jones, an Afghanistan expert at the RAND Corporation who has made eight trips to Afghanistan since 2003 to study army and police training, called for a review of the company's performance. He said he had repeatedly heard complaints from both Western and Afghan officials in Afghanistan about the quality and experience of DynCorp's advisers.

"I was surprised, based on what I have seen on the ground, that DynCorp was let off the hook so easily," he said of the report. "I think a very frank assessment of DynCorp needs to be done."

Mr. Krongard, the State Department inspector general, acknowledged the seriousness of the report's criticisms. But he said in a statement in answer to questions about the report that in the face of obstacles like largely illiterate recruits, low pay and corruption, the program was "generally well conceived and well executed," but that for the police force to be self-sustaining, "long-term U.S. and international assistance and funding will be required at least beyond 2010."

The report concluded that the official figure of 70,000 trained police officers was inflated and that only where American advisers were present was the counting reliable to some degree.

As a best estimate, the report said that 30,395 Afghan officers — fewer than half the official total — were "trained and equipped to carry out their police functions."

The report also says that the vetting process for recruits, intended to keep the Taliban and people with powerful sectarian or tribal loyalties out of police ranks, has not been effective. After recruits are trained, they are often assigned by local police commanders to menial tasks like guard duty.

The international effort lost critical time when it initially mounted a token effort to train officers in Afghanistan, according to Afghan officials and policing experts. For the first two and a half years after the fall of the Taliban, no systematic police training program existed outside of Afghanistan's capital, according to American and Afghan officials. The United States focused on training a new multiethnic army and paid little attention to the need for policemen. Germany pledged to train a new force but sent only 40 police advisers to Kabul.

Then, in 2004, the State Department issued a contract to DynCorp to deploy 30 police advisers across Afghanistan and construct seven regional training centers.

The United States spent $164 million building and running the training centers; recruits received two to four weeks of training. The effort was poorly monitored and achieved mixed results, according to a June 2005 report by the Government Accountability Office.

In April 2005, the Defense Department took over police training in Afghanistan and drastically expanded the number of American police advisers; the number is 377 today. Still, police training experts said the Afghanistan effort remained far too small, with small teams of advisers each expected to field train thousands of Afghan policemen.

The small corps of advisers also makes it more difficult to track equipment, and the report said that just 3,000 of 5,000 vehicles issued to the police nationwide could be accounted for. Although the report does not explicitly connect its warnings on corruption to the loss of equipment, the two appear to be closely related.

The weakness of the police has contributed to Afghanistan becoming the world's largest producer of opium, accounting for 92 percent of the world's supply, experts said. A report issued by the United Nations Office of Drug Control and the World Bank on Tuesday found that corruption had stymied efforts to counter opium production and that a handful of politically connected traffickers increasingly dominated the drug trade.

"The drug industry in Afghanistan is becoming increasingly consolidated," the report says. "At the top level, around 25-30 key traffickers, the majority of them in southern Afghanistan, control major transactions and transfers, working closely with sponsors in top government and political positions."

The report on police training strongly recommends expanding the advising program to take care of some of those problems but points out that an expansion would cost the United States much more money "as well as increasing the risk to U.S. personnel."

Outside View: Russia And Afghan Drugs (UPI)

By Pyotr Goncharov, Upi Outside View Commenatator

United Press International, December 5, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 4 (UPI) -- It will take more than two or three years to fight drug trafficking from Afghanistan, according to a joint report of the World Bank and the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime published recently.

"History teaches us that it will take a generation to render Afghanistan opium-free," the report reads. To eradicate this evil, "support to farmers, the arrest of corrupt officials and eradication measures must be concentrated in half a dozen provinces ... so as to free them from the scourge of opium."

Not a very optimistic forecast. Especially for Russia, which is the main target of Afghan drug trafficking, standing in its way to Europe. By November this year, the Russian Federal Service for Control of Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Circulation alone confiscated over 80 tons of drugs from Afghanistan, including two tons of heroin.

Moscow, however, was not too upbeat about the outlook for fighting Afghan drugs even before the release of the report. The Service's director, Viktor Cherkesov, says that measures taken in Afghanistan by the international community and the Afghan government, are insufficient and their efficiency is extremely low. International programs for financing alternative crops (such as cotton instead of opium poppy) have failed.

Moreover, criminal structures that control heroin production in the country are often close to the Afghan regional authorities. This means that those who are responsible for fighting drugs are most interested in the industry's prosperity. So it would be ridiculous to make any optimistic predictions.

Hopes vested in the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan are also ungrounded. The coalition can do little when the Afghan authorities have almost no control over the situation outside Kabul, so it is difficult to launch programs that would cover the whole country.

Moscow is still quite critical about ISAF and NATO's stance on fighting drugs. Anatoly Safonov, the Russian president's envoy on counter-terrorism, said he disagreed with NATO commanders that destruction of opium poppy crops by ISAF would only aggravate relations with the local population. "We believe that this is a deadlock," he said when commenting on these statements.

A voice in the wilderness. What does NATO have to do with it if the U.N. Security Council does not give ISAF the go-ahead to destroy opium crops? The United States, whose troops are the backbone of the anti-insurgent coalition, is not going to do it either, justifying its refusal with impressive statements. Former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld said once that as Afghan drugs were planted on Russian and European money, it was Russia and Europe that should address the problem. What he meant was that the United States did not care.

There are serious objections as well. The above-mentioned UNODC report says that destruction of opium poppy crops, planted by the poorest Afghan farmers, should be done with extreme caution in order not to aggravate the situation.

What is Russia to do then? Is there a way out of this vicious cycle?

Maj. Gen. Alexander Yanevsky, head of the Drugs Control Service's department for inter-department preventive interaction, says that Russia has 342,000 people officially diagnosed as drug addicts. Overall, the country has up to six million drug addicts. The situation in Europe is no better, although addicts there prefer cocaine and marijuana to Afghan opium.

Perhaps, it is worth considering a proposal made by the Senlis Council, an international drug policy think tank based in Europe. It believes that Western countries should officially buy opium poppy from Afghanistan and then license it to produce pain killers. The Afghan state would benefit and establish at least partial control over the poppy fields. More importantly, this would be a severe blow to illegal drug trafficking.

This year, opium poppy crops in Afghanistan have surged 60 percent against last year, according to the United Nations, and production of opium -- used to produce heroin -- will be up at least 50 percent by year's end. This means that Afghanistan can export over 600 tons of premium quality heroin to Europe this year. Russia has already confiscated about two tons. There's some tough work still left in store.

Colombian Drug Czar's Brother Arrested On Cocaine Charge (CNN)

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- Colombia's drug czar said police arrested his brother over the weekend with six grams (0.2 ounces) of cocaine.

Carlos Albornoz, head of the National Drug Directorate responsible for Colombia's drug-control policies, said in a news conference Sunday his brother Ivan Albornoz was arrested shortly after buying the drugs Saturday night in southern Bogota.

The anti-drug official said President Alvaro Uribe asked him to continue in his job.

"My family and myself are obligated to confront a situation that we never foresaw," said Albornoz, a former Senator. "The curse of drugs, which I've dedicated myself to combat aggressively, is among us."

Albornoz said he was unaware of his brother's drug use and expected him to be treated with the same severity as any other Colombian citizen.

The six grams (0.2 ounces) of cocaine found on Albornoz, a 49-year old architect, was more than the maximum amount permitted by a controversial 1994 court ruling that decriminalized small amounts of cocaine, heroin and other drugs for personal usage.

Uribe, whose government receives about $500 million a year in anti-narcotic aid from the United States, has vowed to change that ruling with a constitutional amendment.

Colombia is the world's largest producer of cocaine and almost every family in the country has in one way or another been touched by the drug trade, including other top anti-drug officials.

In May, the brother of Gen. Oscar Naranjo, head of judicial police responsible for pursuing Colombia's drug cartels, was arrested in southwestern Germany in possession of 100 kilograms (220 pounds) of drugs.

IMMIGRATION:

Ga. Senator's Wife Fights Deportation (AP)

By Giovanna Dell'orto

AP, December 5, 2006

State Sen. Curt Thompson has been a strong advocate of immigration rights, once speaking in Spanish from the steps of the Georgia Capitol against the adoption of some of the nation's strictest immigration controls.

Now Thompson's Colombia-born wife is in hiding as federal immigration officials try to deport her.

Sascha Herrera, 28, has been in hiding since Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers arrived at her home Nov. 28 with an order to remove her from the U.S. She was not home at the time.

Her attorney, Charles Kuck, claims she was duped by a man handling her immigration requests and that she never received the immigration notices that triggered her deportation order. While Kuck says neither he nor her husband know where Herrera is, he said that she will turn herself in Tuesday.

"It's the right thing to do. She needs to get the law to work for her," Kuck said.

Kuck filed a petition Monday to halt her deportation order and reopen her case, arguing that a man filed an asylum petition on her behalf without her knowledge and before her husband sponsored her green card application based on their April marriage.

The deportation order stems from Herrera's repeated failure to appear before a judge on the asylum application, which Kuck said she did not know had been filed.

The case hinges on whether Herrera received a notice to appear in court, and whether the asylum application could have been filed without her knowledge, said Victor Cerda, former general counsel for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

According to Kuck, Herrera came to the U.S. — where her parents have been living — on a visitor visa in 2003. She applied for an extension to the visa through a "notario" — a man who claimed he was qualified to handle legal immigration matters — but did not get it until 20 days before the extension was due to expire.

The notario then suggested an asylum application, which Herrera signed, but she got a "bad vibe" from the man and decided not to proceed, Kuck said.

Later in 2004, she was accepted as a student at Kennesaw State University, which got a student visa for her. She then told the notario she did not want anything to do with him.

She met Thompson last year and they got married in April, when he applied for her to become a permanent resident. Kuck said Herrera's husband, a Democrat and attorney, would not comment on the case.

But in the meantime, the notario filed the asylum application, listing his address as hers. A telephone number listed for the notario, identified as Tomas Vilela, was being answered Monday by a fax machine.

Cerda said the deportation order in the asylum case would trump any pending green card application and trigger mandatory detention.

Her decision to hide could hurt her request for a judge's stay on deportation, Cerda said. If she turns herself in, she could remain in the U.S. while her petition is pending, either in jail or released on bond.

Minuteman Consulting Charity Fined (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

One of the charitable organizations cited by Minuteman Civil Defense Corps boss Chris Simcox on why financial accountability concerns raised by some corps members were unfounded has been fined for failing to keep its own financial records in order, The Washington Times has learned.

The Declaration Foundation, a tax-exempt charity created by conservative activist Alan Keyes, who has vigorously supported the Minuteman movement, was fined $6,500 in August and prohibited by the Pennsylvania Bureau of Charitable Organizations from soliciting donations until it becomes "properly registered."

The Aug. 18 "agreement and order," signed by Declaration Foundation Executive Director Mary Parker Lewis, a top Minuteman adviser, acknowledged that the charity made false statements in seeking to solicit donations, failed to properly administer money it had collected, and withheld documents sought as part of an "investigative subpoena."

According to the bureau, the Declaration Foundation failed over a four-year period to submit audited financial statements, gave false information when it said it did not share revenue with other nonprofit or tax-exempt groups, and misstated the truth when it said none of its officers or employees was tied to any vendor providing services or goods.

The bureau said the Declaration Foundation improperly shared revenue with the Declaration Alliance, another tax-exempt charity founded by Mr. Keyes, which also has been active in overseeing the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps (MCDC).

The Declaration Foundation is at the center of an intricate weave of conservative organizations founded by Mr. Keyes or tied to longtime Keyes associates now working with MCDC. They have served as mentors for Mr. Simcox and provided consulting and financial services for the group's fundraising and media activities.

According to Internal Revenue Service records, the Declaration Foundation reported more than $600,000 in contributions over the past two years and the Declaration Alliance, in its 2004 IRS filing, the latest available, reported more than $1.7 million in donations. The two organizations list the same Reston, Va., address as its place of business.

MCDC describes itself as a "project" of the Declaration Alliance. The Minuteman political action committee, which raised hundreds of thousands of dollars in political contributions this year, is formally known as the Declaration Alliance Minuteman Civil Defense Corps Political Action Committee, according to Federal Election Commission records.

Connie Hair, spokeswoman for MCDC and Mr. Keyes, said she had been asked not to talk with The Times.

Mr. Simcox did not respond to e-mails concerning the Pennsylvania order.

But Mr. Simcox, who co-founded the Minuteman movement in April 2005, has told The Times and said on the Minuteman Web page that the Declaration groups offered "an experienced organization for mass mailings, advertising and public relations" and the ability to conduct a "fully accredited and independent audit" of MCDC finances.

He said he had "complete confidence in the professional firms we have retained to perform fiduciary responsibility and accounting for the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps" and that he had "checked these people out very carefully before agreeing to work with them." In a July interview, he accused his critics of being racists and disgruntled former MCDC members.

Mr. Keyes and his supporters have been tagged in the past on suspected violations involving contributions, including a December 2002 finding by the Federal Election Commission that said his 2000 presidential campaign owed the government more than $220,000 for questionable contributions, nonqualified expenses, improperly handled checks and other ineligible expenses.

Mrs. Lewis, who signed off on the Pennsylvania agreement and order, served as chief of staff to the Keyes 2000 campaign.

Several current and former MCDC members have questioned the whereabouts of hundreds of thousands of dollars in donations collected since the Minuteman movement began in April 2005.

In interviews this week, they said the organization's first IRS filing as a 501(c)4 tax-exempt charity on Nov. 15 failed to answer many of their concerns. They said, for example, there was no accounting in the new filing for at least $150,000 in the $50 registration fees required of the 4,000 Minuteman volunteers.

Others questioned why the IRS financial statement included mention of the construction of a border fence, since the filing listed MCDC contributions and expenditures only for 2005. They noted that Mr. Simcox began the fence project in April 2006.

In a statement posted on the MCDC Web site, the group's board of directors, which Mr. Simcox heads, decided that "this year and this year only" it would make public the organization's financial records. The statement did not address the fact nonprofit organizations such as MCDC are required to file annual financial statements, which are available to the public.

TAX:

Westminster Man Told To Stop Running Tax Scheme (BSUN/AP)

The Associated Press

The Baltimore Sun, December 5, 2006

He falsely advised clients that they did not need to pay taxes

A Westminster man has been barred by a federal judge from running a scheme in which he promised to help members avoid paying federal taxes, the U.S. Department of Justice announced today.

The "Save-A-Patriot Fellowship" run by John Baptist Kotmair Jr. falsely advised that clients didn't have to pay taxes and could legally withdraw from the Social Security system, U.S. District Judge William Nickerson said in his ruling. Despite legal action by the U.S. Justice Department, Kotmair's organization continued to file frivolous protest letters with the Internal Revenue Service on behalf of more than 800 clients and showed "no inclination ... to cease their activities," Nickerson noted.

Nickerson's order, issued last week, permanently bars Kotmair and his organization from representing or assisting anyone in corresponding with the IRS, or preparing court filings relating to income taxes. Kotmair and his organization must also notify all individuals involved in the scheme of the injunction and provide the Justice Department with the names of the customers, their e-mail addresses and telephone and Social Security numbers.

The injunction also must be posted prominently on the organization's Web sites for a year, and fraudulent promotional materials must be removed from the sites.

How The IRS Failed To Stop $200M In Bogus Refunds (USAT)

By Kevin McCoy

At least two months before the IRS mistakenly began paying an estimated $200 million in fraudulent or erroneous 2006 tax season refunds, the agency was warned about potentially “catastrophic” problems in a new computer being developed to avert such a blunder.

A USA TODAY examination of the IRS Electronic Fraud Detection System project found the previously unpublicized November 2005 warning, along with other warnings and new details of missteps that culminated in one of the most costly and embarrassing episodes in the tax agency's recent history.

As the peak of the 2006 tax season approached last spring, the IRS discovered that a planned upgrade of the agency computer that red-flags potentially fraudulent tax refunds had failed. The discovery came after the IRS had shut down the older computer. The failure forced the agency to continue processing 2006 tax season returns — and issuing refunds — without its first line of electronic defense against fraud.

USA TODAY's review found that the IRS lacks a comprehensive plan to recover the $200 million, which the agency said represents far less than 1% of all 2006 tax season refunds. That means most fraudulent filers who got federal checks in 2006 will likely never be caught.

Today, as the 2007 tax season looms, the IRS is restarting the older computer, because the nearly $21 million planned successor still isn't operable.

"I would say it is one of the more significant disappointments of my tenure," IRS Commissioner Mark Everson said in a recent interview. The blame, he said, "lies both within the IRS and at the contractor," because both "totally misjudged the complexity and the difficulty of this system."

The IRS managed to identify and stop some fraudulent 2006 tax returns without the computer. But Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said the agency's failure to see beyond rosy projections on the computer project and act on the warnings had hurt millions of Americans.

"There's a lot of fraudulent tax returns that are filed … and for at least last year, they're all going to get off scot-free," says Grassley. "And it's not just that they're getting off scot-free — it's that the honest taxpayers become the suckers."

The Electronic Fraud Detection System is the IRS' second-largest repository of taxpayer data. Every tax return that claims a refund is run through the computer, which is designed to flag potentially suspicious claims for additional review under the agency's Questionable Refund Program.

The IRS decided to upgrade the then-6-year-old computer in 2001 to keep pace with new refund fraud schemes and to enable investigators to use the system via the Internet. Nine companies bid on the upgrade, the IRS said. DynCorp, a computer firm based in Reston, Va., won. In 2003, California-headquartered Computer Sciences Corp. (CSC) acquired DynCorp, and became the main contractor.

The IRS planned to switch to the upgraded computer in time for the 2005 tax season. But multiple problems arose, delaying the planned start-up to early 2006. IRS officials said the agency's own personnel and CSC representatives repeatedly voiced confidence the new computer would start on schedule.

During a Jan. 17 meeting at Everson's Washington office, IRS Deputy Commissioner John Dalrymple said, CSC projected a mid-February start date. The timing was crucial, Dalrymple said, because the IRS had shut down the older computer months earlier. By autumn 2005, he said, it couldn't be restarted for 2006.

But the promised February date came and went. By late March or early April, "It was clear to us that we were not going to be able to bring the Web-based system up at all," said Dalrymple.

Everson said he and other top IRS officials relied on repeated assurances in which the agency's managers on the computer project and CSC personnel said the new computer would be up and running as scheduled.

However, internal IRS documents obtained by USA TODAY, including a $400,000 post-failure assessment of the project, show the agency received multiple warnings about serious problems.

In a Nov. 10, 2005, memo, CSC personnel who worked on the project outlined "10 most critical EFDS (Electronic Fraud Detection System) risks" they said had to be resolved by the company and the IRS "before they become catastrophic." The problems included:

•"Extremely slow" communication between IRS computers and those used by CSC. The problems, chronic since June 21, made the communication so slow that at times, it's like using a "dial-up connection from home" that requires "2-3 minutes to do even the simplest of tasks, such as sending an e-mail."

Unless the problem was addressed, the memo warned, the IRS risked "putting the entire EFDS project in jeopardy."

•Repeated delays in setting up a large Oracle-manufactured computer network capable of handling massive volumes of data. Failure to rectify the problem by Dec. 9, 2005, the memo warned, raised the prospect that the new IRS computer "may not be ready to go into production" as scheduled.

•Computer servers that the contractor used for data conversion shut down frequently, halting work. The company wasn't alerted to a weekend shutdown on Oct. 15, 2005, until two days later.

CSC has not been fined or sanctioned by the IRS, and continues to work on restarting the older Electronic Fraud Detection System. The firm declined to discuss specifics of either the warning memo or the project.

James Sheaffer, president of the firm's federal contracts sector, issued a statement that said: "We are contractually obligated to address any current or anticipated issues or problems that could, in our best judgment, interfere with our scheduled performance. That is exactly what we were doing in the '10 critical issues' document."

Dalrymple said the problems in the memo had all been addressed before top IRS officials learned the new computer would not start on time and did not "have anything to do with what the problem was with the root cause of the failure." The key problem, which Dalrymple said was only determined during a March 2006, test, was that the new computer "couldn't load a full day's worth of data in one day. And when you can't do that … you just fall further and further behind."

Yet, the IRS' post-failure assessment, obtained by USA TODAY under the Freedom of Information Act, found that some of the problems in the CSC warning memo "contributed to the delay" of the project.

The assessment also said "multiple warning signs calling for more formal oversight reviews were missed by multiple organizations." It cited a mistaken IRS designation of the project as low-risk and low-complexity, the "inexperience of key personnel and questionable judgment and decision-making by key IRS and Computer Sciences Corp. management," plus IRS budget and staffing cuts and turnover in CSC personnel.

"Many of the most critical issues were entirely preventable," concluded the assessment, which also reported the new computer could eventually be implemented with additional work.

A recent audit by the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration identified other warnings. As early as April 20, 2005, an e-mail from workers on the project reported problems with computer data loads, the audit found. That was the same issue Dalrymple identified as the most critical.

On Dec. 22, 2005, an IRS information technology specialist found "significant inaccuracies" in reports submitted by CSC, the auditors found. Although the firm said annual data loads were 50% complete by Dec. 20, "the IRS was advised by the contractor's technical staff that the data loads had never been started."

"We were told the IRS advised the contractor of this situation, but did not pursue the matter," the auditors wrote.

The computer project "was a perfect example of where anything can go wrong, it did," said Michael Phillips, the Treasury deputy inspector general who led the audit. Signaling the depth of the IRS' embarrassment, the agency took the rare step of proposing to fire two administrators who oversaw the computer project, and suspend a third. One manager has retired, and administrative appeals for the others are pending, the IRS said.

In all, the Treasury audit concluded the IRS "inefficiently used" at least $20.5 million in development costs on the computer project. That comes on top of the $200 million in estimated fraudulent refunds. The audit also estimated that the IRS could have mistakenly paid as much as $318.3 million in fraudulent refunds during the 2006 tax season.

The IRS, however, pegged the loss at roughly $200 million after nearly all 2006 federal tax season returns were processed. Everson said there's little chance IRS will collect the bulk of the erroneously issued checks.

"We're not going to go back. … That's gone," he said. "If you look at stopping frauds on refunds, you either stop it upfront, or it's very hard to get that money."

The IRS said it was able to freeze 84,000 questionable refunds using other safeguards. All tax data filed in 2006 has been loaded into the old Electronic Fraud Detection System, Everson said, as the agency prepares for the approaching tax season. Any 2006 tax returns flagged as potentially suspicious could prompt the IRS to check those filers' 2005 returns, Everson said.

While acknowledging the enormity of the $200 million loss, Everson said the total is outweighed by $2.3 trillion the IRS collects in tax revenue, and millions more saved in modernization efforts. He also voiced confidence that the older computer would be successfully restarted for the 2007 tax season set to start next month.

"I have every reason to believe that we'll be successful," said Everson.

At least one federal official isn't quite as sanguine. Nina Olson, head of the IRS National Taxpayer Advocate's office, criticized the agency earlier this year for failing to notify filers whose tax refunds were frozen while investigators checked for potential fraud. Olson said many of those taxpayers were blameless.

"The fact that the old computer system is going back on line for 2007 raises questions for me about whether it will continue to freeze refunds that should not be frozen," said Olson.

"We could have the same problem again."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Votes In Doubt, Bolton Resigns As Ambassador (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — President Bush reluctantly accepted the resignation of the United Nations ambassador, John R. Bolton, on Monday, conceding that the envoy could not win Senate confirmation and signaling that the administration was unwilling to make another end run around Congressional opponents in order to keep Mr. Bolton in his job.

Ending more than a year of controversy surrounding the blunt-spoken ambassador, Mr. Bush issued a strongly worded statement excoriating Mr. Bolton's opponents on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for refusing to send his nomination to the Senate floor for a vote.

"They chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time," Mr. Bush said. "This stubborn obstructionism ill serves our country, and discourages men and women of talent from serving their nation."

Mr. Bush went on to praise Mr. Bolton, a fiery conservative and longtime critic of the United Nations, thanking him for his "advocacy of human rights and human dignity."

Despite the president's strong words, administration officials had largely given up on Mr. Bolton's confirmation last month, after Sen. Lincoln Chafee, a Rhode Island Republican and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, said he would not support it.

It was not immediately clear who would replace Mr. Bolton. The leading candidate appeared to be the American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, who has told colleagues he is ready to leave Baghdad. Others said to be in the running are Richard S. Williamson, former ambassador to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, Sen. Mike DeWine, the Ohio Republican who lost his re-election bid, and R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs.

Mr. Bolton's decision to step down brings to an end the stormy and controversial tenure of an ambassador whose confrontational style often conflicted with the understated ways of the United Nations.

To his critics, he was an abrasive proponent of a hard-line, conservative ideology at odds with the multilateral approach at the United Nations. But his supporters pointed to numerous successes: several Security Council resolutions, including measures seeking to slow or halt the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea and another ending the war in Lebanon and establishing a United Nations peacekeeping force there.

Mr. Chafee, who lost his Senate seat in last month's elections, perhaps best captured the political reality that has engulfed Mr. Bolton since he took office in a recess appointment last year.

"The American people have spoken out against the president's agenda on a number of fronts, and presumably one of those is on foreign policy," Mr. Chafee said last month.

Mr. Chafee's decision might have been the end of the matter. But White House officials began exploring whether the president could somehow bypass the Senate to keep Mr. Bolton at the United Nations, perhaps by naming him to be Mr. Bush's special envoy or to some other post that would not require Senate confirmation.

Mr. Bolton wanted very much to stay at the world body, administration officials said, and Vice President Dick Cheney backed exploration of some way to bypass the Senate. But that course was almost certain to inflame tensions between Congress and the White House, and in the end, Mr. Cheney and Mr. Bolton gave up.

Lea Anne McBride, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, said that Mr. Bolton came to Washington on Thursday and met with the vice president. At the meeting, the two men decided not to press the issue any further. On Friday, Mr. Bolton sent a resignation letter to President Bush.

"After careful consideration, I have concluded that my service in your administration should end when the current recess appointment ends," Mr. Bolton wrote.

President Bush initially appointed Mr. Bolton during a Congressional recess last year after the Foreign Relations Committee sent his nomination to the floor without a recommendation. That term expires at the end of this year. Mr. Bush could give Mr. Bolton a second recess appointment, but under the law he could not be paid for his work.

Administration officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about their internal deliberations, said that they dropped the idea of circumventing the Senate by appointing him to a special position at the United Nations because they did not want another fight.

"That would have been too much for the Senate," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond. "I suppose it could have been done, but it would have undermined Bolton's authority at the U.N."

Mr. Bolton's resignation leaves President Bush with three holes in his national security team: at the United Nations; the State Department, where Ms. Rice's deputy, Robert B. Zoellick, resigned in June; and at the office of the director of National Intelligence, where the job of deputy has been vacant since Michael V. Hayden was named C.I.A. director in May.

How Mr. Bush chooses to fill those jobs could indicate which direction the administration will tilt during its last two years, administration officials and United Nations diplomats said. Since the midterm elections, foreign policy realists have appeared to be ascendant at the expense of more ideological conservatives.

Of those said to be under consideration, Mr. Burns has expressed interest in the job, administration officials said, but he is also Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's most trusted deputy, and she may be unwilling to relinquish him. Administration officials said that an appointment of Mr. Burns, who served under President Clinton as well, might further alienate conservatives who are already unhappy about Mr. Bolton's departure.

United Nations officials sent out a dictate that the official statement would be "no comment" on Mr. Bolton's departure. Secretary General Kofi Annan, buttonholed by reporters after the announcement, was restrained in his remarks. "I think Ambassador Bolton did the job he was expected to do," he said, adding that it is important for ambassadors to "understand that to get concessions, they have to make concessions." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

U.N. Ambassador Bolton Won't Stay (WP)

By Peter Baker And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

President Bush surrendered to congressional foes yesterday in his fight to install John R. Bolton as permanent ambassador to the United Nations, a harbinger of how the political world has changed since Democrats captured both houses of Congress.

Bush circumvented Senate opposition last year, sending Bolton to the United Nations on a recess appointment, and administration lawyers in recent weeks had developed options to keep him there after that appointment expires this month. But officials said Bolton and the White House decided against provoking an early confrontation with Democrats as they take over Congress next month.

As Bolton's resignation was announced, the White House deliberated on a new nominee, with attention focusing on Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq. The White House also has a crop of Republican lawmakers who lost reelection to consider. A number of senior ambassadors from around the world have expressed interest, but administration officials said Bolton's successor will be a political nominee.

Bolton became the second high-profile member of Bush's national security team, after Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, to announce his departure since the Nov. 7 elections. Bush appeared aggravated at having to abandon Bolton, whose bare-knuckle diplomacy and skepticism of multilateralism made him a favorite of conservatives and a lightning rod for many in the Washington and international establishments.

"I'm not happy about it," Bush said in a one-minute appearance with Bolton before cameras in the Oval Office. "I think he deserved to be confirmed. And the reason why I think he deserved to be confirmed is because I know he did a fabulous job for the country."

In a separate interview with Fox News Channel, Bush said: "On issue after issue, Bolton delivered. And so you're looking at a man who is deeply disappointed, and I would call it shallow politics of the Senate in this case."

Bolton's departure leaves another hole in Bush's foreign policy team at a time when the U.N. ambassador is heavily involved in diplomacy involving the nuclear activities of Iran and North Korea and the ongoing crisis in Lebanon. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been without a deputy since July, when Robert B. Zoellick resigned, and her counselor, Philip D. Zelikow, announced last week that he will depart at the end of the year.

Bolton recast the role of ambassador to the United Nations, a post traditionally filled by prominent Americans who helped explain the organization to Washington. Instead, Bolton relished the role of the body's chief critic, playing down its achievements and regaling congressional committees with its failings.

Still, his encyclopedic knowledge of the United Nations and his tough negotiating style earned him grudging admiration from peers on the Security Council, who credited him with helping pass resolutions demanding that North Korea and Iran restrain their nuclear programs and ending the war between Israel and Hezbollah. Bolton also persuaded the Security Council for the first time to add Burma to its permanent agenda, a long-sought goal of human rights activists.

Edward Luck, director of the Center on International Organization at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs, said Bolton was effective at the 15-member council but faltered trying to build consensus in the much larger General Assembly, particularly in favor of reforms he long advocated. "He's been a strong American ambassador to the Security Council, but unfortunately the Security Council is just one piece of the puzzle up here," Luck said.

Some U.N. officials privately blamed Bolton for sabotaging the organization's reform initiative by stirring differences between poor and rich countries. "He sometimes makes it very difficult to build bridges because he is a very honest and blunt person," said South Africa's ambassador, Dumisani Shadrack Kumalo, chairman of a coalition of developing nations. He said it sometimes appears that "Ambassador Bolton wants to prove nothing works at the United Nations."

Secretary General Kofi Annan reacted coolly to Bolton's announcement: "As a representative of the U.S. government he pressed ahead with the instructions that he had been given, and tried to work as effectively as he could with the other ambassadors."

Bolton's fate was sealed when Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) decided to block his nomination in the Foreign Relations Committee, joining with all Democrats on the panel. Administration lawyers explored ways of keeping him in the job by appointing him to a position that does not require Senate confirmation and then making him "acting ambassador."

Friends said Bolton decided not to put Bush in that position. "More importantly, he felt he had done a very good job, he defended policies he didn't always agree with and he did so ably, and so now he can go out on top," said William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard, who spoke with Bolton several times in recent weeks.

A senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter, said the White House was eager to avoid a fight as well: "The thought was, 'Okay, at a time we're going to need help from a Democratic Congress on too many things, this is not worth it.' "

Khalilzad, an Afghan American who has served as Bush's envoy in both Kabul and Baghdad, is generally well liked by Democrats. Deputy Chief of Mission Alejandro D. Wolff will fill in until a replacement is confirmed.

Bolton's Exit May Signal A Shift To The Center (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The departure of United Nations Ambassador John Bolton marked another concession by President Bush to the new political realities facing him, and likely pushes his administration more to the center as he heads into his final two years in office.

After last month's Democratic congressional election victories, Mr. Bush ousted hawkish Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and nominated as his successor Robert Gates, a former U.S. intelligence director who served both Republican and Democratic administrations. Mr. Gates's Senate confirmation hearings begin today, and he is expected to be approved without major opposition.

Speculation on Mr. Bolton's successor has focused on the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, who is widely expected to leave his post soon; Andrew Natsios, the special envoy to Sudan; and the undersecretary of state, Paula Dobriansky. It also is possible the White House may figure it is easier to win confirmation for a current or departing member of Congress. Rep. Jim Leach (R., Iowa), who was defeated for re-election last month, once served as a foreign-service officer and was being mentioned by Republicans.

Yesterday, the White House said Mr. Bolton had decided to drop his bid for the U.N. post, after an unsuccessful last-ditch effort to save the nomination. A sometimes cantankerous conservative with strong views on the need to overhaul the U.N., Mr. Bolton received a temporary recess appointment in August 2005, after his nomination stalled. The White House resubmitted his name earlier this year and hoped to win enough votes to advance the nomination.

Political observers say the administration considered putting Mr. Bolton in another post and then making him acting U.N. ambassador, which would allow Mr. Bolton to continue in the job with a salary. With a second recess appointment, Mr. Bolton wouldn't be paid. However, such maneuvering would likely have provoked outrage among critics. In his resignation letter to Mr. Bush, Mr. Bolton said, "I have concluded that my service in your administration should end" when his recess appointment expires at the end of the current Congress.

Alejandro Wolff, Mr. Bolton's deputy, is expected to serve as acting ambassador until a successor is confirmed.

In a brief appearance with Mr. Bolton, Mr. Bush said he is "not happy" about the resignation. "I think he deserved to be confirmed...because I know he did a fabulous job for the country." In a statement, he blamed "a handful of United States senators" for blocking a vote on the nomination. Press Secretary Tony Snow went further, saying the defeat was due to "partisanship and not performance."

At least one former Republican critic, Ohio Sen. George Voinovich, had decided based on Mr. Bolton's performance to support him. Mr. Voinovich said Mr. Bolton has "done a good job under the harshest of circumstances," adding that he is concerned about losing Mr. Bolton's expertise and contacts on such issues as Iran, North Korea and Lebanon.

But many Democrats -- and at least a few Republicans -- raised questions about the nomination. The incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Joseph Biden (D., Del.), said the president "now has an opportunity to nominate an ambassador who can garner strong bipartisan and international support."

Mr. Bolton's nomination initially drew opposition not only because of his conservative foreign-policy philosophy and his views on the U.N., but also because the administration declined to turn over secret National Security Agency intercepts that Mr. Bolton had sought to review. At least some of the concern over his positions and personality softened during his tenure, and Sen. Biden yesterday praised his "intellect, hard work, dedication."

White House officials credit Mr. Bolton with pulling together the often-unwieldy coalitions that must be built at the U.N. over issues such as North Korea's nuclear-weapons program. "He ... has been a highly capable, competent and effective and sometimes very creative diplomat working with other countries, building large coalitions, as well as coalitions within the U.N. Security Council," Mr. Snow said.

Mr. Bolton's resignation suggests the Bush White House is "being forced into the center," said Danielle Pletka of the American Enterprise Institute. "This confirms an inevitable fact of political life, which is that administrations do drift" as they move into the home stretch.

Mr. Bolton's successor could be pivotal in the administration's diplomatic efforts in the Middle East, where the White House is facing pressure to convene an international summit on Iraq that includes Iran and Syria, but that would require heavy U.N. involvement.

The new ambassador will also have to maintain the shaky international consensus on Iran's nuclear program as the administration's high-stakes showdown with Tehran enters a critical phase. The Security Council has been deadlocked for months over Iran, with powerful nations like Russia and China making clear they won't support U.S. language imposing sanctions on Iran. That means the U.S. may be forced to accept a weaker resolution than it initially wanted, complicating the administration's efforts to build a coalition to disarm Iran if necessary.

Bolton Resigns From U.N. Post (LAT)

By Maggie Farley And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

The diplomat knew he couldn't get votes in Senate. Colleagues praise his tenacity but won't miss his rigidity.

UNITED NATIONS — John R. Bolton, the pugnacious U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, is known for not giving up. But after meeting with his mentor Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday to discuss ways to stay at the U.N. without a Senate confirmation, he decided it was time to quit.

In a letter to President Bush that the White House made public Monday morning, Bolton said: "After careful consideration, I have concluded that my service in your administration should end when the current recess appointment expires."

Bolton's resignation, along with the election of a Democrat-dominated Congress and selection of a new secretary-general, may provide a fresh start for U.N.-U.S. relations that have been tense since the Iraq war began, diplomats said. It also signals that the Bush administration is less willing, or less able, to go around Congress to push through an unpopular agenda.

Bush accepted the resignation Monday with "deep regret."

"I'm not happy about it," the president said in the Oval Office as he thanked Bolton for his service. "I think he deserved to be confirmed. And the reason why I think he deserved to be confirmed is because I know he did a fabulous job for the country."

Bush criticized key senators on the Foreign Relations Committee for blocking Bolton's confirmation, "even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time."

"This stubborn obstructionism ill-serves our country and discourages men and women of talent from serving their nation," Bush said.

In August 2005, Bush installed Bolton at the U.N. during a congressional recess because he couldn't get enough support in the Senate.

Until Thursday, U.S. officials said, the White House was exploring ways to appoint Bolton to a position that would allow him to continue his U.N. duties without facing a confirmation hearing. His term will end with this term of Congress, probably later this month.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Monday that it had "become pretty obvious" that there were insufficient votes in the Senate to confirm Bolton.

The president singled out Bolton's efforts to obtain unanimous Security Council support for resolutions on North Korea's military and nuclear activities. He also praised him for helping bring pressure on Iran to suspend uranium enrichment and for working to bring peace to Darfur.

At the United Nations, where most of his colleagues maintain a grudging respect for Bolton's tenacity, intellect and clear positions, there were mixed reactions to word of his resignation. His style alienated European nations that have typically been allies, and other colleagues said that he might have accomplished more if he were less rigid and abrasive.

When Bolton took over the rotating Security Council presidency in February, he declared that things would be different: The council would start on time, and diplomats would abandon their set speeches and engage in unscripted discussion of the issues. His fellow ambassadors started calling him "the schoolmarm," reflecting thinly veiled resentment.

"Starting on time is a form of discipline," he said at the time. "I brought the gavel down at 10. I was the only one in the room, though."

"His absence will be conspicuous," said Tanzanian Ambassador Augustine Mahiga, who sits near Bolton in the Security Council. "He leaves the U.N. with the reputation as someone not easy to deal with. His style tended to be quite imposing, maybe well-intentioned, but creating difficulties in developing consensus."

DOJ_NMG_0102267

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya has often been on the opposite side of issues, such as Darfur and Iran, but said he respected Bolton's diligence and command of the facts. "He is serious about the American objectives here in reforming the United Nations, and he pushed hard," Wang told reporters. "But of course sometimes in order to achieve the objective you have to work together with others."

Another ambassador said that when he couldn't work with Bolton, he would work around him. "When he was blocking the way, we would just call Condi," he said, referring to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. "Many times, Condi was much more cooperative."

There was near celebration on the 38th floor, where Kofi Annan and his Cabinet sit. Annan and Bolton have a prickly relationship, and Annan, in a rare show of indignation, recently accused the U.S. ambassador of "intimidation." Deputy Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown, a vocal critic who has engaged in public arguments with Bolton, was restrained Monday.

"John Bolton's problem is last month's election, not the U.N. But obviously, while one admired his skillful use of the media, we longed for an American partner who could really work with us to achieve reform here. And when he couldn't, we often had to work around him with others."

"He certainly enjoyed a significant amount of respect for the clarity and firmness of his analysis, for being innovative, for being willing to do things differently," said Colin Keating, executive director of the Security Council Report, a think tank based at Columbia University.

Keating said that Bolton could not be blamed for the lack of progress on Iran and Sudan, nor could he be credited solely for obtaining unanimous support for resolutions on North Korea sanctions and a cease-fire in Lebanon.

But even his critics acknowledge that getting the council to discuss human rights and drug trafficking in Myanmar, formerly Burma, was a major accomplishment in the face of opposition from China.

"The process of getting that on the agenda is quite a significant achievement," Keating said. "It took a high degree of professionalism."

Bolton's successor will walk into the middle of sensitive discussions on Iran's nuclear program, the Sudanese government's resistance to peacekeepers in Darfur, security issues in Lebanon and Somalia, and the U.N.'s involvement in Iraq.

That makes Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq who has just announced his departure, a much-talked-about candidate to replace Bolton. Some U.N. officials, however, worry that choosing him would signal a U.S. desire to use the U.N. to facilitate a hasty exit from Iraq.

Former U.S. Deputy Ambassador to the United Nations Richard Williamson also has been approached for the job. Other names mentioned are George J. Mitchell, a former Democratic senator from Maine; Paula J. Dobriansky, the undersecretary of State for global affairs; and Jim Leach, a former Republican congressman from Iowa who has good relations with Democrats.

Bolton Resigns As US Ambassador To UN (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Mark Turner

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

The White House on Monday bowed to the political realities imposed by the new Democratic Congress when it accepted John Bolton's resignation as Ambassador to the United Nations, ending his combative, controversial tenure.

His departure marks the second high profile resignation of Mr Bush's long serving foreign policy team after the November mid-term elections. Tony Snow, White House spokesman, admitted defeat saying, it was "pretty obvious" he wasn't going to get the votes from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr Bolton had become to his critics an unpopular symbol of an aggressive, unilateralist style of US foreign policy. President George W. Bush on Monday hailed his record and his "extraordinary dedication and skill, assembling coalitions that addressed some of the most consequential issues facing the international community," such as the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea.

The White House decision last month to re-nominate Mr Bolton – who had needed to be imposed in a recess appointment – was seen by some political analysts as a strategic mistake, undermining Mr Bush's immediate rhetoric of bi-partisanship and was always doomed to fail. Joe Biden, the incoming Democrat chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, warned he saw no point in reconsidering it.

"The administration made a minor mistake over John Bolton," said Vin Weber, a Republican strategist. "His resignation is a recognition of the fact the administration is in the process of sorting out what its new relationship with Capital Hill looks like."

However, Norm Ornstein, resident scholar fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, said it had made sense to pursue it, even if failure was inevitable. "It was a balancing act with his conservative base, and an effort to show some loyalty."

The White House was reluctant to present it as a conciliatory move for Democrats. Mr Bush blamed "stubborn obstructionism," while Mr Snow said the "appointments process is broken," and charged that "for reasons of partisanship a handful of senators prevented him remaining UN ambassador."

Opposition to Mr Bolton was not just confined to Democrats. Lincoln Chafee, a Republican moderate who lost his Senate seat, also blocked Mr Bolton's nomination. Democrats, such as Senator John Kerry, were quick to claim a scalp. "Like Secretary Rumsfeld's departure, Ambassador Bolton's resignation offers a chance to turn the page at a critical period." He called for a new ambassador "who has the full support of Congress," and "who can put results ahead of ideology."

Mr Bolton will leave at the end of lame duck congressional session. The announcement comes at a difficult time for the UN. While Mr Bolton saw through several important UN resolutions on Lebanon, Iran and other trouble spots over recent months, the permanent five are once more struggling to make policy on the fast-evolving situation around the Middle East.

Talks on Iran are currently being held by political directors, not ambassadors, but the dossier is expected to return to the UN before Christmas. Serious challenges remain in Darfur, Somalia and Lebanon; and the UN is still struggling to find a way through on internal reforms.

Bolton's Goodbye: Bowing To The Inevitable (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin

Time, December 5, 2006

The resignation of John Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations marks another acknowledgement by the White House of the political consequences of the Nov. 7 Congressional elections.

A longtime critic of the U.N. and its bureaucracy, Bolton was opposed by Democrats, and even a few Republicans, who regarded him as too confrontational for the job, and he was unable to win support in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee when Bush first nominated him last year. Rather than accept that rejection, however, the President gave Bolton a "recess" appointment in August 2005, allowing him to take up the high-profile U.N. post without Senate approval.

But with that appointment set to expire at the end of the current Congress and a new Democratic majority about to take control, Bolton announced his resignation Monday. President Bush, in a statement, continued to express support. "I am deeply disappointed that a handful of United States Senators prevented Ambassador Bolton from receiving the up or down vote he deserved in the Senate," Bush said. "They chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time. This stubborn obstructionism ill serves our country, and discourages men and women of talent from serving their nation."

But the White House had essentially acknowledged the futility of keeping Bolton in the post by resubmitting his nomination at the worst possible moment — on the morning of Nov. 9, just as the Democrats were celebrating their election victory. Sen. Richard Lugar, the Indiana Republican who chairs the Senate Foreign Relations committee , said he would not even put the matter to a committee vote during the last days of GOP control, since all of the Democrats on the committee, plus Sen. Lincoln Chaffee, the Rhode Island Republican who also opposed him, would still vote no.

Chafee, who was defeated for reelection, issued a statement reiterating his opposition. " Mr. Bolton did not demonstrate the kind of collaborative approach that I believe will be called for if we are to restore the United States ' position as the strongest country in a peaceful world," he said. "This would be an appropriate time to choose a nominee who has a proven ability to work with both sides of the political aisle, a history of building strong international relationships and a reputation of respect for the institution of the United Nations. The names Brent Scowcroft and George Mitchell come to mind immediately as outstanding candidates. " There's no word from White House yet on whom it might nominate as Bolton's replacement.

Even without Senate confirmation, Bush could have put Bolton's name up for a new recess appointment when his current one expires in early January, but Bolton would have been prohibited by law from drawing a salary. More important, such an attempt by the White House to again override the Senate by sending Bolton back to the U.N. risked infuriating Democrats and undermining Bush's professed intention to seek consensus and political compromise.

Bolton was known as a vitriolic critic of the UN, who once famously announced that no one would notice if the world body lost the top 10 floors of its Secretariat building in New York. After he became ambassador, however, colleagues accorded him grudging respect for his professionalism in helping to win unanimous Security Council resolutions on North Korea, and in fostering consensus on tough issues like Iran's nuclear program and the conflict in Sudan.

One former critic, Sen. George V. Voinovich, the Ohio Republican whose initial opposition to Bolton doomed his Senate approval last year, revealed a change of heart on Bolton a few months ago. " I am very disappointed that John Bolton will not continue in his role as ambassador to the United Nations," Voinivich said in a statement after the resignation. "Given the fragile nature of the world situation, and the critical task of reforming the U.N., he should have been given an up-or-down vote on the Senate floor."

Another Senator offering support was John McCain, a frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. "His resignation today is less a commentary on Mr. Bolton than on the state of affairs in the U.S. Senate," said McCain. "For over a year, Democrats blocked his nomination in the Foreign Relations Committee, preventing an up or down vote on the Senate floor. In so doing, they have deprived America of the right man at the right time at the U.N.

Bolton Quits Fight For U.N. Nomination (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

President Bush yesterday accepted John R. Bolton's resignation as U.N. ambassador, giving in to the objections of Senate Democrats and one Republican a month after the White House pledged to push to confirm him.

Mr. Bolton had been serving as a temporary "recess appointment" since August 2005, but his busy term was not enough to persuade Senate critics to give him full approval for the top U.S. job at the United Nations.

"I'm not happy about it. I think he deserved to be confirmed," Mr. Bush said at the White House yesterday after accepting Mr. Bolton's resignation in person in the Oval Office.

Republican leaders had wanted to force another vote on Mr. Bolton's nomination before the end of the year, when Democrats assume control of Congress. But in Mr. Bolton's Dec. 1 resignation letter, he said the fight was over and he would end his service in the Bush administration when his temporary post expires, when Congress adjourns this year.

The White House said Mr. Bolton's letter also ended the possibility of keeping him on the job, which they could have done by creating another similar position and giving him a recess appointment to it.

His departure will leave Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with three major vacancies to fill. Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, the department's second-in-command, left for Wall Street in July, and Philip Zelikow, the department counselor and a top confidant of the secretary, announced last month he plans to return to his teaching job at the University of Virginia in January.

The Bloomberg News service reported yesterday that U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad may soon be leaving Baghdad and is a leading candidate to fill one of the top vacancies.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Mr. Bolton's departure showed the confirmation process was broken, and he blamed partisan obstruction.

But lawmakers on Capitol Hill said Mr. Bolton couldn't have even gotten out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee under Republican control because one Republican committee member, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, opposed him, denying him majority support to proceed for a floor vote.

"It basically fell because of the fact that Lincoln Chafee changed his mind and [Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard G.] Lugar couldn't bring it to committee because he wouldn't have the votes to get it out of the committee," said Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican.

Mr. Voinovich, an early opponent of Mr. Bolton's who later became his champion, said in an interview yesterday that Mr. Bolton had become "a team player" who didn't stray from the Bush administration's policy during his time as ambassador.

Mr. Bolton's departure comes as the United Nations is grappling with developing nuclear weapons programs in North Korea and Iran and upheaval in Lebanon.

Mr. Bolton worked on U.N. agreements on each of those issues, and Mr. Voinovich said he fears the loss of continuity. He said on the Lebanon resolution in particular, he doubts Israel would have signed off without Mr. Bolton's firm assurances.

Outgoing U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Mr. Bolton "did the job he was expected to do."

"He came at a time when we had lots of tough issues. As a representative of the U.S. government, he pressed ahead with the instructions that he had been given, and tried to work as effectively with the other ambassadors," he said.

But Democrats said the resignation gives Mr. Bush a chance to show he can be bipartisan and respond to the needs of the international community.

"This is an opportunity for the president to appoint a United Nations ambassador who enjoys the support necessary to unite our country and the world and who can put results ahead of ideology," said Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

Mr. Bolton's nomination had previously passed out of committee but had been blocked by a Democratic filibuster, failing on May 26, 2005, by a 56-42 vote and on June 20, 2005, by a 54-38 vote.

At The U.N., A Mixed View Of Bolton's Tenure (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 4 — The announcement on Monday of John R. Bolton's decision to step down was greeted by United Nations officials with relief, while diplomats from other nations offered mixed assessments of his effectiveness during his 17 months as the American envoy.

" 'No comment,' he said with a smile," Mark Malloch Brown, the deputy secretary general, said over his shoulder to reporters as he hustled to a meeting.

Mr. Malloch Brown had angered Mr. Bolton during the summer by accusing the United States of "stealth diplomacy" — turning to the United Nations when Washington needed it while showing public disdain for the institution.

At the time, Mr. Bolton demanded that Secretary General Kofi Annan "personally and publicly" repudiate Mr. Malloch Brown's remarks, but Mr. Annan stood by them.

Mr. Bolton's relationship with Mr. Annan was also marked by testiness, with the American repeatedly ducking opportunities to commend Mr. Annan by declining comment or saying, as he did last month, "I'll pass."

A year ago, at a monthly lunch for Security Council ambassadors, Mr. Annan signaled how deep the divide had become by chastising Mr. Bolton for trying to "intimidate" him.

Security Council ambassadors said they respected Mr. Bolton's professionalism and command of the subject matter, and thought he had represented the Bush administration's foreign policy goals well.

On the other hand, they said his manner, often described as abrupt, unyielding and confrontational, had alienated traditional American allies and undercut American influence.

They said that in areas where he was clearly taking his instructions from Washington, he performed well, but that in pursuing the objective on which he planted his personal stamp — overhauling the sclerotic United Nations management — he had been unsuccessful.

But even Mr. Bolton's success in championing the administration's policy represented a problem for him: At the United Nations, that policy is perceived as disdainful of diplomacy and single-minded in its assertion of American interests.

"I think he was serious about the American objective here of reforming the United Nations, and he pushed hard," said Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador. "But of course, sometimes in order to achieve the objective, you have to work together with others."

Another Council envoy, Adamantios Vassilakis of Greece, said, "Sometimes it was not easy, but we managed to find a solution whenever I dealt with him."

Augustine P. Mahiga, the ambassador of Tanzania, also a Council member, said Mr. Bolton's style, which he described as "abrasive and not very helpful to amenable consensus," had deepened the divisions between the developing world and the great powers.

"He will be remembered, of course, for his principled stand on various issues," Mr. Mahiga said, "but at the same time, he was the person who could have done it differently in order to minimize the negative perceptions of the positions of the United States."

Mr. Vassilakis said he thought Mr. Bolton had been particularly effective in obtaining backing for resolutions condemning North Korea's nuclear program, but less so in gaining support for joint action against Iran's nuclear program. "But then, Iran is more complicated," he said.

Mr. Bolton is leaving his post just weeks before Mr. Annan, who completes his second five-year term on Dec. 31, leaves his. "Yes," Mr. Annan said Monday, "we are both graduating together." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Bush Accepts Bolton's U.N. Resignation (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, December 5, 2006

Lacking the votes to keep his job, embattled U.N. Ambassador John Bolton said Monday he would resign, a defeat for a chagrined President Bush who had clung to hopes of Senate confirmation.

Bolton got the position in August 2005, appointed by Bush when Congress was in recess. With that temporary assignment about to expire, and his long fight for confirmation going nowhere, Bolton made it official.

He handed in a resignation letter that did not mention the political fight behind it. It said simply: "I have concluded that my service in your administration should end when the current recess appointment expires."

"I accepted. I'm not happy about it," Bush said Monday afternoon in the Oval Office, with Bolton at his side. Bush did not name a replacement, and officials offered no timetable for an announcement.

The setback for the White House seemed to put a hold on the postelection talk of bipartisanship.

Bush considered Bolton a strong voice as the U.N. dealt with crises in Iraq, Lebanon, North Korea and other complex matters around the world. Bolton also pushed the administration's effort to reform the United Nations.

But Democrats opposed Bolton, whom they viewed as a brusque, ill-suited diplomat. Some Republicans helped scuttle his nomination, including moderate Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island.

The president had stinging words for them.

"They chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time," Bush said in a statement. "This stubborn obstructionism ill serves our country."

Democrats, though, said Bolton's resignation signaled a fresh start.

"Hopefully this change marks a shift from the failed go-it-alone strategies that have left America less safe," said the incoming Senate majority leader, Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada.

"With the Middle East on the verge of chaos and the nuclear threats from Iran and North Korea increasing, we need a United Nations ambassador who has the full support of Congress and can help rally the international community to tackle the serious threats we face," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass.

Bolton's nomination had languished in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for more than a year. The White House made a renewed push for him after Democrats won control of Congress in November.

But it became clear that "there were not going to be the votes" to get the nomination out of committee, said White House spokesman Tony Snow. He suggested the entire confirmation process was broken.

"If bipartisanship is to succeed, perhaps we ought to make sure that people who serve their country ably and well are sent the signal that 'Your services will be treasured,'" Snow said.

Bolton, a 57-year-old arms control expert, came to the job with a reputation for brilliance, obstinacy and speaking his mind — and with a mission to reform the 61-year-old world body born in the ashes of World War II.

By his own account, Bolton remains frustrated that "precious little" reform has been accomplished so far by the U.N. General Assembly, though some diplomats would at least partly blame Bolton's blunt tactics.

But Bolton did play a key role in major U.S. foreign policy initiatives — getting U.N. Security Council approval of resolutions imposing sanctions on North Korea for conducting a nuclear test, joining with France to promote Lebanon's democratic government, pushing for a U.N. peacekeeping force in Sudan's conflict-wracked Darfur region and putting Myanmar's repressive military regime on the council's agenda.

Bolton has had strained relations with many in the U.N. Secretariat, led by Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

"I think Ambassador Bolton did the job he was expected to do," Annan said Monday. "He came at a time when we had lots of tough issues from reform to issues on Iran and North Korea. I think as a representative of the U.S. government, he pressed ahead with the instructions he had been given."

Republicans blamed the Democrats for Bolton's ouster.

"It also unfairly undermines President Bush's prerogative to appoint his own people to his team," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C. "There's no doubt Bolton is extremely qualified and has done tremendous work."

Bush gave Bolton the job temporarily, circumventing a Congress in recess in 2005. Under that process, the appointment expires when Congress formally adjourns, no later than early January.

While Bush could not give Bolton another recess appointment, the White House was believed to be exploring other ways of keeping him in the job, perhaps by giving him a title other than ambassador. But Bolton told the White House he intended to leave, period.

Chafee Going Down Swining (PTC)

By Jim Baron

Pawtucket Times Chafee, Bolton, December 5, 2006

In what may be his last significant action as a U.S. Senator, Republican Lincoln Chafee has withheld his support from United Nations Ambassador John Bolton, killing the controversial delegate's chances to be permanently confirmed in the job and prompting Bolton to resign from the post, perhaps as early as the end of this week.

President George W. Bush named Bolton as a "recess appointment" when Congress was out of session in August, 2005, meaning his commission would expire with the end of the the current Congressional session, tentatively scheduled for Friday. Bush said Monday that he accepted Bolton's resignation with "deep regret," adding, "All Americans owe John Bolton their gratitude for a job well done."

Chafee's opposition to Bolton as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee "was what made it not happen," said Chafee spokesman Steven Hourahan. "Without his vote in committee, it wasn't going to go."

Hourahan said Chafee was "very comfortable" with his decision to effectively remove Bolton as ambassador. He said it was "clear that the the American people sent a message," in the November election that they were unhappy with Bolton's confrontational style and the Bush administration's foreign policy.

He said Chafee hopes the president will use this opportunity "to put someone in there who is more of a uniter."

In a written statement issued Monday, Chafee said: ""I have long believed that the go-it-alone philosophy that has driven this administration's approach to international relations has damaged our leadership position in the world.

"Mr. Bolton did not demonstrate the kind of collaborative approach that I believe will be called for if we are to restore the United States' position as the strongest country in a peaceful world," the senator said. "This would be an appropriate time to choose a nominee who has a proven ability to work with both sides of the political aisle, a history of building strong international relationships and a reputation of respect for the institution of the United Nations."

That sentiment was echoed by the Democratic members of Rhode Island's congressional delegation.

Sen. Jack Reed said, "A bipartisan group of Senators in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee refused to confirm John Bolton because he wasn't the right person to represent American interests at the U.N.

"Ambassador Bolton's resignation should signal the end of this President's unilateral approach to foreign policy," Reed asserted. "This is a chance for the United States to diplomatically reengage at the U.N. and work with our allies and other member nations to confront global security challenges, especially in Iraq and Afghanistan. I hope the President will use this opportunity to nominate a candidate who can garner broad bipartisan support and who can help build consensus and protect our national interests."

Rep. Patrick Kennedy allowed that, "John Bolton should be commended for his many years of public service."

But, Kennedy added, "now more than ever, this country needs a more pragmatic, more effective, and more consensus-oriented Ambassador, who can build bipartisan and international support while effectively representing the interests of the United States at the United Nations."

Rep. James Langevin believes Bolton's decision to resign "was the right one," said spokeswoman Joy Fox. Pointing to geopolitical crises in places such as Darfur, North Korea, Lebanon and Iraq, Fox said Langevin "hopes the president will take this opportunity to nominate someone who can work cooperatively in the United Nations."

In a statement made after meeting with Bolton on Monday, Bush blasted the appointee's opponents in no uncertain terms.

"I am deeply disappointed that a handful of United States Senators prevented Ambassador Bolton from receiving the up or down vote he deserved in the Senate," the president said. "They chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time. This stubborn obstructionism ill serves our country, and discourages men and women of talent from serving their nation.

Bush said Bolton "served his country with extraordinary dedication and skill, assembling coalitions that addressed some of the most consequential issues facing the international community. During his tenure, he articulately advocated the positions and values of the United States and advanced the expansion of democracy and liberty. I appointed Ambassador Bolton because I knew he would represent America's values and effectively confront difficult problems at the United Nations."

Ben Chang, deputy spokesman for the United States Mission to the United Nations, declined to comment on Bolton's resignation or Chafee's part in it, and referred to Bush's statement after meeting with Bolton.

Asked about reports that former Democratic Sen. George Mitchell of Maine was being considered as a possible replacement for Bolton, Hourahan said Chafee thinks "Mitchell did a good job in Ireland" negotiating peace in that troubled land. "He has experience bringing allies together. He would be a good choice."

His Confirmation In Doubt, John Bolton Exits The UN (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON

US Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton isn't known for being diplomatic.

Last week, when the UN Human Rights Council declined to criticize the Sudanese government's complicity in Darfur atrocities, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan issued a carefully worded critical statement. Mr. Bolton issued a thunderbolt.

The action was "another example of the poor performance of the Human Rights Council, another reason why those who advocated going ahead with this council will have a heavy burden to bear," said Bolton.

Whether these words were deserved or not, they were reflective of a style which in the end undid his UN posting. With his path to Senate confirmation appearing blocked, Bolton announced Monday that he will step down when his temporary appointment expires within weeks.

President Bush said he accepted Bolton's decision with deep regret. "He served his country with extraordinary dedication and skill, assembling coalitions that addressed some of the most consequential issues facing the international community," Mr. Bush said in a statement.

Critics claimed that Bolton's brusqueness made him counterproductive. At the UN, he alienated US allies, both real and potential, according to his critics. Many Senate Democrats - and a few Republicans - charged that his hard-line ideology and penchant for confrontation was at odds with the UN's multilateral nature.

Bolton's defenders insist that he has done well at the UN headquarters in New York, pushing through tough Security Council resolutions on North Korea's nuclear activities, building consensus among allies on the need for Iran to suspend its enrichment of uranium, and pressing for peace in Darfur.

"US participation at the United Nations is not about winning popularity contests or engaging in feel-good, back-slapping exercises. It is about steadfast leadership and the advancement of clear principles and ideals," writes Heritage Foundation foreign policy expert Nile Gardiner in an examination of Bolton's record.

As recently as November the administration appeared intent on fighting to keep Bolton in his current position.

The incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Joe Biden (D) of Delaware recently said he saw "no point" in bringing Bolton's nomination before the panel, given the opposition in the chamber to confirming him in the post.

Administration officials were searching for ways to possibly circumvent the Senate, perhaps by giving him a title other than ambassador or by again giving him a temporary, recess appointment.

In the end, Bolton may have decided to simply take himself out of the running.

His letter of resignation to Bush, dated Dec. 1, was brief and to the point. "I have concluded that my service in your [administration] should end when the current recess appointment expires," Bolton wrote.

Mr. Bolton Resigns (NYT)

John Bolton's decision to resign as America's envoy to the United Nations was a wise move. He averted a distracting and divisive fight at a time when both Congress and the Bush administration have better things to do. He has also provided President Bush with an opportunity to show the kind of bipartisan leadership he talks about so frequently and exercises so seldom.

This page opposed Mr. Bolton's nomination in the first place, arguing that at the very minimum, an ambassador to the United Nations should be someone who believed the organization deserved to exist. Mr. Bolton has always been hostile to the U.N., and to the whole spirit of consensus-seeking diplomacy it embodies. When Democrats and moderate Republicans kept the nomination tied up in the Senate, Mr. Bush characteristically insisted on having his own way by giving Mr. Bolton an interim appointment while Congress was out of session.

But the interim appointment was about to expire, and the battle would have had to begin all over again once the new Congress arrived. Attempts to get the lame duck Senate to confirm Mr. Bolton ran aground when Lincoln Chafee, the Republican senator from Rhode Island, refused to support the nomination in the Foreign Relations Committee, leaving Mr. Bolton's fate hung up on a tie vote.

Mr. Chafee is the prime example of a moderate Republican who was popular with his constituents but who lost his seat because of Mr. Bush's hard-edge partisanship and insistence on having his own way in Iraq. The White House was left contemplating schemes to keep Mr. Bolton at work without Senate confirmation — like making him deputy ambassador and leaving the top job unfilled.

The United Nations doesn't need any further proof of how little the Bush administration thinks of it. And the Bush administration doesn't need to insult the world at a time when it is becoming increasingly clear how much help the United States needs to stabilize Afghanistan, extricate itself from Iraq, and curb the nuclear appetites of North Korea and Iran. Mr. Bolton's withdrawal gives the president a chance to improve his relationship with both the U.N. and Congress. There are plenty of experienced, internationalist Republicans who could get near-unanimous support in the Senate and send a signal to the world that Mr. Bush understands that the United States is not the only nation on the planet whose opinion matters.

Bolton Departs (WSJ)

If one measure of a man is his enemies, then John Bolton must have done something right during his six years in the Bush Administration. Yesterday's announcement that Mr. Bolton will resign as U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations when his recess appointment ends with this Congress was no doubt cheered in Tehran, Damascus, Caracas, Pyongyang, and Christopher Dodd's Senate office.

Mr. Bolton served with exemplary tact at Turtle Bay, notwithstanding critics who said he wouldn't. More important, he has stood forcefully for American interests despite the leaks and sniping from the office of Secretary General Kofi Annan. He helped to corral votes for resolutions isolating Iran and North Korea for their nuclear programs. He was assailed for leading the fight against Mr. Annan's "reformed" Human Rights Council, but he and the U.S. are now looking prescient as that Council descends into one more Israel-bashing cabal. He also fought harder for U.N. reform than have his critics who claim to want that corrupt institution to lead the world in providing collective security.

"Realism" is back in foreign policy fashion (see the editorial on Iran1), and we only wish some of that school's alleged practitioners were as realistic as Mr. Bolton. He has understood that the essence of realism is, or ought to be, to see the world as it is and speak with moral clarity about it. He offended America's enemies because he looked at their behavior and refused to excuse it. This is discomfiting to those who prefer to believe that every enemy can be appeased with talk, and that every dispute can be settled with a treaty.

It is no small diplomatic irony that, as an Undersecretary at the State Department in President Bush's first term, Mr. Bolton organized the Proliferation Security Initiative that is the one effective multilateral restraint against the spread of WMD. And it does not speak well for the American political system that it can't find a place in government at this dangerous moment in history for one of the world's leading anti-proliferation experts.

The decision by newly ascendant Democrats -- Mr. Dodd in particular -- to deny Mr. Bolton a confirmation vote on the Senate floor shows that they value partisan animosity above having a seasoned negotiator at the U.N. Mr. Bolton's graceful exit yesterday is further evidence that he deserved better, but so did American interests.

The Second Time Around For Bob Gates (TIME)

By Doug Waller

Time, December 5, 2006

Robert Gates, who begins his confirmation hearing Tuesday as President Bush's choice to replace Donald Rumsfeld as Secretary of Defense, is expected to have little trouble winning Senate approval. Even Democrats who have had issues with Gates in the past are anxious to begin course corrections in the Pentagon's troubled Iraq war strategy. And means the hearings will most likely be a far cry from the last ones Gates faced — when George Herbert Walker Bush picked Gates to be CIA director in 1991.

Gatess came to that hearing with baggage, having withdrawn his nomination to be CIA director four years earlier because of questions raised about his role in the Iran-contra affair. By 1991, the Berlin Wall had fallen, but Gates's nomination to be the nation's top spy reopened an intense debate that had been festering within U.S. intelligence since the dawn of the Cold War: How big a threat was the Soviet Union?

Ironically, his second nomination to be CIA director was almost sunk by the same accusation the current Bush administration has faced on Iraq — that intelligence was slanted to suit hard-line policies toward an enemy. During highly charged confirmation hearings in the fall of 1991, which were unprecedented for an agency that usually keeps its bureaucratic battles shrouded in secrecy, past and current CIA employees accused Gates of cooking the books on the Soviet threat. As then-Director William Casey's intelligence analysis chief and later deputy director in the 1980s, Gates had shaped intelligence reports to suit Casey's and Ronald Reagan's anti-Soviet agenda, agency critics charged.

The Defense Intelligence Agency under Reagan routinely inflated Soviet threat assessments to bolster the Pentagon's case for a military buildup. But a debate had been long running within the CIA's Office of Soviet Analysis (SOVA) over whether the Russian military was ahead of the U.S. Many CIA analysts were convinced Moscow was actually lagging behind. Melvin Goodman, a former division chief in SOVA, testified at Gates's hearing that "Casey seized on every opportunity to exaggerate the Soviet threat... Gates's role in this activity was to corrupt the process and the ethics of intelligence on all of these issues... He pandered to Casey's agenda." Goodman accused Gates of trying to change SOVA reports stating that the Soviet empire was in decline. Two other CIA analysts who were still in the agency at the time also sent in sworn affidavits to the Senate Intelligence Committee accusing Gates of politicizing intelligence.

Goodman also charged that Gates personally rewrote a 1985 CIA report on the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II so it would prove Casey's belief that Moscow was behind the shooting, even though agency analysts had no conclusive evidence establishing Soviet complicity in the plot. A later internal CIA review panel report concluded that there had in fact been "serious shortcomings" in how the reports were produced and charged that "alternate explanations" that disproved a Soviet conspiracy "were not adequately examined."

Gates had his defenders at the hearing, such as Lawrence Gershwin (the CIA's national intelligence officer for strategic programs) and Douglas MacEachin (head of the agency's arms control intelligence staff), who insisted that Gates never biased intelligence. Graham Fuller, a Gates colleague at the CIA, contended that many of the analysts in SOVA were themselves guilty of liberal bias, painting the Soviet Union as too benign, to compensate for Casey's conservative views. Gates's defenders, who also included then-Sen. Warren Rudman, claimed Gates was a victim of character assassination by the left. Armed with his own set of documents, an angry Gates marched into the committee room with a detailed 20-point rebuttal of the politicization charges. He accused critics from the agency of being malcontents who mistook professional editing of their reports for political pressure.

Gates also could be a ruthless manager, and he admitted during the hearing that in a popularity contest, "I sure as hell wouldn't win one at CIA." Gates's vigorous rebuttal saved his nomination, although 31 Democrats voted against him on the floor — an unprecedented number for a CIA nominee. But the Gates furor soon died down, and during his three years as CIA director he was widely praised inside and out of the agency for being an effective and fair manager. "I never saw him or anyone around him trying to cook the intelligence on Iraq," says Judith Yaphe, who served under Gates as the agency's senior analyst on Iraq and now teaches at the National Defense University. "Gates was just the opposite. You were told this is what we need and look ahead. I never was told what to write."

Goodman, who is now a senior fellow with the Center for International Policy, a foreign affairs think tank in Washington, says he was " shocked" when he learned of Gates's nomination to be defense chief. "He's a terrible micromanager and I just can't see him existing in that Pentagon structure." But Gates, 63, has won friends among both Republican and Democratic foreign policy gurus. "Bob Gates is a pragmatist and problem solver," says Richard Holbrooke, U.N. ambassador during the Clinton Administration.

Senate Democrats appear willing to let bygones be bygones. One of the senators who voted against Gates in 1991 was Carl Levin, who takes over as Armed Services Committee chairman next year. "Fifteen years have passed since that vote," Levin says. "I'm going to want to consider what his record has been since then — his thinking and writing since then. And I'm going to give it a fair and fresh look."

Only 10 senators who voted against Gates in 1991 remain in the Senate. And Democratic senators who weren't in the chamber back in 1991 don't seem inclined to dredge up an old dispute. "I've gotten to know him over the last several years," says Jack Reed, an influential Armed Services Committee member. "And he strikes me as someone who's a pragmatist. He strikes me also as somebody who will listen, particularly to the uniformed services. In that respect, he'll be a very pleasant change from Secretary Rumsfeld." —with reporting by Massimo Calabresi

Confirm Intelligence (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

SO UNPOPULAR IS Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, and such is Washington's eagerness to be rid of him, that the Senate Armed Services Committee is expected to take no more than a day to question his anointed successor, Robert M. Gates.

A former CIA director, Gates is a shoo-in. But senators should nevertheless use his confirmation hearings, slated to begin today, to put Gates on notice that he will have to reestablish the trust of Congress and the American people about whether to believe what the military — and other agencies — say about intelligence matters.

Allegations that Gates has in the past edited intelligence to suit his political superiors are certainly disturbing. Particularly worrisome is his alleged pattern of misjudging the capabilities of enemy states — the former Soviet Union and Iran — in precisely the ways that his political masters were bound to find most pleasing.

But the point of these hearings is not to rehash Gates' past. It is to establish what he has learned from his mistakes and how he intends to prevent the Pentagon from repeating them.

Not long ago, such questions would have been better addressed to the director of the Central Intelligence Agency. But under Rumsfeld, the Pentagon's intelligence operations have become extensive while congressional oversight has not kept pace. And the GOP-dominated Senate Intelligence Committee failed to challenge CIA Director Michael V. Hayden when he gave superficial answers during his confirmation hearings last May.

The struggle against Islamic terrorism requires intelligence that is not corrupted by politics. Senators should ask Gates questions designed to ensure that the intelligence the nation's leaders will use to make tactical and strategic decisions be as untainted as possible.

How, for instance, does he plan to reassure the military and civilian intelligence collectors and analysts in the Defense Department that their findings will be welcomed, even when they disagree with his own conclusions? How will he discourage the common practice of "stovepiping," by which officials pass on — or retrieve — raw intelligence and use it without subjecting it to sufficient scrutiny? What will he do to minimize bureaucratic duplication and competition among the various defense intelligence agencies, the CIA and the National Security Agency? What lessons from the intelligence failures and successes of Iraq would he bring to the Pentagon, and how?

Senators might also ask Gates about reports that a unit sounding extraordinarily similar to the one accused of manipulating the intelligence on Iraq has been set up inside the Pentagon to coordinate intelligence on Iran.

Gates has the requisite background for the job and the brains to do it well. Senators should use his answers to these and similar questions to judge his fitness for office and his performance when he gets there.

Wage Bill Set For Fast Track In January (USAT)

USA Today, December 5, 2006

Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi wants to fast-track efforts to boost the federal minimum wage and could seek to bring a bill directly to the House floor in January, her spokesman said Monday. Pelosi's preference is for a “stand alone” minimum-wage bill that is not tied to other legislative endeavors.

The bill probably will go straight to the floor for consideration, bypassing the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly, lobbyists and others involved in the process.

The legislation is likely to call for a phased-in increase in the current federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour along the lines of a proposal written by Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., the incoming chairman of the committee.

Pelosi, D-Calif., has made it clear that raising the federal minimum wage is a top priority in the first 100 hours of legislative business when the Democratic-controlled House convenes Jan. 4.

Kansas Gov. Sebeliusto head Democratic group

Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius will assume the chairmanship of the Democratic Governors Association next year as the party enjoys its first gubernatorial majority in 12 years, officials said.

Sebelius, who was elected to a second term last month, will succeed New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, officials told the Associated Press. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid upstaging an official announcement Wednesday.

Michigan's Levin to seeksixth term in Senate

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said he will seek re-election in 2008. Levin, 72, was first elected to the Senate in 1978. He will lead the Armed Services Committee when Democrats take control of the Senate in January.

Levin said he was in a good position to change “both the security policy and the economic policy of this country.” He has called for U.S. troop withdrawals from Iraq beginning within four to six months.

Sen. Thomas back at workafter leukemia treatment

Sen. Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., returned to work about a month earlier than planned after undergoing treatment for leukemia. Thomas, 73, was released Saturday from Bethesda National Naval Medical Center in Maryland. He had acute myeloid leukemia, the most common form of the cancer of the blood and bone marrow.

Last month, Thomas won re-election with 70% of the vote while he was in the hospital.

With The Democratic Congress, Groups Gear Up For Fight Over Paid Sick Days (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

With the Democratic Congress expected to move quickly to raise the minimum wage, many Democrats, women’s organizations and liberal groups are gearing up for a fight on another workplace issue: paid sick days.

DOJ_NMG_0102278

Supporters point to studies showing that nearly half of American workers do not receive paid sick days. But many Republicans and businesses complain that such legislation would impose another mandate on companies, driving up their costs.

Advocates of paid sick leave cite workers like Naomi Nakamura, who lost a week's pay when her 103-degree fever forced her to miss five days from her job at a video rental store in San Francisco.

Ms. Nakamura said, "Some employees didn't want to lose their pay, so they showed up for work even though they had strep throat, and they just spread it to other people."

Last month, San Francisco voters approved a measure requiring all employers to provide paid sick days, making it the first jurisdiction in the nation with such a requirement. The vote was 61 percent to 39 percent.

Now supporters are planning a big push for sick day legislation not just in Congress, but in Maine, Maryland, Montana and several other states. Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat, introduced a bill last year to require companies with at least 15 employees to provide seven paid sick days a year, but that bill languished in the Republican-led Congress.

Now that Democrats have won control of Congress, Mr. Kennedy, the incoming chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, is more optimistic.

"It has a wildfire of support across the country," he said. "When you talk to workers, this is, besides an increase in the minimum wage, the most important issue for these families. This is a families issue. This is a values issue."

Mr. Kennedy's bill, like a House bill sponsored by Rosa DeLauro, a Connecticut Democrat, would provide a total of seven paid sick days not just when workers are ill, but when members of their families are ill — or need to go to the doctor for checkups and tests.

A big problem with not having paid sick days, Mr. Kennedy said, is that many parents, not wanting to miss work, let their sick children go to school, spreading their illnesses. Mr. Kennedy said his bill would guarantee paid sick days to 66 million who do not now have them.

Business lobbyists plan to fight the effort.

"Supporters of legislation like this complain about unfunded mandates in education when it comes to No Child Left Behind, but they don't hesitate to impose unfunded mandates on employers," said Randel Johnson, vice president for labor, immigration and employee benefits at the United States Chamber of Commerce. "The employer community is not going to roll over on this issue."

Susan Eckerly, vice president for federal policy at the National Federation of Independent Business, said, "I could see where this would pass the House, but if you put this on the floor of the Senate, it would be a good candidate for a filibuster."

Mr. Kennedy acknowledged that possibility. "We'll need some of our Republican colleagues," he said.

Advocates plan to build a coalition like the one that won passage of the Families and Medical Leave Act in 1993 after a long struggle — including two vetoes by the first President Bush. The coalition backing paid sick days includes the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, the National Partnership for Women and Families, and Acorn, an association of community organizations that helped win passage of a minimum wage increase in six states on Election Day.

"These kinds of policies that create flexibility in the workplace are important to make families be healthy and economically secure," said Debra Ness, president of the National Partnership. "You'd be hard-pressed to talk to a woman today at any point of the economic spectrum who isn't struggling with this issue."

Jody Heymann, a professor of social policy at McGill University, pointed to studies showing that children get well sooner when their parents take time off to care for them. She said the United States was the only industrial nation not to require paid sick days when workers are ill.

"Enough firms do this to show that companies can provide this and compete economically," Professor Heymann said.

But many business owners complain that mandates like paid sick days require lots of paperwork and take a one-size-fits-all approach.

Steve Caughran, owner of a printing shop outside Fresno, Calif., said, "Any time the government is mandating something and creates an extra burden on business, it becomes another regulatory tax and raises costs."

He said that to attract workers most companies needed to provide good benefits, including sick days. He said he offered most employees about 14 paid days off each year, to be taken as vacation or sick days.

The Institute for Women's Policy Research found that 77 percent of workers in the lowest quarter by wages did not have paid sick days, while 43 percent of middle-class workers did not and 31 percent of workers in the top quarter did not.

Leonardo Prado, a restaurant worker in San Francisco, said not having paid sick days was a financial and emotional strain. Mr. Prado, who is divorced, said that last June when his 4-year-old, Antonio, got sick for two days, he had to hire a baby sitter for $10 an hour, even though he earned $8.82 an hour as a waiter, not counting tips.

"It really hurt in the wallet," Mr. Prado said. "You didn't have the option to say: 'I can't work this day. I have to take care of my son.' "

A community group in San Francisco, Young Workers United, sponsored the referendum, after many workers had complained about the issue.

Businesses hardly fought the measure, considering it a lost cause. "San Franciscans have a history of voting their social conscience as long as someone else writes the check," said Kevin Westlye, executive director of the Golden Gate Restaurant Association, which opposed the referendum.

He said consumers would be hurt, predicting that restaurants would raise prices because of the sick days mandate and a mandate for employers to contribute toward health insurance. The higher prices, he said, might cause some restaurants to lose business — and perhaps close.

"There's no such thing as a free lunch on something like this," he said. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Liberal Groups Target 86 Districts For '100 Hours' Campaign Blitz (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

Change America Now, a coalition of 40 liberal groups set to push the House Democrats' economic agenda, is targeting 86 districts around the country for press events and possibly television advertising, according to a list obtained by The Hill.

The groups will focus their efforts on 54 Republican and 32 Democratic districts, most represented by moderates, hoping to build support for four parts of the Democrats' "100 Hours" agenda: raising the minimum wage, allowing Medicare to negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies, cutting student-loan interest rates and repealing tax breaks for oil companies.

"It is basically about branding a progressive agenda," said Brad Woodhouse, a spokesman for Americans United, a liberal group that led the 2005 campaign against adding private accounts to Social Security. Other groups taking a lead role in the effort include the Campaign for America's Future, USAction, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), the Sierra Club and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME).

Woodhouse said the groups would start as early as next week meeting with members in the targeted districts, then holding press events to talk about their findings.

The coalition will hold a series of "high-intensity press events" in January when Democrats take formal control of the House, Woodhouse said, and could venture into paid advertising later.

The groups have no central budget but their individual expenditures on press events, websites, phone and e-mail campaigns would rate in the "low seven figures," Woodhouse said.

The groups first met last Tuesday and adopted the name Change America Now earlier this week.

Risk And Reward (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Washington

The G.O.P. is the party of risk, aggression, military assertion and dominance — an approach that led to the implosion in Iraq and the Republicans' defeat in November. Now the Democrats have a chance to demonstrate a core difference in how the two parties calculate and manage risk.

In “Fiasco,” Thomas Ricks describes the results of the Republican approach: “Bush’s decision to invade Iraq ... ultimately may come to be seen as one of the most profligate actions in the history of American foreign policy. ... The U.S.-led invasion was launched recklessly, with a flawed plan for war and a worse approach to occupation.”

While inflicting destruction on the Iraqis, Bush multiplied America’s enemies and endangered this nation’s military, economic health and international stature. Courting risk without managing it, Bush repeatedly and remorselessly failed to accurately evaluate the consequences of his actions.

The embroilment in Iraq is not an aberration. It stems from core party principles equally evident on the domestic front. For a quarter-century, the Republican temper — its reckless drive to jettison the social safety net; its support of violence in law enforcement and in national defense; its advocacy of regressive taxation, environmental hazard and pro-business deregulation; its ‘remoralizing’ of the pursuit of wealth — has been judged by many voters as essential to America’s position in the world, producing more benefit than cost.

While some Republican long shots have paid off handsomely (the Reagan administration’s accelerated arms race arguably drove the former Soviet Union into bankruptcy), now the dice are turning up snake eyes. In November, voters concluded that the Bush administration had run one risk too many. After 40 years of ascendancy, the G.O.P. has provided Democrats with an opening. Will the Democratic Party, often insufficiently authoritative and bold, manage risk better? Democrats arguably suffer from their own impaired judgment: utopian faith in the power of negotiation and compromise — naïve, perhaps, in a world where the threat of bloodshed is endemic.

In this election campaign, the Democratic leadership offered pallid, nonspecific policy initiatives — in the House, a “bipartisan solution to strengthen Social Security,” and in the Senate, a call to “work together to strengthen Social Security and Medicare.”

Nonetheless, buried in a morass of campaign-season evasion were the outlines of a potentially salable political program. Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Democratic Caucus chairman, pointed out that 16 of the seats the party won in November were suburban or exurban. He contended that the election marked the emergence of a new “metropolitan” populism, “a revolt of the center against the Rovian model of polarization politics.” In Emanuel’s view, “Prescription drugs, gas prices and economic populism are no longer associated with blue-collar downscale voters. Office park workers can be just as populist as industrial workers — they are struggling under rising college and health care costs too. They resent giveaways to H.M.O.s; they don’t want subsidies to oil companies when oil is 68 bucks a barrel. We are going to deal with the oil royalty issue, and we can cut the interest rates for student loans.”

Serious Democratic policy makers are beginning to rigorously assess and quantify risk with an eye toward generating growth, calculating “second-, third- and fourth-order effects,” while aiming to avoid, for example, the “silent trade-offs” that the economic strategist Gene Sperling writes about, which occur when “well-intentioned policies to protect certain workers or communities impose burdens on similarly situated or worse-off workers who were not included in the immediate cost-benefit calculations.”

The morass in Iraq has created a Democratic moment. As the party struggles to forge a working majority, it must strike a delicate balance, argue Jason Bordoff and colleagues at the Brookings Institution’s Hamilton Project. Allocating excessive economic risk to individuals can harm economic growth as well as family well-being, they note. Conversely, “poorly designed programs to protect against risks can distort economic incentives and impair overall economic performance.”

For the Democrats to thread this needle will take a steady hand. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Coming Soon: Dem Chairmen (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, December 5, 2006

House Democratic leaders hope to have nearly all their committee chairmen named by week’s end, a House Democratic leadership aide said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0102281

The House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee, a group that makes recommendations on committee chairmen, is scheduled to meet today at 2:30 p.m. in HC-5 to consider the nominations for the chairmen of five “exclusive” committees: Rep. David Obey (Wis.) for Appropriations, Rep. Charles Rangel (N.Y.) for Ways and Means, Rep. John Dingell (Mich.) for Energy and Commerce, Rep. Barney Frank (Mass.) for Financial Services and Rep. Louise Slaughter (N.Y.) for Rules, the aide said.

The panel’s recommendations will then come before the full caucus at a meeting scheduled for noon on Wednesday. The steering committee will meet two more times later in the week to handle non-exclusive committees, at 1:30 p.m. on Wednesday in HC-9 and 2 p.m. on Thursday in HC-5. Among those chairmanships, only the Veterans Affairs Committee is disputed.

Although chairmen may be decided soon, it will still be another few weeks before committees and leadership staff will move offices.

A second Democratic leadership aide said leadership offices in the Capitol and elsewhere would begin their move on Dec. 21, while committee staffs will wait until Dec. 26.

Democrats To Restructure Hill Appropriations Panels (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

When Democrats take over Congress next year, they will restructure the appropriations panels of both chambers, seeking to restore the alignment between the Senate and House subcommittees and ease a budgeting process that has failed for 12 years in a row to deliver spending bills on time.

Democrats said that the details on the changes had not been finalized, but confirmed that the aim was to bring the two chambers' structures into alignment by adding two subcommittees on the House side.

"The objective is to have the subcommittees (in the two chambers) mirror each other," said one senior Democratic Senate appropriations staffer. "That is the key."

The staffer said that before a series of changes enacted by the Republican House leadership two years ago, the structure of the two chambers' subcommittees had been "identical, except for some very minor technical differences."

The last time Congress managed to complete all its spending bills before the start of the fiscal year was 1994, also the last year when both incoming appropriations committee chairmen Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, and Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat, were leading their respective panels.

Aides said the two were determined to try to get the budgeting process back on track next year, though they acknowledged it would be challenging. With the fiscal year already a month old, Congress has passed only two of the required 12 appropriations bills and plans to adjourn this week after passing a long-term "continuing resolution" -- essentially permission for the government to go on spending at current budget levels.

Democrats maintain that by eliminating two subcommittees on the House side, responsible for funding the legislative branch and the District of Columbia, and moving other elements of jurisdiction around among the remaining 10, Republicans made the complex job of reconciling the House and Senate versions of spending bills that much more complicated, because the two-chamber conferences doing the work had to involve lawmakers from as many as four different subcommittees.

"Those changes created some difficulties when [appropriations] bills were conferenced," said Ronald Platt, a Washington Democratic veteran who chairs the federal government practice of the law firm Buchanan Ingersoll, and follows appropriations matters.

A spokesman for the Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee denied that.

Jurisdictional difficulties were "not insurmountable ... not a substantive problem," spokesman John Scofield said.

Conservatives argued that doing away with two of the powerful appropriations subcommittee chairmen, known as "cardinals," helped reduce earmarks and keep spending under control. Mr. Scofield said it was inefficient to have an entire subcommittee devoted to a small spending bill for the District of Columbia.

Mr. Platt said that Mr. Obey has the support of Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, for the changes.

"She and Obey have worked it out," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0102282

In the Senate, staffers said members of the committee would meet tomorrow with Mr. Byrd to thrash out the details of the changes there.

"Some restructuring will be on the table," another Democratic aide said.

In addition to abolishing two subcommittees, GOP House leaders also made a series of other changes two years ago, moving oversight of about $40 billion of defense spending, mainly on health and basic housing, into the subcommittee that deals with the Veterans Affairs Department and military-construction spending bill.

Mr. Scofield said that the change made sense and was supported by veterans groups and military families.

Congress Expected To Adjourn This Week (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, December 5, 2006

A Republican-led Congress criticized for producing little but political rancor is likely to end its term this week with at best a grade of "Incomplete."

The House and Senate return Tuesday having already decided to dump an unfinished budget on next year's Democratic-controlled Congress. Passing grades are problematic for a host of other issues on lawmakers' plates.

The main task this week will be approval of continued funding for most federal programs at fiscal 2006 levels through Feb. 15. That's necessary because the House and Senate have not come together on any of the new spending bills for the fiscal year that started in October except those covering defense and homeland security.

In other action this final week:

• The Senate is likely to move quickly to confirm former CIA Director Robert Gates as Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's successor. The Senate Armed Services Committee holds a hearing with Gates on Tuesday.

• The House on Tuesday will vote on a Senate bill that would open 8.3 million acres in the eastern Gulf of Mexico to new oil and gas drilling. The bill's chances rose after House leaders last week abandoned the more ambitious House-passed bill, which would have ended drilling moratoriums along much of the nation's coast.

• Congress will also probably send the president a package of targeted tax breaks, most which expired at the beginning of the year. Those breaks include deductions for research and development, for higher education costs, for teachers' classroom expenses and for employers who hire people coming off welfare.

Efforts to move the popular tax package have been thwarted several times this year because of maneuvers to link it to more controversial legislation. This time, too, passage could be complicated by proposals to tie it to several pending bills, including one to stop a scheduled cut of Medicare payments to physicians and another to extend trade benefits for sub-Saharan Africa and other developing nations.

• Also possibly in the mix for an end-of-year combo package are an abandoned mine cleanup bill and a bill to permanently normalize trade relations with Vietnam.

The office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said Monday it will take up the Vietnam bill if the House acts first. The House failed to pass the measure last month with a procedure requiring a two-thirds majority, and GOP House leaders have not announced plans for revisiting the issue.

Frist said Monday that House and Senate negotiators would meet to iron out a compromise on another major foreign policy initiative that would allow the United States to ship civilian nuclear fuel and technology to India.

Also on Frist's agenda is legislation to improve the nation's ability to react to bioterror attacks.

Frist had originally talked of keeping the Senate working right up to Christmas, but motivation to stay in Washington was deflated by the Republican losses of both the House and Senate in the election.

The House this week is scheduled to dispose of several dozen mostly minor bills including naming a Capitol room after retiring Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill.

The House is also to take up a bill requiring abortion providers to inform a woman 20 weeks into a pregnancy that the fetus may experience pain during an abortion. It's unlikely that the Senate would consider it this year.

Congress did approve significant measures this year, including a pension overhaul bill and the renewal of the Patriot Act. Other security-related measures sent to the White House included a port security bill and endorsement of President Bush's plans to create military commissions to prosecute terror suspects.

However, Congress was unable to come up with a plan creating a path to legal status for illegal immigrants, instead approving a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border. It couldn't pass a lobbying and ethics bill generated by lobbying scandals at the beginning of the year, and failed to reach a consensus on the administration's warrantless eavesdropping program.

By postponing action on the spending bills, Republicans will be leaving to the newly empowered Democrats the job of meeting the many demands for spending on health, education, veterans and transportation as well as doing something about the budget deficit.

Congress Not In A Spending Mood As The Holidays Near (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

A pile of unfinished business awaits the Republican-led Congress when it returns today, and a pile of unfinished business is likely to remain when lawmakers adjourn for the year, presumably on Friday.

Lawmakers have all but given up on completing any of the nine remaining spending bills and will instead leave it to the new Democratic leaders to work out the new government spending levels when they take charge in January.

Republican leaders will try, however, to pass a package of tax breaks, including several provisions that have expired or are scheduled to die Dec. 31. The list includes a research-and-development credit that is popular with manufacturing companies, individual deductions that benefit parents of college students and teachers who spend their own money on classroom supplies, and a sales-tax deduction for people who reside in states with no income taxes.

One urgent task before the Senate this week is confirming President Bush's choice of Robert M. Gates as the new defense secretary. Gates, a former CIA director, would succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld, who resigned Nov. 8, the day after Republicans lost control of Congress. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said he expects Gates to be approved no later than Friday.

Frist also announced yesterday that final House-Senate negotiations would begin immediately on the U.S.-India Civil Nuclear Cooperation bill, hailed as a cornerstone of a broader strategic initiative between the two countries. The bill would allow American companies to export nuclear technology, equipment and fuel to India, which is vastly expanding its nuclear energy program.

But the Senate version of the bill contains restrictions that reflect an unease among some lawmakers that the India agreement would weaken international nuclear nonproliferation rules. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has urged that the Senate language be removed, warning that it could jeopardize support for the bill by the Indian government. Supporters believe chances for passage would plummet in a Democratic-led Congress, with lawmakers likely to insist on tougher nonproliferation terms.

Republicans hope to deliver a long-promised expansion of domestic oil and gas drilling, and the House will attempt today to pass an offshore-drilling bill allowing limited increases in oil and gas production in the Gulf of Mexico. The House had sought new access to waters along the East and West coasts, but Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) warned that Democrats will filibuster a final bill unless expansion is restricted to the relatively small slice of the eastern Gulf that the Senate bill identified.

The future of a Vietnam trade-liberalization bill looks bleak. One possibility is attaching it to the tax-break package, but that high-priority measure has become a magnet for all sorts of straggler provisions. One is a Frist favorite that would block a scheduled Jan. 1 reduction in Medicare physician payments.

Another is a Medicaid provision backed by a coalition of long-term health-care providers and state government officials. They want to force Bush to rescind an August order that would reduce the amount of Medicaid funding available to public hospitals and nursing homes. Currently, state governments can charge providers a 6 percent tax, which is matched by federal funds and then returned to hospitals and nursing homes as government payments. The administration said the federal matching grants were too costly and ordered the maximum tax cut in half. Congress had earlier rejected such a plan.

The Vietnam legislation, which would establish permanent normal trade relations with the Asian country, ran into unexpected trouble last month in the House from lawmakers concerned that it would further damage the U.S. textile industry. Frist said the Senate would consider the bill "if the House can act," but House leadership aides said yesterday that the bill is a long shot.

Democrats have lambasted the GOP Congress for months about its skimpy list of accomplishments this year, including its failure to complete work on most of the annual spending bills to operate the government. Just two of the 11 fiscal 2006 appropriation bills have been completed. The nine remaining measures would fund about $460 billion of government programs and have been hung up by internal Republican feuds, in addition to the usual partisan squabbling.

Incoming House Appropriations Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.) said that if Republicans, as expected, seek to pass a resolution that would continue current funding levels through Feb. 15, Democrats will face two choices. They may seek to pass the remaining bills when they take over in January -- a daunting exercise that would coincide with the writing of next year's budget -- or pass a long-term continuing funding resolution.

"Either of those scenarios would represent lousy outcomes, but they would have been made unavoidable by Republican inaction today," Obey said.

Blunt, Cantor Fall Out (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, December 5, 2006

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) met yesterday with his chief deputy to quell simmering tension between the two of them that boiled over during the recent leadership contest.

Blunt and Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.) sat down in the whip's Capitol office for the second time in a week in an attempt to repair lingering damage that occurred during the Missouri Republican's successful drive to retain his leadership post when Republicans assume the minority next year, GOP aides said.

The dustup between Blunt and his chief deputy is largely the result of staff tension, which has been mounting for years but rarely affects the two lawmakers' close working relationship, members and aides cautioned.

The friction came to a head during the recent leadership races even though Cantor was assisting Blunt in turning back a challenge from Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), a conservative stalwart.

During that campaign, some Republican members and staff frequently suggested that Cantor was the more popular candidate to perform the whip duties even though Blunt eventually beat Shadegg by a wide margin.

A steady stream of stories and member comments fed that perception during the week and a half between the midterm election and the leadership race, creating tension between the two offices that was further fueled by inconsistent communication between the two staffs, the sources said.

That tension erupted during a phone call between the Blunt and Cantor before the race itself when Blunt expressed concern that Cantor's staff had not gone far enough to discredit a story that members wanted to "draft" the affable Virginian despite his commitment to build support for Blunt, aides said.

Blunt and Cantor spoke frequently during the race, and Cantor worked the phones and his contacts with other members to help Blunt hold onto the post. But the regular communications between the two members did nothing to dispel a growing perception in the conference that many members wanted Cantor to have a chance to run for the whip post as well.

At one point, the Cantor factor in the race was so influential that Shadegg sent a letter to his Republican colleagues reminding them of his pledge to retain Cantor as chief deputy if he could successfully unseat Blunt.

That dynamic spurred tension between Blunt's and Cantor's offices that became increasingly evident among members and staff on the Hill as Blunt fought for the No. 2 spot at the GOP leadership table.

In a staff meeting last month convened to discuss the rules and procedures for each of the seven leadership races, Blunt Chief of Staff Brian Gaston alarmed a number of those present by asking a question about whether write-in votes would be counted to determine the total number of votes after a Rules Committee staffer explained those votes would not count in the race itself.

Many of those present, which included one staff member for each lawmaker running, interpreted Gaston's question as a sign of concern that the Virginia Republican would somehow challenge Blunt during the closed-door election session. Gaston asked the question to determine whether or not write-in votes would count against the overall number of votes cast in the race and therefore change the number needed to win, an aide present said.

The overall episode is a brief aberration in a normally cooperative relationship, a Blunt spokeswoman said yesterday.

"Mr. Cantor is Mr. Blunt's closest friend in Congress, and he trusts him completely," Blunt spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger said yesterday. "They talk several times a day and have never had a single discussion that has ended with Mr. Blunt angry."

"The hallmark of Whip Blunt and Rep. Cantor's relationship is friendship and trust," Cantor Chief of Staff Rob Collins said. "Politics is a passionate business, so of course those passions can come out. But to win you have to be passionate."

The tension has eased since the race, and the conversation has turned to the role of the whip in the minority. During the race, Blunt promised Cantor an expanded role in the whip operation, aides said, and the two lawmakers must now define those changes as Republicans adapt to life in the minority.

"We're in the minority, and, as a result, the whip office has to function differently," Boulanger said.

The two lawmakers met over lunch last week to discuss possible changes to their whip operation, but details remain unclear about the particulars of those modifications.

One leadership aide unaffiliated with either lawmaker suggested that Blunt should give Cantor and his staff more access to Blunt's internal whip list. In the past, Blunt and his Floor Director Amy Steinmann have been very reluctant to share the details of those lists with members or leadership staff, a holdover practice from ex-Rep. Tom DeLay's (R-Texas) tenure in the post.

The dustup has stirred questions about Republican unity as the party moves forward, but aides to both members said it would not hamper their working relationship.

DeLay first tapped Blunt as his chief deputy in 1999. At the time, the Missouri Republican was popular among members and the press, but he has struggled occasionally in the intervening years to emerge from the Texan's long shadow. Cantor, meanwhile, has been considered a rising star since Blunt tapped him as his chief deputy in late 2002 after only his second term.

Cantor has since remained as deputy after own presumed rise in the leadership ranks was blocked when Blunt decided to hold onto his job as whip after narrowly losing his bid to become majority leader to Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio).

Despite grumbling that Blunt should make way for Cantor, the two lawmakers worked closely during the Blunt's recent run to retain the whip job and both sides expressed confidence that they can move beyond this rocky episode.

"The Blunt Whip team is the most successful whip team in the history of the House," Collins said. "Based on that past, one could only assume the future will bring more success."

House Ethics Probes May Stay Unresolved (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

The secretive House ethics panel is unlikely to complete several of its investigations during the final month of the 109th Congress, so questions about the conduct of a handful of members will remain unresolved.

The probes began in May but will end when members adjourn this month. A new committee at the convening of the 110th Congress could vote to reauthorize or carry over the investigations, but panel members are not required to do so.

House leaders are mum about whether the panel will keep the same members in the upcoming session, when Democrats will assume majority for the first time since 1994.

The panel, formally named the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, has at least four active investigations, including probes of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat, and former Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican.

Ney pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges and to accepting bribes in exchange for legislative favors this fall, then resigned his seat before last month's elections.

Mr. Jefferson faces a runoff Saturday against Democrat Karen Carter, a state representative, in his bid for a ninth term representing a New Orleans district. He has not been charged with a crime, but FBI investigators found $90,000 cash in his freezer after they videotaped him receiving a $100,000 bribe.

Also under investigation is the bribery scandal involving former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham in 2005. The panel is trying to determine whether the California Republican, serving an eight-year prison sentence for accepting at least $2.4 million in bribes for securing defense contracts, was able to influence any other members.

The ethics panel has been investigating the inappropriate computer messages that former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, sent to male teenagers who had served as congressional pages.

Democrats campaigned against a culture of corruption, reminding voters that Republicans in the majority were plagued by scandals and saying special interests influenced legislation on health care and energy.

Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi of California has promised to "drain the swamp" and said yesterday that her party's "first order of business" in January will be ethics reform.

"The people's House should not be an auction house, with legislation being sold to the highest bidder," she said. "Democrats pledge to make this the most honest, ethical and open Congress in history."

Changes could arise in a House rules package passed when the new session convenes Jan. 4.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), said any ethics reform should include creation of an independent office of public integrity. Without outside oversight or enforcement, corrupt members can feel protected by their congressional pals, she said.

"The ethics committee is always viewed as partisan and political, and they need to take investigations away from it," she said, adding that groups such as CREW should be allowed to file ethics complaints.

Hastings Paid Penance And Deserved Better (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, December 5, 2006

What Democrats did to Alcee Hastings is a case of political ethics being taken to an illogical extreme.

The decision by Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., the soon-to-be speaker of the House, not to make the Florida congressman chairman of the Intelligence Committee was a concession to political expediency, not good judgment.

Hastings, the second-ranking Democrat on the committee that oversees the government's intelligence operations, was thought to be the front-runner to head that panel when his party assumes control of the House in January. But last week, Pelosi announced that he would not get the post. In doing so, she caved in to those who say the former federal judge can't be trusted with the nation's secrets because he was impeached for a crime he allegedly committed a quarter century ago.

Never mind that Hastings was acquitted of conspiring to extort a $150,000 bribe in a 1983 criminal trial. His detractors pointed to his impeachment in 1989 on charges that he lied and fabricated evidence in that case as proof of his unfitness to head the committee.

But in stripping Hastings of his judgeship, the Senate chose not to disqualify him from ever holding another public office — a ban the Constitution allows it to invoke in an impeachment. So in 1992, Hastings sought and won a seat in Congress. He has been a member of the Intelligence Committee since 1999.

As the committee's chairman, Hastings would have had greater access to the nation's secrets as a member of the Gang of Eight — a group of congressional leaders with whom the president can choose to share limited knowledge of the most tightly held secrets. But to say that Hastings should be disqualified from this inner circle because of something he allegedly did in 1981 ignores what he has done since.

“He's been there (on the Intelligence Committee) too long to make the claim that he is unreliable,” says Charles Ogletree, a Harvard law professor who runs the school's Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race & Justice. “Not before 9/11 or after were any arguments made to remove him from that panel. His record of unblemished service has to mean something. To judge him on what happened in the 1980s, and not on what he has done since, seems disingenuous."

But that is exactly what Pelosi seems to have done — or been forced to do.

In backing away from an appointment she was said to once favor, the House's top Democrat seems to be saying that there is nothing Hastings can do to rehabilitate himself. It doesn't matter that in impeaching Hastings, Congress punished him for his alleged offense. Nor does it matter that since being stripped of his federal judgeship, Hastings has been elected seven times to the Congress and has served seven years on the Intelligence Committee.

If she is going to make good on her pledge to rid the House of its "culture of corruption" when Democrats take control of that body next month, Pelosi appears to have decided that she must make a sacrifice of Hastings.

That's a shame. Hastings deserved better. After years of loyal service on the Intelligence Committee, he deserved to hear Pelosi answer his critics rather than give in to them. He deserved to hear her say that ever since Congress meted out its punishment, Hastings has served that body, and the nation, and not reviled it.

She should have said people who pay a price for wrongdoing shouldn't be treated as if they got a life sentence, especially when they follow that penalty with a long record of unassailable public service.

Pelosi should have said that when it comes to bad behavior, she believes in both punishment and redemption.

Lawmakers' Regional Slams Draw Rebukes (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, December 5, 2006

The regional insult, a staple of trash-talking sports fans but rarely used these days by national politicians, is making a comeback.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., who is slated to become chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, angered Mississippians when he asked last month, "Who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?"

Last week, Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., a vocal opponent of illegal immigration, said of Miami: "You would never know you're in the United States of America. You would certainly say you're in a Third World country."

George Gonzalez, associate professor of political science at the University of Miami, says regional insults by national politicians are rare. "There are regional rivalries in terms of economy and industry but it rarely spills over into outright insult," he says. "In some ways, it's unpatriotic, because you're just insulting another part of your country. Ideally, we're all one nation."

The Miami and Mississippi slams drew stern rebukes.

"There's been a steady supply of letters to the editor," says Joe Parker, a professor of political science at the University of Southern Mississippi. "The tone has been: Charlie Rangel lives up there in New York where people are killing each other. What does he know?"

Rangel, who has apologized, was simply indulging in an age-old tradition when he insulted Mississippi, which has a long history of poverty, racial inequity and illiteracy, says William Ferris, a Mississippian and now senior associate director of the Center for the Study of the American South at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Rangel was discussing how New York state might keep more of the tax revenue it sends to Washington when he told The New York Times: "Mississippi gets more than its share back in federal money, but who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?" He later apologized.

"There is no excuse for my having said that," Rangel said in a statement. "My love for New York got in the way of my common sense and judgment."

Tancredo's comments, made during a summit of conservative activists in Palm Beach, earned him an admonishment from Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a fellow Republican, who called the remarks "disappointing" and "naive."

Tancredo was discussing how unchecked immigration has contributed to high crime rates in Miami.

Gonzalez says Tancredo's comments are "overtly racist. You're equating immigration with criminality."

Tancredo "didn't insult anybody," says his spokesman, Carlos Espinosa. "He made an observation. No one's questioning him on the statement itself. They want to discuss their hurt feelings. But they're not willing to fix the problem."

Renewed Worries On Medicare Drug Plans (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — Pharmacists and advocates for older Americans say they are worried that tens of thousands of low-income Medicare beneficiaries will again have trouble getting medications next month, as they did in January of this year.

Many prescription drug plans are changing benefits. Beneficiaries are changing from one plan to another. New plans are entering the market. Some beneficiaries will find they can no longer use the drugstores they have been using.

"There will be surprises and shocks for some beneficiaries," said Michael J. Negrete, vice president of the California Pharmacists Association.

About 600,000 poor people are losing the guarantee of extra assistance that covered nearly all their drug costs this year.

"Starting Jan. 1, 2007, you will no longer automatically qualify for this extra help," the Bush administration said in letters sent recently to these beneficiaries.

Some may still be able to obtain extra help. But they need to apply to a federal or state agency, and few have done so.

Pharmacists and insurance counselors say many of the 600,000 beneficiaries will not discover the change in their status until they show up at pharmacies next month. Then they could be charged $25 to $50 or more for drugs that cost them only $3 or $5 this year.

Druggists say they also foresee problems for another group: 300,000 low-income people who will be reassigned to plans chosen at random by the federal government.

Even people who stay in the same plan may face surprises because some of their drugs may no longer be covered. Plans can change the list of covered drugs from one year to the next, dropping some and adding others.

Mark J. Gregory, a vice president of Kerr Drug, which owns 102 pharmacies in North and South Carolina, predicted some snarls and delays for customers next month, but said, "It can't be as bad as early this year."

"Some seniors will show up at the pharmacy, unaware they have been reassigned to a different plan," Mr. Gregory said. "They may find that the new plan no longer covers some of their medications. Others may learn that they no longer have a low-income subsidy, and they cannot afford the new co-payment. In both cases, drug therapy may be interrupted."

Mr. Gregory offered this advice: "Beneficiaries should be prepared. If you have any doubt, take action now. Ask questions. Call your plan. Don't wait till Jan. 1."

Jennifer Mezey, a lawyer at the Legal Aid Society of the District of Columbia, voiced a similar concern. "Come Jan. 1," she said, "some low-income people will show up at the pharmacy and be charged full price, and they won't be able to get their medications."

Even if a drug is still covered, Ms. Mezey said, it may be subject to new restrictions limiting the number of pills or requiring doctors to get advance approval for prescriptions.

Federal officials said they were trying hard to avoid a repetition of the problems that overwhelmed pharmacists 11 months ago.

With a year's experience, they said, pharmacists, insurers and beneficiaries know what to expect. Medicare has upgraded its computer systems. Insurers have hired more people for telephone call centers.

"Lessons have been learned," said Kathleen M. Harrington, a spokeswoman for the Medicare agency.

Beneficiaries have until Dec. 31 to pick a plan. The Bush administration is urging people to act by this Friday, to avoid delays on Jan. 1.

E. Timothy Marks, co-owner of Excel Drug, a pharmacy in Waldport, Ore., said beneficiaries should be prepared for "problems somewhat similar" to those they experienced early this year.

"The plans are too complicated for some of the elderly to understand," Mr. Marks said. "Many low-income beneficiaries eligible for Medicare and Medicaid are unaware of the procedures and changes that will affect their drug coverage."

In the chaotic first weeks of the drug benefit this year, many pharmacists gave away drugs, and many states established emergency assistance programs for low-income people who could not get the drug coverage promised by Medicare. New York and other states have curtailed those programs.

William P. Scheer, chairman of the Pharmacists Society of the State of New York, who owns a drugstore in the Bronx, said: "Some people will go cold turkey on Jan. 1. They will go without needed medications that they have been receiving under the state program."

The New York State Health Department is sending a "reduction of benefits notice" to people who receive both Medicare and Medicaid. It says the state will no longer cover their drugs, with a few exceptions.

New York officials are urging doctors to help patients get coverage through Medicare. Doctors could, for example, rewrite prescriptions or ask Medicare to make an exception for a particular drug and a particular patient.

California is continuing its emergency program through Jan. 31.

"We anticipated that there could be problems in January," said Stan Rosenstein, the Medicaid director in California. "So we kept the program available as a safety net. The governor and the State Legislature did not want any possibility of disruption."

Mr. Rosenstein said he was most concerned about 85,000 Californians who were losing automatic eligibility for Medicare's low-income subsidy. "It could be a surprise when they go from paying $5 co-payments to having a $250 deductible," he said.

The Bush administration has repeatedly advised beneficiaries that they do not have to take any action if they are satisfied with their current drug coverage.

But insurance counselors and health care lawyers say most people can save money by switching plans in 2007.

Katrina A. Eversole, an insurance counselor at the Washington County Commission on Aging in Hagerstown, Md., said she had helped 50 beneficiaries in the last week.

"In most cases," Ms. Eversole said, "we are signing them up for new plans and saving them a great deal of money. We can often find a plan whose total annual costs will be just half of what they would have to pay for their current plan in 2007." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Medicare's 'Doughnut Hole' Help (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

The federal government is offering seniors a hand figuring out the infamous "doughnut hole" -- the coverage gap in Medicare's prescription-drug benefit that many beneficiaries will encounter during the year.

A new tool on Medicare's Web site, called a cost estimator, offers monthly and annual spending estimates based on the drugs seniors take and the pharmacy they use. Because it includes both the costs to seniors and to their plans -- the two factors that determine when the doughnut hole kicks in -- seniors can get at least a rough idea of when during the year they will reach the gap under each plan in their area.

For 2007, the doughnut hole begins after seniors and their stand-alone drug plan have spent a total of $2,400. The beneficiary then must bear all costs for his or her drugs until the out-of-pocket expenses reach $3,850. After that, seniors pay only 5% of additional drug costs.

Seniors have four weeks left in the current enrollment season to sign up for the Medicare drug benefit or change plans. Especially for seniors who spend a hefty amount on drugs, the new cost estimator can help decide whether they should change plans. All other things being equal, drug plans that negotiated lower prices with drug makers will have coverage gaps that occur later in the year than plans that pay higher prices for drugs. So a plan with a later coverage gap may mean lower out-of-pocket costs for beneficiaries.

The drug benefit, which took effect in January, is subsidized by the federal government and offered through private insurers. This year, an estimated three million to four million seniors hit the gap. While more plans are offering coverage through the gap next year, most don't cover brand-name drugs, so seniors still need to watch their spending.

The cost estimator was launched in October as part of the upgraded Medicare Web site. Previously, most enrollees could figure out how much their plans were spending on drugs only when they bought the drugs at the pharmacy. This year, insurers such as Humana Inc., UnitedHealth Group Inc. and WellPoint Inc. also have updated their Web sites so seniors can compare total drug costs from different plans. But the Medicare tool is the most comprehensive -- if a bit harder to navigate. To use it, seniors need to click the compare-drug-plans link on www.medicare.gov1, followed by "find and compare plans." They then can begin either a personalized or general search for drug costs and enter the lists or drug names they use. The estimates -- shown in a chart followed by a detailed explanation -- are at the very end of the page with the plans' details.

The site is updated every two weeks based on updated information from the plans, and the costs reflect discounted prices each plan has negotiated with drug manufacturers, not including rebates, says Mary Agnes Laureno, director of beneficiary information services at the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. "It should be really close" to what seniors see after each purchase at their pharmacy.

But there's also a caveat: Plans can change their drug prices during the year, so a beneficiary's actual spending may be higher or lower than estimated. "That gives you the best possible estimate, but it's only an estimate," says Tricia Neuman, Medicare policy director at Kaiser Family Foundation.

In addition, seniors can't always predict what drug they will use, and not all seniors are savvy online users. John Rother, policy director at the seniors' group AARP, welcomes the tool but wonders how useful it will be. "Most seniors are not going online for information," he says. A Kaiser survey in April showed that 5% of seniors compare plans themselves on www.medicare.gov, while another 5% had family or friends that did that for them.

In all, 3.6 million seniors enrolled in the drug benefit online in 2006, says Medicare spokesman Jeff Nelligan. The enrollment period ends Dec. 31.

Bill Would Restructure Red Cross (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

Senator Charles E. Grassley filed legislation yesterday to overhaul the American Red Cross. It is the first time in almost 60 years that Congress has moved to amend the organization's charter.

The legislation, which has the organization's strong support, would cut the size of the Red Cross's national board by more than half, change the way board members are nominated and mandate the appointment of an independent ombudsman charged with reporting annually to Congress, among other steps.

Mr. Grassley, an Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, has been pushing for change at the organization. A House version of the bill was filed by George P. Radanovich, Republican of California.

Following widespread criticism of its performance after Hurricane Katrina, the Red Cross commissioned a panel of experts to examine its governance and make recommendations. The report suggested many changes that require legislative action because the Red Cross is governed by a Congressional charter.

"The Red Cross views this legislation as vital to modernizing its governance structure to meet the demands of the 21st century and is hopeful that Congress will pass this historic legislation before it adjourns for the year," the organization said in a statement.

The changes would require the Red Cross to reduce its board to at most 20 members by 2012, from the current 50, and change the way board members are nominated in an effort to reduce the influence of Red Cross chapters.

The legislation also seeks to clarify and limit the role of the board. Former senior executives of the organization have long complained about its interference in day-to-day operations.

It also all but eliminates the role of the president of the United States in board appointments. In the past, the president has appointed the chairman and eight board members, typically cabinet secretaries who rarely attended meetings.

Under the proposed legislation, the board would nominate a chairman for approval and appointment by the president. All other presidential appointments to the board would be abolished.

Among other duties, the ombudsman would offer make it easier for whistleblowers. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

NASA Plans Permanent Base On The Moon (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

DOJ_NMG_0102291

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — NASA announced plans on Monday for a permanent base on the Moon, to be started soon after astronauts return there around 2020.

The agency's deputy administrator, Shana Dale, said the United States would develop rockets and spacecraft to get people to the Moon and establish a rudimentary base. There, other countries and commercial enterprises could expand the outpost to develop scientific and other interests, Ms. Dale said.

Ms. Dale and other officials of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration said the agency envisioned a base at one of the lunar poles, to take advantage of the near-constant sunlight for solar power generation. It would have an "open architecture" design to which others could add the capabilities they want.

Scott Horowitz, NASA's associate administrator for exploration, said crews of four astronauts would make weeklong missions to the Moon starting around 2020.

As more equipment was set up, human stays would eventually grow to 180 days, and become permanent by 2024. By 2027, officials said, a pressurized roving vehicle on the surface would take people on expeditions far from the base.

NASA gave no cost estimate for the program and no design details for the base. Ms. Dale said all plans assumed that the agency would continue operating from a fixed budget of about $17 billion a year.

The space shuttle fleet is to be retired by 2010, and the United States plans to scale back its involvement in the International Space Station. The station is still under construction, with a mission by the shuttle Discovery to lift off on Thursday. Ms. Dale said money would be shifted to the lunar exploration program from the shuttle and the station.

While the Bush administration and NASA have spoken in general terms about plans for a return to the Moon, followed by human spaceflight to Mars, the lunar outpost plan is the first time officials have proposed a permanent presence.

"We're going for a base on the Moon," Mr. Horowitz said. "It's a very, very big decision."

Many gaps in the plan remain to be filled in. NASA called Monday's announcement a baseline concept.

In a televised news conference from the Johnson Space Center in Houston on the eve of an international conference there on space exploration, Ms. Dale said the plan was developed after consultation with space agencies representing 14 countries and more than 1,000 experts in space science and commerce.

"The door is open for international and commercial interests," she said.

The lunar base plan is part of a larger effort to develop an international exploration strategy, one that explains why and how humans are returning to the Moon and what they plan to do when they get there, NASA officials said.

The planning includes an international conference early next year on setting scientific goals for returning to the Moon, including those that private interests might want to pursue.

Doug Cooke, the agency official who led the lunar study group, said the plan called for putting a lander craft down near a polar crater and later adding solar-power generating units and living quarters to establish a base.

A site near the lunar South Pole, like the Shackleton Crater, would provide enough sunlight for power generation. It is also near possible deposits of valuable minerals.

From this site, Mr. Cooke said, other nations could add scientific laboratories or observatories, and commercial concerns might want to process rocket fuel and other products from water and other materials that might be found in the ground nearby.

Mr. Horowitz said having a base did not mean that humans would go there after every lunar landing. The option remains open for some missions to go to equatorial regions, as the Apollo project landers did in the 1970s, or even to the other side of the Moon.

Getting to the Moon and establishing a base will require a versatile, general-purpose lander that could land anywhere and be the core of an outpost, he said.

"The nickname I use for the lander is, it's a pickup truck," Mr. Horowitz said. "You can put whatever you want in the back. You can take it to wherever you want. So you can deliver cargo, crew, do it robotically, do it with humans on board. These are the types of things we're looking for in this system."

Ms. Dale said she and other NASA officials would spend part of next year visiting potential partners in the lunar project, like the space agencies of Europe, Russia and Japan, to see what they might want to contribute. Different aspects of a lunar base might come from many agreements between the United States and other nations, she said, rather than following the model of the space station of having many partners signing one agreement.

While there have been preliminary talks about cooperation in space with China, a growing space power which along with the United States and Russia has the ability to launch humans, it is too early to tell whether the two nations will agree to work together on human space flight projects such as the lunar base, she said.

Howard McCurdy, a NASA expert who is a professor at the school of public affairs at American University in Washington, expressed some skepticism about whether the space agency could make the ambitious plan fit in its budget, even with the winding down of the shuttle program and "throwing the keys to the International Space Station" to the other nations that helped to build it.

By relying on some of the ideas and technologies developed during the Apollo program and beyond, Mr. McCurdy said, NASA planners expect to be able to get back to the Moon for 40 percent to 60 percent of the original cost. There would be savings, too, in not having to reinvent technologies for protecting spacecraft from the heat of re-entry into the atmosphere, and not having to develop new launching facilities from scratch.

But he said he was concerned that the technology for lunar exploration "won't get us beyond the Moon" and on to Mars.

"The fear is that the Moon, which is now viewed as a means to get beyond the Moon, will become its own destination, for hundreds of years," he said. "The easy way to go to the Moon is the hard way to go to Mars."

While NASA has yet to design the permanent camp, last July officials at the Johnson Space Center took reporters on a tour of possible lunar habitats to come.

The mock-ups were built of plywood and plastic, and had the crowded feel of a FEMA trailer. They addressed problems that NASA engineers expected astronauts living on the Moon to encounter.

Dust, for example, is not just untidy. On the Moon, the particles tend to be jagged and sticky, and so the engineers have designed an airlock to allow dust removal after any trip outside. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

NASA Plans Permanent Moon Base In 20 Years (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

An international team of astronauts will be living and working at a permanent moon base to be built at one of the resource-rich lunar poles within two decades, NASA announced Monday.

Earth's first off-world colonists will cruise the surface in a lunar lander that will function like a low-gravity pickup, possibly journeying to the dark side to build the most ambitious collection of observatories ever constructed, NASA said.

The announcement of NASA's vision to build a permanent scientific research station on the moon represents the space agency's first outline of its plans once it reaches the moon, scheduled no later than 2020.

"We will begin with short missions. Then we will build up to the point where we are staying 180 days, and then we will have a permanent presence," Doug Cooke, deputy associate administrator for exploration systems, said at a news conference at Johnson Space Center in Houston. The base could be operational by 2024, officials said.

In 2004, President Bush announced the Vision for Space Exploration, which proposed a return to the moon by 2020, as the first step to an eventual manned mission to Mars. NASA has since embarked on a $100-billion-plus program to design a new launch system and crew vehicle capable of carrying four astronauts to the lunar surface. To free up money, NASA will mothball the space shuttles by 2010.

Until now, it was unclear what NASA had in mind for the moon.

"We're going to go after a lunar base," said Scott Horowitz, associate administrator for exploration systems. "This is a very, very big decision; one of the few where the science and exploration communities agree."

Space science advocates have complained that money for basic research is being raided to pay for manned spaceflight, which they feel is costly and of questionable benefit when robotic explorers can perform many of the same tasks less expensively.

In choosing to locate the moon base at either the north or south pole, NASA was persuaded by three factors. One, the sites are relatively unexplored. Two, temperatures are more moderate there than in the searing heat of the equatorial bright side and the numbing cold of the dark side. Lastly, previous moon missions detected unusual amounts of hydrogen at both poles. Some scientists have speculated that this could be traced to hidden ice deposits, a potential source of water.

Australia, Canada, China, Europe, Japan, India and Russia have expressed interest in participating, NASA said.

NASA Plans Lunar Outpost (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

NASA unveiled plans yesterday to set up a small and ultimately self-sustaining settlement of astronauts at the south pole of the moon sometime around 2020 -- the first step in an ambitious plan to resume manned exploration of the solar system.

The long-awaited proposal envisions initial stays of a week by four-person crews, followed by gradually longer visits until power and other supplies are in place to make a permanent presence possible by 2024.

The effort was presented as an unprecedented mission to learn about the moon and places beyond, as well as an integral part of a long-range plan to send astronauts to Mars. The moon settlement would ultimately be a way station for space travelers headed onward, and would provide not only a haven but also hydrogen and oxygen mined from the lunar surface to make water and rocket fuel.

NASA officials declined to put a price tag on what will clearly be an extremely expensive venture. But they said that with help from international partners and perhaps space businesses, the agency would have sufficient funds to undertake the plan without any dramatic infusion of new money.

If the project goes ahead as planned, it would return humans to the moon for the first time since 1972.

NASA Deputy Administrator Shana Dale said the agency met with hundreds of scientists, potential international partners and space businesses over the past year to discuss lunar options -- most pressingly, whether the plan should be based around a series of sorties to the moon or a permanent outpost and later settlement. The conclusion, she said, was that an outpost would be the best both for science and to prepare for exploration deeper into space.

Scott Horowitz, chief of lunar exploration, said: "The lunar base will be a central theme in our going forward plan for going back to the moon in preparation to go to Mars and beyond. It's a very, very big decision, and it's one of the few where I've seen the scientific community and the engineering community actually agree on anything."

Dale said that once the team endorsed the concept of an outpost, which would be about the size of the Mall, the next debate was over where to put it, with a focus on either of the moon's poles.

"Conditions at the south pole appear to be more moderate and safer," she said. The south pole is almost constantly bathed in light and would be an ideal place to set up solar-power collectors for an electrical system -- a precondition for achieving the kind of "living off the land" that NASA is aiming for.

Horowitz also said the polar sites are scientifically exciting because "we don't know as much about the lunar poles as we know about Mars." Officials said the area around the south pole has craters that probably hold volatile gases that could be collected for commercial purposes. Highest on the list of possible resources is helium-3, a form of the gas seldom found on Earth that could be well suited for nuclear power fuel.

The rockets and space capsules that will take astronauts back to the moon will be exclusively American, but Dale said the mission envisions and needs the cooperation of other nations. As part of the process, she said, NASA officials met with representatives from the European Space Agency and the national space agencies of Australia, Britain, Canada, China, France, Germany, India, Italy, Russia, South Korea and Ukraine.

Dale said she will travel extensively next year to these nations and others to see how they might participate. One project she mentioned as attractive to NASA and possibly others is the deployment of an array of telescopes on the dark side of the moon to see far into the universe.

The NASA plan grew out of President Bush's Vision for Space Exploration, which was announced in 2004 and calls for sending astronauts back to the moon and later to Mars. Congress almost unanimously embraced the general plan last year in an authorization bill, but questions remain about its funding. NASA is counting on redirecting billions of dollars from the space shuttle and international space station programs to fund development of a new spaceship, but some critics have complained that the agency is already cutting back its science programs to pay for the moon-Mars project.

It seems appropriate that the space agency is aiming for the moon's south pole, because NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin is fond of likening the lunar project to the exploration of Antarctica. Adventurers first reached Earth's South Pole in the early 20th century, but it wasn't until the 1950s that researchers returned and years later before they established permanent, year-round settlements.

NASA plans to send a robot lander to the moon in 2010 to look for good settlement sites. One of the top candidates now is near the Shackleton Crater (named, fittingly, for Antarctic explorer Ernest Shackleton), near the south pole, but NASA officials said their plans will evolve based on what they learn from rovers and satellites.

The new lunar plan harks back to NASA's Apollo era, when six missions landed on the moon between 1969 and 1972. But unlike Apollo's spacecraft, the new space transport being developed -- the Ares I rocket and Orion capsule -- will have a lander designed for reuse and to serve as a kind of "pickup truck," according to Horowitz. The plan also calls for the development of a pressurized rover that would allow astronauts to ride around the moon without wearing cumbersome spacesuits.

The first test flight of the Ares rocket is scheduled for 2009, and the first manned flight of the Orion is scheduled for 2014.

While NASA is counting on international support and funds to make the lunar settlement possible, the track record for international cooperation in space is mixed. The space station -- which was initially conceived and designed by the United States -- has taken far longer to assemble than planned, and at a far greater cost. Some of the 14 international partners have also chafed over American priorities for the station -- a situation that Dale said NASA hopes to avoid in the moon mission by bringing in partners very early in the planning process.

John Logsdon, director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University, commended NASA for undertaking a "bottom-up" assessment of the project. He said the program seems to have broad support in Congress, though it will probably get more scrutiny now with Democrats in charge.

"The basic assumption in Congress," Logsdon said, "is that this is the way to go."

NASA Plans To Put A Base On The Moon By 2020 (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — NASA plans to surpass the Apollo missions by establishing a base on the moon that could lead to a permanent human presence on the lunar surface, space agency officials said Monday.

For the first time since President Bush announced in 2004 that U.S. astronauts would return to the moon, NASA has specified what it plans to do once there. No human has set foot on the moon since 1972. That final stay, the longest, lasted three days.

Under the plans outlined Monday, human habitation of the moon would begin in 2020 with four-person crews that would stay for a week. Visits would lengthen until astronauts could live on the base for up to six months at a stretch. This could occur as early as 2024.

The Apollo missions of the 1960s and 1970s “were limited,” said Doug Cooke, NASA's deputy chief of exploration. “We're looking at this more permanent capability that will allow longer stays and a lot of achievements.”

Cooke and other officials declined to say precisely how much the program would cost or how it would be funded. Deputy NASA Administrator Shana Dale said the costs of building a moon colony would not require an increase in the NASA budget, currently $17 billion per year. Part of the money would come from the retirement of the space shuttle, planned for mid-2010, Dale said.

Last year, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin said that the first voyage back to the moon would cost $100 billion. That includes the price for NASA's new Orion spaceship, a pumped-up version of the Apollo capsule, and the Ares rocket to carry the Orion into space.

Skeptics, such as the Congressional Budget Office and the Government Accountability Office, have warned that NASA is unlikely to be able to mount such an ambitious effort with so little money. Already Griffin has cut NASA's funding of space science and aeronautics research to help pay for the moon program and the high costs of the space shuttle and the International Space Station.

A moon base would help NASA decide what's needed to send people to Mars, said David Portree, a former NASA historian. But he warned that the expense could sink the whole project.

“Running a base is going to be very expensive,” Portree said. “It's going to make running a space station look cheap.” The Congressional Research Service estimates that the station's construction cost will exceed $100 billion, more than five times the first estimate, made in the early '90s.

Saving money was foremost in NASA's thinking in choosing the site for a moon base. It will probably be located at the lunar north or south pole, Dale said, in part because the ample sunlight that hits those regions would make it cheaper to provide power.

The south pole is intriguing to scientists because of the possibility that deep, well-shadowed craters there hold ice, which could be used to provide water as well as fuel. A recent study has raised doubts about that theory.

A Flock Of Frocks And One Weepy Warbler (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Can we just start the evening over? Come back out, do it all over again but this time, you know, differently?

So it went at the Kennedy Center Honors on Sunday, not just for Jessica Simpson -- who broke down onstage over some imperceptible flaw in her tribute to Dolly Parton -- but also for Laura Bush, who mysteriously changed dresses right before the gala.

Why? Turns out that earlier in the evening, the first lady walked into the super-exclusive White House reception for the honorees, wearing the exact same red Oscar de la Renta embroidered tulle jacket and floor-length trumpet skirt as three other party guests, including local philanthropist Vicki Sant.

"Evidently Oscar is very popular this season," press secretary Susan Whitson said of the $8,400 ensemble from the designer's fall 2006 collection. "It just goes to show that no one can resist a beautiful red gown."

The first couple laughed about it. "But she didn't want her guests to feel uncomfortable," Whitson said, so FLOTUS dashed upstairs and slipped into a black lace gown before heading to the KenCen.

It was harder to figure out what was going on with Simpson. The 26-year-old pop starlet kept one arm clutched to her midsection while singing "9 to 5." At the end, she blurted, "Dolly, you make me so nervous, I can't even sing the words right," then scuttled awkwardly off the stage.

Witnesses told us she was a wreck before she went on, weeping while the video tribute to Parton played and pacing anxiously during performances by Carrie Underwood, Kenny Rogers, Alison Krauss and Shania Twain.

"She was overcome with emotion performing the song for Dolly because she has idolized Dolly Parton her entire life and she wanted the song to be perfect," her publicist Cindi Berger said yesterday. "When it wasn't, she was upset with herself."

We didn't hear any mistakes. Said Berger: "She did."

Producer George Stevens told us, "She was very upset, so we said, 'Would you like to have another shot at it?' " Simpson then redid the song for the TV cameras (the show will air on CBS Dec. 26) once the audience had left the Opera House.

But it was all smiles and hugs in the Grand Foyer, as the stars filtered out to be seated for dinner. "What a photo op!" Parton exclaimed. There she was with Simpson, Twain, Krauss, Reese Witherspoon and Reba McEntire, arms wrapped around each other in a Country Girl Power lineup for every digicam and Nokia in the vicinity.

"Everybody, look this way now!" chirped McEntire.

Then Simpson -- after a quick hello with chum Ken Mehlman (who knew?) -- was outta there, showing us the laced-up back of her black dress as she hightailed it down the Hall of Nations. All that was left was the memory, and the photo that Bob Schieffer had captured of himself with her in his digital camera, which he was proudly showing to Karl Rove.

Witherspoon, radiant in a sparkly slip dress, lasted only a few minutes longer. "I have to catch a plane," she was telling a friend. "Gotta get back to my kids."

Fine -- lots of other folks to see. Like Smokey Robinson posing for pics with childhood pal Aretha Franklin, who snagged a seat next to his at dinner . . . And another A-list traffic jam over by Steven Spielberg's table, though once we drew closer we saw the mob was swarming Tom Hanks, while the director ate quietly with wife Kate Capshaw, in her glamorous sideswept bangs. Hanks later took a seat and chatted animatedly with John Williams. Two matrons approached timidly. "Not while they're eating," warned a buzz-cut bodyguard. At a quieter table, Andrew Lloyd Webber talked to the willowy redhead sitting between him and young crooner Josh Groban.

Curvaceous in black lace, Fran Drescher (yes, "The Nanny") was there with Patrick Kennedy, though not with him -- meaning she was his date, but it wasn't a date date . . . And Joan Collins (she's still here!) with grandly oversize frilly white collar and cuffs.

We found McEntire and husband Narvel Blackstock sitting all alone at a table for 12. "Dolly had to leave," McEntire explained. "She's real tired." (Pronounced "tarred.") Seems it's a lot of work schmoozing with all those people. "She had to get back on the bus and leave to go home."

Doesn't a Kennedy Center Honoree get a private jet? "She sleeps better on her bus," McEntire said.

Well after midnight, Spielberg headed toward the door. "We're going back to the hotel," he said, leaning down to kiss his mother, Leah Adler, "but you can stay here. Party on, Mom."

Bush Welcomes Children To White House (AP)

AP, December 5, 2006

Dozens of children cashed in their equivalent of a golden ticket on Monday: a greeting from the president and a private showing of "Willy Wonka" at the White House.

In a yearly tradition, President Bush and first lady Laura Bush welcomed their young guests to the East Room for a holiday performance. The kids all came from military families, and the president had a message for them.

"We wanted to welcome you here to the White House to, first of all, thank you for your strength — and so that you would do me a favor," the president told the children. He asked them to send an e-mail to their parents stationed overseas to say "how much the commander in chief respects them, admires them and supports them."

Bush and his wife sat with the children for an abbreviated performance of "Willy Wonka," a play based on Roald Dahl's book, "Charlie and the Chocolate Factory." It's the story of Charlie Bucket, who finds a golden ticket to Willy Wonka's chocolate factory and is rewarded by Wonka for showing honesty and character.

The president seemed to enjoy the music, often tapping his feet and nodding along. When he went on stage to thank the performers after the show, the children headed the other way — following Santa Claus out of the room.

How's Your War? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

I am of two minds about what Virginia Sen.-elect James Webb did at a White House reception for new members of Congress. After first trying to avoid speaking to George W. Bush altogether, he was forced to respond when the president approached him and asked, "How's your boy?" Webb replied, "I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President." (Webb's son is a Marine serving there.) "That's not what I asked you," Bush said. "How's your boy?"

"That's between me and my boy, Mr. President," Webb said, ending the conversation right there. Bad manners? Yes. Understandable? Yes, again.

For this act of consummate rudeness, Webb was roundly reprimanded. George F. Will offered him a magisterial rebuke, and so, less magisterially, did some editorial pages. (Why did Webb go to the White House in the first place?) Not only is such behavior rude, but it is usually counterproductive. We don't want to get where we were in the late 1960s, when Lyndon Johnson became a virtual prisoner in the White House, avoiding antiwar demonstrators by simply staying home.

Even that sometimes does not work. Eartha Kitt confronted Lady Bird Johnson at a White House reception, telling her, "You send the best of this country off to be shot and maimed." The next day's Post reported that the first lady went pale. Still, the war ended no sooner -- and not, I should note, before an impassioned opponent of the Vietnam War tried to throw Robert McNamara, the Don Rumsfeld of his day, off the Martha's Vineyard ferry. Much as he did while at the Pentagon, McNamara hung on.

Yet the dastardly act, aside from being oh-so-satisfying to the perp, can have its uses. In this case, it might have jarred Bush into appreciating the fact that many of his critics actually feel keenly about the war in Iraq -- that they are not mere political opponents but people who are morally appalled by a war that continues for no apparent reason. Maybe also the incident made him wonder about Webb, who, after all, hardly fits the demagogic antiwar stereotype constructed by Bush, Karl Rove and Fox News. Webb is a pugnacious sort, a former college boxer, Marine officer in Vietnam and secretary of the Navy under, of all people, Ronald Reagan. I would not, to his face, impeach his patriotism or suggest a dreamy liberalism.

Washington is a bad marriage with monuments. Just to get through the day, it's necessary to lower voices, modulate tempers, eschew insults, voice soft lies -- compromise, compromise, compromise. Quaint parliamentary rules have their utility -- no name-calling, please, and lots of grandiloquence about the "eminent gentleman" who in actuality is a skirt chaser who needs to trim his nasal hair. It is all necessary, like the rules of war or journalistic ethics. Sans manners, nothing would get done. Even with them, precious little is accomplished.

Still, there is accumulating evidence that Bush is talking to mirrors and taking instruction from his dog. He makes no sense, saying he's amenable to change one day and digging in his heels the next. "I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," he said recently. Yes. Absolutely. But what is the mission? Please, ask the dog. Lives are being wasted.

That, of course, is the whole point. This imbroglio about Webb and manners is, at bottom, about the (very) premature deaths of young people in Iraq -- the sons and daughters of people much like Webb. Their only hope is that Bush is a liar rather than a fool. There is ample evidence for both propositions. He vowed enduring loyalty to Rumsfeld while interviewing his replacement, and he has overseen the administration of the war with an incompetence that will earn him a special place in American history.

Maybe the president has a plan for disengaging in Iraq. Maybe, though, he is disengaged himself. If that is the case, the thought occurs that it would take a polite version of a Cagneyesque grapefruit in the face to get his attention. If Webb did that, then a medal, not a rebuke, is in order.

Now, Jim, behave yourself.

Report Says VA's Spending Too Slow (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, December 5, 2006

The Department of Veterans Affairs is too slow to spend the money it budgeted to treat the mental health needs of veterans, including those returning from Iraq and Afghanistan, according to a Congressional study released Monday.

The VA budgeted $300 million in fiscal 2005-06 for new mental health initiatives but spent only $200 million, according to the study by the Government Accountability Office, the watchdog arm of Congress.

The study also found that the VA had little or no way of tracking spending for new mental health initiatives during those two years, and that some of the money it spent might not have gone toward mental health programs.

The VA took issue with the findings. "Unfortunately, the GAO chose to look at the plan as an accounting exercise, focusing primarily on how many dollars are spent," said Matt Burns, VA spokesman. Mental health funds were spent on new initiatives, but Burns said the VA spent money only on programs that met its standards.

VA officials planned to place at least some of the unspent money in a reserve fund to be used in fiscal year 2007, the GAO study says.

"We are taking some time," VA executive Gerald Cross told a House subcommittee Sept. 28. "But we want to make sure it's spent right."

The $300 million in 2005-06 funding came in response to a 2004 VA plan to correct gaps in a variety of areas. Among them: early assistance for Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans suffering from combat stress; mental health treatment programs for a growing number of female veterans; and rehabilitation programs for veterans with serious mental illnesses.

"Without the commitment to fully fund the mental health care proposals … improvements in VA's mental health services will not be achieved," Rep. Mike Michaud, ranking Democrat for a Veterans Health subcommittee, wrote in a letter last week to VA Secretary Jim Nicholson.

Michaud cited statistics showing that the VA saw almost 18,000 Iraq and Afghanistan veterans diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) during fiscal 2006; the VA had anticipated 2,900 cases.

The VA provides health care to more than 5 million patients, including veterans and their families. It treats homeless veterans, veterans with serious mental illnesses and combat veterans for conditions such as depression, PTSD and substance-abuse problems.

A 2003 Army study showed that 17% of soldiers from combat units were diagnosed with such conditions as PTSD or major depression.

VA Failed To Spend All Money To Beef Up Mental Health Services (NCT)

By Suzanne Gamboa

North County Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Department of Veterans Affairs did not spend all of the extra $300 million it budgeted to increase mental health services and failed to keep track of how some of the money was used, a government report says.

VA launched a plan in 2004 to improve its mental health services for veterans with post-traumatic stress disorders and substance-abuse problems. To fill gaps in services, the department added $100 million for mental health initiatives in 2005 and another $200 million in 2006. That money was to be distributed to its regional networks of hospitals, medical centers and clinics for new services.

But the VA fell short of the spending, by $12 million in 2005 and about $42 million in fiscal 2006, said the Government Accountability Office, Congress investigative arm.

It distributed $35 million in 2005 to its 21 health care networks but didn't inform the networks the money was supposed to be used for mental health initiatives. VA medical centers returned $46 million to headquarters because they couldn't spend the money in fiscal 2006.

In addition, the VA cannot determine to what extent about $112 million was spent on mental health services improvements or new services in 2006.

VA reported in September that more than a third of Iraq and Afghanistan veterans who sought medical treatment from the VA in the 18 months prior reported symptoms of stress or other mental disorders.

Longer and multiple deployments, unpredictable daily attacks and roadside bombings and efforts to reduce the stigma of post-traumatic stress disorders have been cited as reasons for the increased reports.

VA said at the time it had increased funding for mental health services, hired 100 more counselors and was not overwhelmed by the rising demand.

VA spokesman Matt Burns said in a written statement the GAO looked at the agency's Mental Health Strategic Plan as an accounting exercise. "In contrast, VA's emphasis has been on building mental health care capacity and high quality programs to support and treat veterans. VA expends resources for programs that meet these criteria," Burns said.

He said VA has already taken steps to make sure mental health money is used for its intended purpose.

The money is only a portion of what VA spends on mental health. VA planned to spend about $2 billion on mental health services in FY2006. But the additional spending from existing funds on what VA dubbed its Mental Health Care Strategic Plan was trumpeted by VA as way to eliminate gaps in mental health services now and services that would be needed in the future.

"While we are at war we do have to make sure we spend the resources that are allocated for our veterans," said Rep. Michael Michaud, ranking Democrat on the House Veterans Affairs health subcommittee.

He said he thinks VA is overwhelmed. Along with the increased mental stress reports from Iraq and Afghanistan veterans, Vietnam vets are also experiencing flashbacks and recurrences of combat stress problems because of the ongoing wars, he said.

"This goes above and beyond just dealing with the veterans, it deals with the family of veterans which could have long-term implications and additional costs at federal level and state and local level," Michaud said.

Democrats have said they want to increase funding for veterans' health care, in particular its mental health counseling for returning Iraq and Afghanistan vets when they take over Congress next year. They also have said they want to increase the department's oversight and get detailed budget accounting from the VA.

Group Asks Removal Of Koran Swearing-In Critic (WP/AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

An Islamic civil rights group wants a columnist removed from the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council for criticizing Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Koran during the Minnesota Democrat's ceremonial swearing-in next month.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations said yesterday that comments by Dennis Prager, a columnist and conservative talk radio host, displayed an intolerance toward Islam that makes him inappropriate to serve on the council, which oversees the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

President Bush appointed Prager in August to fill the remainder of a five-year term, which expires in January 2011.

In his column last week, Prager wrote: "Insofar as a member of Congress taking an oath to serve America and uphold its values is concerned, America is interested in only one book, the Bible. If you are incapable of taking an oath on that book, don't serve in Congress."

Nihad Awad, CAIR's executive director, sent a letter to the council's chairman, Fred Zeidman, saying, "No one who holds such bigoted, intolerant and divisive views should be in a policymaking position at a taxpayer-funded institution that seeks to educate Americans about the destructive impact hatred has had, and continues to have, on every society."

Messages left yesterday at the Holocaust Museum and at Zeidman's office were not returned.

Prager, in a telephone interview yesterday, offered what he called "a solution to this that would satisfy me and the vast majority of Americans" -- Ellison bringing a Bible with him along with his Koran.

"The issue has never been one of religious freedom or attitudes toward Islam," added Prager, who is Jewish. "The issue has been from the outset honoring the most important text of American history."

Ellison is the first Muslim elected to Congress.

He will replace longtime Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo, who is retiring.

Ellison did not return phone messages yesterday, but a CAIR spokesman, Ibrahim Hooper, questioned Prager's offer.

"It's obviously up to Mr. Ellison to decide, but I don't think that forcing him to swear an oath on a book not of his faith is the answer," Hooper said.

By tradition, all members of the House are sworn in together on the House floor. It's in the photo-op ceremony that a Bible is used -- or in Ellison's case, the Koran.

Meanwhile, the Anti-Defamation League, which fights anti-Semitism and racism, issued a statement calling Prager's comments "intolerant, misinformed and downright un-American."

Postal Service, Union To Take Their Differences To Arbitration (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

The U.S. Postal Service and one of its largest unions, the National Association of Letter Carriers, have broken off contract talks and will take their differences to arbitration.

William H. Young, president of the letter carriers group, said outsourcing was the main issue preventing an agreement. In an e-mail to union members, he said the Postal Service "has signaled its intention" to use contractors for "existing city carrier work," such as delivering mail to homes and businesses in the nation's metropolitan areas.

A spokesman for the Postal Service said he could not comment on specific issues but said the agency had tried "in good faith" to reach an agreement with the letter carriers.

Contract talks continue with three other unions -- the American Postal Workers Union, the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association and the National Postal Mail Handlers Union. Contracts for all the unions expired Nov. 30.

The American Postal Workers Union posted a notice on its Web site yesterday afternoon reporting "substantial progress" in its contract talks. "We are cautiously optimistic" about a possible deal, the union's president, William Burrus, said in the notice. The union has asked rank-and-file union advisers on the talks to come to Washington for a meeting Wednesday, he said.

Labor costs account for 78 percent of the Postal Service budget, and postal officials often try to avoid having contract disputes decided by a third party. The arbitration process typically takes six months or longer, and the rulings usually give unions some or much of what they sought at the negotiating table, according to Bush administration officials.

More than 616,700 postal employees are covered by union contracts; about 270,640 are represented by the American Postal Workers Union, and about 224,775 are represented by the letter carriers union.

Controlling the cost of mail delivery is a key management issue for the Postal Service, according to the agency's inspector general. Mail is delivered to more than 144 million homes, business and other places in the nation, primarily by city and rural letter carriers. The Postal Service rarely uses contractors to deliver city mail but has more than 6,000 contractors who deliver to mailboxes on highway routes, according to the inspector general.

Young said that the letter carriers union had offered to restructure mail delivery in cities and to help the post office address soaring employee and retiree health-care costs but that postal officials, in exchange, would not agree to protect work performed by letter carriers from outsourcing.

In an apparent reference to the union's lobbying strength on Capitol Hill, Young said the Postal Service had put at risk "a cooperative strategic partnership with NALC in pursuit of an outsourcing strategy that is politically unattainable."Early Outs at Labor

It's time for another round of early outs at the Labor Department.

Labor, which has offered early retirement to employees eight times in the past 10 years, will offer the option next year, from Jan. 1 to Sept. 30.

The department estimates that 2,662 of its 15,349 employees will be eligible to volunteer for retirement.

Employees are eligible for early outs if they have 25 years of service or have 20 years of service and are at least 50. Early outs can lead to reduced pensions for some employees, usually people under 55 covered by the Civil Service Retirement System.

The Labor Department said it was offering early outs to make room for new employees and a different mix of occupational skills. Relatively few employees take early outs, however. This year, only 125 left through a similar program.Retirement

Solly Thomas, acting associate director for human capital at the Office of Personnel Management, retired Dec. 1 after more than 33 years of government service.

Thomas joined the OPM in 2003 and has managed a number of government-wide initiatives, including personnel policy changes under the president's management agenda.

Can't Be Bothered (WP)

IT SHOULDN'T matter whether you're conservative or liberal, for globalization or against: Some trade bills are so obviously beneficial and unobjectionable that there's no excuse for letting them languish. This is the case with a raft of measures that would extend trade preferences for poor countries -- preferences due to expire at the end of the year. Failing to renew them would not save American jobs or advance any other national interest; rather, it would disrupt the economies of U.S. trading partners and create another excuse for foreigners to resent the United States. The lame-duck session of Congress provides a chance to avoid that outcome, but there's no guarantee members will act.

Four trade-preference measures are in jeopardy. The measures would prolong tariff concessions to Andean nations, allow African garments made with third-country fabrics into the U.S. market, extend a similar concession to Haiti and renew the Generalized System of Preferences, which helps more than 100 countries. Passing these measures would not involve granting new market access; it would avoid closing the U.S. market and triggering factory closures in partner countries. Meanwhile, Congress also needs to ratify Vietnam's membership in the World Trade Organization. Without ratification, Vietnam will join the WTO anyway, but the United States will not enjoy the access that Vietnam has granted other WTO partners. The more Congress delays, the greater the head start it will give European and Japanese companies seeking to establish themselves in a fast-growing market of 85 million people.

These trade measures might founder partly because anti-globalization sentiment is growing in Congress, causing a minority of members to oppose all trade deals, no matter how routine. Another factor is that the pro-trade chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), is complicating passage by loading up legislation with his own tactical wheezes. To punish India and Brazil for not doing more to secure passage of the Doha global trade liberalization package, Mr. Thomas wants to restrict the Bush administration's discretion to allow those countries access to U.S. markets, but Mr. Thomas should leave the calibration of sticks and carrots to the president's negotiating team. To encourage Africans to make garments out of locally produced textiles, Mr. Thomas wants to set impossibly tough targets for local content. He should leave the management of Africa's industrial development to Africans.

But the biggest reason these trade measures may fail is the most scandalous: Most members of Congress know that they ought to be extended, but institutional inertia is stopping them from doing the right thing. For the past several months, Congress has put off dealing with the trade preferences, even though their expiration at the end of the year was no secret. Now the deadline is approaching, and members of Congress complain that they lack time to craft the legislation. What Congress is saying is that leaving town for the holidays is more important than jobs in developing countries. No wonder the United States is seen as arrogant.

Fed Official Moskow Continues To Expect Economic Growth (WSJ)

By Stephen Wisnefski

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

CHICAGO -- The president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago said Monday that the latest economic data, including numbers last week showing a contraction in the manufacturing sector, haven't changed his view of the economy.

"Overall, I think the economy is solid," Michael Moskow said in an interview that was webcast on CNBC.com. Mr. Moskow pointed to productivity growth, low unemployment and strong demand from countries outside the U.S. as factors that buoy the domestic economy.

Mr. Moskow said that the Chicago Fed is expecting gross domestic product growth to be "somewhat below trend," citing a forecast for 2007 of a 2.8% expansion. "I don't think that the data we have seen are out of line with that forecast," he added.

On Friday, the Institute of Supply Management, a private research group, said that its index of manufacturing activity fell to 49.5 in November. The figure came in well below market expectations and marked the first time in nearly three-and-a-half years that the ISM number didn't show expansion.

Mr. Moskow, who isn't currently a voting member of the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee but will be in 2007, said that it is essential for the Fed to look at all incoming data to see how its forecasts could be impacted and to adjust monetary policy accordingly.

The FOMC has left its benchmark federal funds rate at 5.25% at each of its last three meetings, after tightening monetary policy steadily over a two-year period to contain inflationary pressure.

Mr. Moskow and other Fed officials in recent weeks have said that inflation threats remain. Mr. Moskow has also said that further rate increases could be needed, as the risk of inflation being too high is greater than the risk of economic growth being too slow.

On Monday, Mr. Moskow said that core inflation -- which excludes energy and food costs -- is expected to come down somewhat over the coming year. He also said that recent data indicate that inflation is moving in the right direction.

Nonetheless, he said the Fed has to ensure that inflation doesn't stay elevated for an extended period of time and that inflation expectations remain under control. He noted that the Fed can't let up its guard on inflation.

Stocks Rebound On Takeovers, Oil-Price Decline (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

All it took was a couple of takeover announcements and a dip in oil futures, and stocks wiped out all of last week's losses.

Although they already have pushed indexes to double-digit gains since July 14, investors still appear prepared to buy.

After falling 86.04 points last week on disappointing economic news, the Dow Jones Industrial Average yesterday rebounded 89.72 points, or 0.74%, to finish at 12283.85. It is up 14.6% in 2006, less than 60 points from the record 12342.56 hit last month.

The Dow would have been up another 23.7 points except for a 10.6% decline at Dow-industrials component Pfizer, which abandoned a prospective cholesterol drug that was supposed to be a blockbuster. The decline knocked $21.3 billion off the overall stock-market value of the drug maker.

Investors applauded some takeover announcements -- that Bank of New York would buy Mellon Financial and LSI Logic would acquire Agere Systems. Takeovers reassure investors by indicating that acquiring companies see value in current stock prices. (Mergers boosted European markets, too1.)

More important to some traders, oil futures, which had been rebounding, pulled back 99 cents to $62.44, following a National Weather Service forecast of warm December weather. "As oil goes, so does the stock market. That just happens to be the data point that everyone is concentrating on at this moment," said Doug Johnston, head of trading at Boston-based brokerage firm Canaccord Adams. Overall, he added, "the stock trend is still up."

Investors now await the November jobs report due Friday, which Fed officials have indicated they will examine as a key inflation indicator.

The National Association of Realtors announced a bigger-than-expected drop in its index of pending home sales for October. But Michael Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, told CNBC that "the economy is solid."

Treasury bonds, which react to economic surprises, were little changed, as was the dollar, which has rattled investors with its recent slide.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index pushed to another six-year high, rising 0.89%, or 12.41 points, to 1409.12, up 12.9% this year. The volatile Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 1.46%, or 35.18 points, to 2448.39, ahead 11% in 2006. The Russell 2000 small-stock index hit another record.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks and bonds rose2. The 10-year Treasury note rose3 2/32, or 63 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.431%.

DOJ_NMG_0102303

The dollar was mixed4. It traded at 115.33 yen, down from 115.47, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3328 from $1.3336.

Deals Propel Stocks To Highs For Year (USAT)

USA Today, December 5, 2006

NEW YORK — The broad U.S. stock market closed at a fresh 2006 high Monday as investors put aside Pfizer's decision to halt development of a key drug and focused instead on another series of takeover deals (stories, 1B, 9B).

The Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 12.41 points, or 0.9%, at 1409.12, hitting a fresh six-year high. The Russell 2000, an index of small-company stocks, notched a record high, gaining 14.68 points, or 1.9%, to 795.85.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 89.72 points, or 0.7%, to 12,283.85, while the Nasdaq composite added 35.18 points, or 1.5%, to 2448.39.

Pfizer shares fell $2.96, or 11%, to $24.90, after the company stopped the development of the cholesterol drug torcetrapib because of deaths and cardiovascular problems among people taking the drug during clinical trials (story, 3B).

The news was offset by several merger announcements that reinforced the belief that companies are optimistic about the economy and therefore are willing to take some risks. Leading them was Bank of New York's $16.5 billion deal to buy rival Mellon Financial to create an asset-management powerhouse.

Bank of New York shares jumped 12% to end at $39.75, while Mellon shares ended up 7% at $42.78.

"Trading activity is being driven by the large amount of merger and acquisition announcements, specifically in the banking, semiconductor and hotel sectors of the market," says Michael Sheldon, market strategist at Spencer Clark.

LSI Logic, a maker of storage and DVD chips, said it would pay $4 billion for semiconductor and software storage company Agere Systems, sparking a rally in chip stocks. The semiconductor index rose 2%.

A break in the dollar's recent decline also raised the allure of U.S. stocks as investors bet on a strong Wall Street year-end finish.

The dollar edged up against most major currencies on Monday as investors moved in following a dollar decline that has shaved some 3% off its value in less than two weeks.

Crude ended down 99 cents a barrel at $62.44 amid forecasts of warmer weather in the USA and doubts among traders of another OPEC production cut.

The drop in oil prices spurred demand for industrial stocks such as United Technologies, Honeywell and 3M. United Technologies gained $1.04 to $64.90. Honeywell gained 80 cents to $43.61. 3M rose 91 cents to $80.89.

Merger Announcements Lift Stocks Even As Pfizer Dumps Key Drug (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 4 -- Wall Street surged higher Monday as investors dismissed Pfizer's decision to halt development of a key drug and focused instead on another series of takeover deals.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 89.72, or 0.74 percent, to 12,283.85. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 12.41, or 0.89 percent, at 1409.12, and the Nasdaq composite index added 35.18, or 1.46 percent, to 2448.39.

Pfizer shares fell by about 11 percent after the company stopped the development of torcetrapib, a cholesterol drug, because of deaths and cardiovascular problems among people taking it in clinical trials. The stock was also downgraded by several Wall Street analysts concerned that Pfizer's revenue growth would weaken.

But that news was offset by several merger announcements that reinforced the belief that companies are optimistic about the economy and therefore are willing to take some risks. Leading them was Bank of New York's $16.5 billion deal to buy rival Mellon Financial to create an asset management powerhouse. The all-stock deal will create the world's leading asset servicer with $16.6 trillion in assets under management. It also ranks among the top 10 global money managers, with more than $1.1 trillion in assets under management.

LSI Logic said it would buy rival chip and storage systems maker Agere Systems for $4 billion in stock. The purchase price represents a 28 percent premium for Agere shareholders.

And Kirk Kerkorian's investment firm, Tracinda, launched a cash tender offer to acquire 15 million shares of casino operator MGM Mirage.

Stocks stumbled Friday after a manufacturing survey unexpectedly contracted in November, pushing the major indicators to a loss for the week. However, major indicators are still poised to finish 2006 with double-digit gains.

Movers

Pfizer fell $2.96, to $24.90.

Merck gave up 36 cents, to $44.70.

Schering-Plough added 80 cents, to $22.73.

Bank of New York gained $4.27, to $39.75.

Mellon rose $2.73, to $42.78.

LSI fell $1.44, to $9.12.

Agere Systems rose $1.51, to $19.30.

MGM Mirage rose $2.68, to $56.35.

Wanted: Factory Workers (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, December 5, 2006

EMMAUS, Pa. — Michael Bunner has done everything he can think of to hire workers.

He's increased pay, offered training and recently, hired a man straight out of prison.

While his story isn't too surprising given that the unemployment rate of 4.4% is at a 51/2-year low, what is unexpected is that Bunner is in the manufacturing sector, an industry that has been grabbing headlines for losing jobs. But despite all those layoffs, Bunner can't find plastic welders or even people who are willing and able to be trained for the specialty job.

"I'm turning down contracts," says Bunner, president of Electro Chemical Engineering and Manufacturing, which makes chemical tanks. "I could expand 20-30% overnight if I had more people."

Much has been made of the loss of millions of manufacturing jobs in the USA in recent years.

But manufacturers, regardless of size, specialty or location, across the USA are reporting a dire shortage of skilled workers: people such as welders, electricians or machinists with a craft that goes beyond pushing buttons or stacking boxes but does not require a degree. That shortage is threatening their ability to meet current demand, let alone expand their businesses. The gap could threaten the viability of the U.S. manufacturing sector at a time when it is facing heavy competition from abroad.

In a survey of 800 manufacturers conducted by the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM) last year, more than 80% said they were experiencing a shortage of skilled workers. In October, manufacturers surveyed by the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said "finding qualified workers" was their biggest business problem.

The shortage of skilled workers is the result of a number of factors. One of the biggest is that manufacturing in the USA is becoming more high-tech and skill-based as the more repetitive, less-skilled work is moving abroad. Such jobs require greater expertise.

Plus, baby boomers with years of experience are retiring. And younger people are bypassing factory jobs, viewing them as repetitive, dirty and without much opportunity, a view that hasn't been helped by all the factory closings and headlines about manufacturing jobs moving to China.

These factors have combined to create a serious worker shortage with no end in sight.

"I've never seen anything like it in my life," says Bunner, whose father worked in a factory when he was growing up in West Virginia. "When I was a kid, people would stand in line for hours for an opportunity at a job like I have available. I can't get people to show up for an interview."

There were 10.2 million manufacturing production workers in the USA in October, down 19% from 10 years ago and 28% fewer than 40 years ago.

The percentage of all workers in the USA employed in manufacturing has been declining for 50 years. In October, 10% of the U.S. workforce was employed in the manufacturing sector, an all-time low. In 1946, one out of every three workers had jobs in manufacturing.

But the loss of jobs doesn't mean that manufacturing is disappearing from the USA. U.S. manufacturing production last year totaled $1.5 trillion, or 12% of gross domestic product, the broadest measure of economic activity within U.S. borders.

The sector has become more specialized, with a greater focus on technology. With a boom in productivity in manufacturing, firms are able to produce more with fewer workers.

Innovation in the manufacturing sector means that the jobs require greater skills than ever before. According to an analysis by economists Richard Deitz and James Orr at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, employment in high-skilled manufacturing jobs rose 37%, or by 1.2 million jobs, from 1983 to 2002. At the same time, low-skilled factory jobs dropped 25%, or by approximately 2 million workers.

"The time when you can be relatively unskilled and work in manufacturing for a long time with just a high school degree and make a good salary to support a family is gone," National Association of Manufacturers chief economist David Huether says.

But finding people with the right skills isn't easy.

"It's limiting my growth," says John West, president of Fox Valley Metal-Tech in Green Bay, Wis.

Earlier this year West turned down a $1.5 million contract with Kraft Foods because he didn't have enough welders. That order would have grown his business by 10%.

West's firm, which produces metal machinery parts, has increased pay and offers full health benefits, training, a matching 401(k) plan and bonuses to employees who refer people to work there.

"You get a good worker who has that skill set, you make sure they don't want to leave," West says. "You pay them well; you treat them well."

That's good news for Richard Smith. The 29-year-old from Chillicothe, Ohio, is graduating Dec. 15 from a nine-month welding program at the Hobart Institute of Welding Technology. He's received three job offers, paying $16 to $19 an hour, or more than three times the federal minimum wage. The companies are also paying medical benefits, offering 401(k) plans and paying for additional training.

"It really took me off my feet," says Smith, who got interested in welding while he was in the Navy.

Andre Odermatt, president of the Hobart Institute in Troy, Ohio, says job postings at the school have risen 40% in the last year. Companies are increasingly offering sign-on bonuses of as much as $3,000 and are coming from as far away as California and offering to pay relocation for students willing to move, he says.

"It's like having gone through Harvard," he says. "The world is open for them."

Odermatt and others say they think the shortage of skilled manufacturing workers is largely a function of perception.

"Culturally, we have browbeaten manufacturing to such an extent that we don't have people interested," says John Sinn, interim director of the Center for Applied Technology at Bowling Green State University.

Sinn and others say it is now up to people in manufacturing to change that perception, particularly among younger people and their parents.

"Everyone wants their kids to be doctors, lawyers and dentists. … (But) all of us can't be that," says Lloyd McCaffrey, director of manufacturing technology at Williams International, a gas turbine manufacturer in Ogden, Utah.

McCaffrey's company is investing $30 million in a program at nearby Ogden-Weber Applied Technology College that will bring in students, some of them in high school, for hands-on training in machining.

Representatives at Oklahoma State University-Okmulgee meet with students, some of whom are in middle school, to teach them about manufacturing. The university also recently started a program to help train disadvantaged youths, some of whom are on probation, in manufacturing basics.

"What we're saying is, 'Here is a good option.' … This is a very good career for a lot of people," says Roy Cail, executive director of the economic development and training center at the university.

What concerns Cail and others is that as the workforce ages and the baby boomers retire, the shortage of skilled manufacturing workers could grow more acute.

In 2005, 43% of manufacturing workers were 45 years old or older. That's up from 32% in 1995, according to a NAM analysis of Labor Department data.

"As the labor force ages, there really aren't young kids coming into the trades," says Patrick Duffy, president of American Machine & Gear in Portland, Ore. Duffy recently paid workers triple time to work on Thanksgiving to get an order out.

At Electro Chemical Engineering and Manufacturing, workers create tanks that are used to process, store or haul chemicals. The steel tanks are lined with a special plastic that prevents erosion and sometimes contain reactors to make the chemicals. Bunner's clients include major companies in the pharmaceutical, chemical and high-tech industries, such as Dow Chemical, Bayer, DuPont and General Electric.

Building the tanks takes a special skill in plastic welding. Even the tiniest crack can mean a chemical leakage, a potentially dangerous and even deadly situation.

But finding plastic welders, or even people interested in learning the skill, has become next to impossible. Bunner has had three open slots for welders since April. People have come in who can't do simple math — such as calculating square footages, a key skill when 1 square foot of plastic material goes for $250. He's also had people come in who have never used a tape measure or read blueprints.

Not only has Bunner increased pay, he offers a 401(k) with a matching program, health insurance and vacation time. But that still isn't working, so he's had to "go outside the box" to recruit, as he puts it.

When a local company shut down, he set up a booth in its human resources department. He hired two people that way. And he's working with the local rescue mission and prison ministry to try to identify candidates.

Bunner is also trying to bring former employees back. An employee who retired at 65 came back to work when he was 68. Soon, the company will be mailing letters to 13 former employees, asking if they'd be interested in working night or weekend hours.

"The fact that they worked for us and they are still alive, we are contacting them," he says.

Bunner notes with a tinge of irony that his business is just down the street from Allentown, Pa., the town Billy Joel made famous in 1982 with his song Allentown. In it Joel described the area's declining manufacturing base, particularly in the steel sector, saying it was "getting very hard to stay."

Electro Chemical used to serve the steel industry but has since adapted to more high-tech uses in the evolving economy, like many other companies.

"We had to adapt or die," he says.

But unless he finds enough people who can, as he puts it, "work with your hands and work with your head," companies like his are going to struggle to get ahead. He's perplexed why more people aren't going into manufacturing.

"Manufacturing has an ugly aura," he says. But "you can't have everyone sitting in a Dilbert cubicle. … Working with your hands, there's nothing wrong with that."

Wyoming Wins Over Mich. Job Seekers (USAT)

By Sharon Silke Carty

USA Today, December 5, 2006

At times, Kathy Emmons can sound like a tour guide.

Wyoming, says the director of the state's department of workforce services, isn't as cold in the winter as people think. There's very little traffic. Tons of skiing and snowboarding. No state income tax.

And the best part: lots of available jobs.

Wyoming, a state with a population of around 500,000, is seeing a boom in the energy, coal mining, high-tech data storage, communications and health care industries. The need for all kinds of workers, especially skilled ones, is so great that the state is actively recruiting from Michigan, were the situation is almost the exact opposite.

For the past two years, as General Motors, then Ford Motor and now Chrysler Group have sounded the siren on their worsening financial situations, workers have lived under the daily stress of knowing their jobs could be eliminated at any moment. More than 70,000 hourly autoworkers have agreed to take buyout packages this year.

The impact of those job losses is reverberating throughout Michigan's economy, affecting supplier companies that make everything from steel wheel wells to paper towels used in plant restrooms.

So, Wyoming officials thought, why not bring some of Michigan's displaced workers 1,000 miles west? The recruiting effort was "born out of absolute necessity to bring in people to fill jobs," Emmons says. "With only a half a million people, we just don't have enough people to fill the jobs."

About 100 people have made the move so far, and 6,000 more Michiganians have posted résumés on Wyoming's jobs website. Emmons considers the recruiting effort a big success, and the state is now brainstorming to determine what other regions to target for workers.

Few kids — except maybe some die-hard skiers — grow up dreaming of moving to Wyoming to make it big. Sandwiched between Idaho and Utah to the west and South Dakota and Nebraska to the east, the Rocky Mountain state has a reputation for harsh winters and, well, that might be about it.

"We want to make sure we target states that make sense," Emmons says. "People think of Wyoming as having really hard winters. It really doesn't. … But it wouldn't make sense to recruit people from Florida."

Michigan may be a perfect target area. It's a state where winter lasts for five or six months. And its unemployment rate was 6.9% in October, the highest in the nation. Wyoming's rate was 3.3%. The national average was 4.4%.

"We've clearly had a difficult time over the last three years," says Dana Johnson, chief economist for Detroit's Comerica Bank. "It feels terrible, and it's discouraging and frustrating. Some people will react to that by looking for opportunities elsewhere, where the wind is more at their back."

Karen and Brian Peters, longtime Michigan residents, never thought they'd leave the state before retiring four or five years from now. Karen, a University of Michigan alumna and huge football fan, was used to spending summers by the lake and fall weekends at Michigan's "Big House" football stadium.

After her husband was laid off from his job as an electrician, Karen's job as a nurse managing workers' compensation claims continued paying the bills. But as Brian's unemployment dragged on, things started getting tough.

"We tried to stay very positive with the friends we have in Michigan, but it was very hard on my husband," Karen Peters said.

So when Brian easily landed a job working as an electrician in the Rio Tinto coal mines in Wyoming, Karen started looking, too. She found an opening for a job working for the state and got it with just one phone interview.

"There was no way I could say we weren't going to do it," says Karen Peters, who has three grandchildren.

There could be a downside to a mass exodus of skilled workers from Michigan, warns David Cole, chairman for the Center for Automotive Research. While the job losses seem significant today, many of the people accepting buyouts were close to retirement age anyway and would have left within the next four or five years.

Cole says the auto industry likely will face a shortage of skilled workers within the next decade. "We're very close to the point where the question is going to be, 'Where am I going to find someone to fill this job?' "

More Borrowers With Risky Loans Are Falling Behind (WSJ)

By Ruth Simon And James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Americans who have stretched themselves financially to buy a home or refinance a mortgage have been falling behind on their loan payments at an unexpectedly rapid pace.

The surge in mortgage delinquencies in the past few months is squeezing lenders and unsettling investors world-wide in the $10 trillion U.S. mortgage market. The pain is most apparent in subprime mortgages, though there are signs it is spreading to other parts of the mortgage market.

Subprime mortgages are loans made to borrowers who are considered to be higher credit risks because of past payment problems, high debt relative to income or other factors. Lenders typically charge them higher interest rates -- as much as four percentage points more than more-credit-worthy borrowers pay -- one reason subprime mortgages are among the most profitable segments of the industry.

They also have been among the fastest-growing segments. Subprime mortgage originations climbed to $625 billion in 2005 from $120 billion in 2001, according to Inside Mortgage Finance, a trade publication. Like other types of mortgages, subprime home loans are often packaged into securities and sold to investors, helping lenders limit their risks.

Until the past year or so, delinquency rates were low by historical standards, thanks to low interest rates and rising home prices, which made it easy for borrowers to refinance or sell their homes if they ran into trouble. But as the housing market peaked and loan volume leveled off, some lenders responded by relaxing their lending standards. Now, the downside of that strategy is becoming more apparent. (See related article1.)

Based on current performance, 2006 is on track to be one of the worst ever for subprime loans, according to UBS AG. "We are a bit surprised by how fast this has unraveled," says Thomas Zimmerman, head of asset-backed securities research at UBS. Roughly 80,000 subprime borrowers who took out mortgages packaged into securities this year are behind on their payments, the bank says.

Though delinquency rates on subprime mortgages originated in the past year have soared to the highest levels in a decade, economists don't expect any significant harm to the nation's economy or financial systems. But if late payments and foreclosures continue to rise at a faster-than-expected pace, the pain could extend beyond homeowners and lenders to the investors who buy mortgage-backed securities.

Several lenders are already feeling the sting. H&R Block Inc., which operates Option One, a major subprime lender, said last week that its mortgage-services unit posted a pretax loss of $39 million in the fiscal second quarter ended Oct. 31, compared with a year-earlier pretax profit of $48.8 million. The Kansas City-based tax-services company said last month it is considering selling Option One, which has been struggling with higher interest rates and defaults, and is closing 12 branch offices.

On Friday, KeyCorp said it reached a deal to sell its subprime Champion Mortgage business. Analysts at Friedman, Billings, Ramsey & Co. put the price for the company's subprime mortgage operation at $130 million, "far below" the $200 million to $250 million they expected. A spokeswoman for KeyCorp declined to comment, except to say that KeyCorp feels it "definitely generated a fair price" for both the unit and its loan portfolio, which was sold separately. She added that KeyCorp was leaving the subprime market because "it no longer fits with our long-term strategic priorities."

Soaring delinquencies are making some lenders more cautious, which is likely to put further pressure on the weak housing market. Yesterday, the National Association of Realtors said that its index for pending home sales for October fell a seasonally adjusted rate of 1.7% from September and was down 13.2% from a year earlier.

Delinquency rates have been rising steadily since the middle of 2005. But the trend has accelerated sharply in the past two to three months, according to an analysis by UBS. The figures don't include loans that lenders were forced to repurchase because the borrower went into default in the first few months; such repurchases also have increased sharply this year.

In October, borrowers were 60 days or more behind in payments on 3.9% of the subprime home loans packaged into mortgage securities this year, UBS says. That's nearly twice the delinquency rate on new subprime loans recorded a year earlier.

Carol Alter, a mail carrier in Aurora, Ohio, says she bought her first home for $99,000 at a sheriff's foreclosure sale in February, but felt pinched right from the start by her nearly $80,000 subprime mortgage. She says closing costs on the loan totaled $6,500, rather than the $2,500 she expected, forcing her to drain her savings and miss payments on her utility bills.

Ms. Alter says she fell behind on her mortgage payments in June after she hurt her leg and missed several weeks of work. She has been able to stave off foreclosure, she says, with the help of a $2,100 interest-free loan from Neighborhood Development Services in Ravenna, which operates a foreclosure rescue fund.

How much higher delinquencies further climb will depend in part on the depth of the current housing slump. Mortgage delinquencies generally rise when the housing market cools because borrowers who are in financial trouble find it harder to sell their homes. In addition, if prices fall, they may not have enough equity in their homes to refinance their mortgage.

The subprime industry's current troubles can be traced back to 2003 and 2004, when defaults were unusually low. Investors who purchased these loans did well and were eager to buy more. That encouraged lenders to lower their standards, making loans to more people with low credit ratings. Lenders also grew less inclined to demand full documentation of income and assets and more willing to offer "piggyback" loans that allowed borrowers to finance 90% or 100% of the purchase price without being required to buy private mortgage insurance.

Many lenders kept introductory "teaser" rates low even after short-term interest rates began rising in June 2005, while increasing the amount the rate could rise on the first adjustment. That meant borrowers would face sharply higher costs when their monthly payments were reset.

Fraud has also increased. Some borrowers who took out no- or low-documentation loans were coached by loan officers or mortgage brokers to inflate their incomes and couldn't afford even their first mortgage payment, says Theresa Ortiz, a foreclosure manager with Neighborhood Housing Services of New York City, a nonprofit that works with homeowners in financial trouble.

Even after the housing market started to cool in late 2005, lenders continued to offer credit on easy terms. Many didn't begin tightening up until a few months ago. Now, they are pulling back. Accredited Home Lenders Holding Co., for example, is doing fewer piggyback and stated-income loans -- or loans that don't require borrowers to fully document their income -- especially for people with lower credit scores. In retrospect, "the tightening process should have started a bit earlier," says James Konrath, Accredited's CEO.

Recent analyses by UBS and by RBS Greenwich Capital show that subprime loans made in 2006 are going into foreclosure at a faster pace than loans made in previous years. In many cases these loans are "so bad right off the bat" and so far beyond the borrower's ability to pay that giving the borrower more time to pay or restructuring the loan wouldn't help, says Michael van Zalingen, director of homeownership services at Neighborhood Housing Services of Chicago, a nonprofit organization that works with financially distressed homeowners.

If delinquencies continue to grow, the pain could also be felt by investors who have flooded into the market for subprime securities. Because of the way mortgage-backed securities are structured, investors who buy investment-grade securities aren't likely to be hurt if losses are close to expectations. But if losses on the underlying mortgages substantially exceed expectations, some investors who buy the riskiest slices of subprime securities are likely to rack up losses. These include hedge funds and investors who buy collateralized debt obligations, pools of debt instruments that are often snapped up by foreign buyers.

Because the underlying loans have gotten riskier, credit-rating agencies are telling issuers of mortgage-backed bonds to set aside more money to cover losses than they did three years ago in order to get an AAA rating for their bonds.

But some recent deals are already coming under review. Standard & Poor's Corp. put one deal backed by loans issued by Fremont General Corp.'s mortgage unit on credit watch for possible downgrade last month and says it could take similar action on deals from several other issuers within the next few months. Fremont declined to comment.

"We are really monitoring very, very closely the portfolios of all the subprime issuers," says Ernestine Warner, head of RMBS Surveillance. "It's an industrywide trend."

Last week, Moody's Investors Service put a third 2006 deal on credit watch for a possible downgrade. Fitch Ratings also has a 2006 deal on credit watch. When mortgage-backed securities are downgraded it is typically during their third or fourth year.

Predicting losses on these securities is a challenge because there's little or no historical evidence to show how subprime loans will perform at a time when home prices are falling, says Thomas Lawler, a housing economist in Vienna, Va. An analysis by Merrill Lynch & Co. found that losses on recent subprime deals could be "in the 6% to 8% range" if home prices are flat next year and could rise to the "double digits" if home prices fall by 5%. Falling home prices could trigger losses not only for investors who bought riskier classes of mortgage-backed securities, but also for some holders of A-rated bonds, according to the report.

Dems' Gains In New Hampshire Spur 2008 Optimism For Sununu's Seat (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

Hill, December 5, 2006

If it was a Democratic wave that swept the country last month, it was a Democratic tsunami rushing over New Hampshire.

Battle lines will surely be drawn in 2008 in the Granite State over its two state houses and two U.S. House seats, which all flipped Democratic in dramatic fashion on Election Day — not to mention the state's having the first presidential primary in the nation.

But the lone red state in the Northeast, if one can still call it red, still has two Republican senators who were not up for reelection this year. In two years, however, freshman Sen. John Sununu (R) could well be headed for a race worthy of what has become the biggest little state in American politics.

Nearly a quarter of the 400 seats in the state House flipped, and exactly one quarter of the 24 seats in the state Senate flipped. Democrats now control each chamber with a nearly 60 percent majority.

Coupled with the reelection of Democratic Gov. John Lynch, these shifts give New Hampshire Democrats control of the state capitol for the first time in more than 130 years and a bright eye toward 2008 and, specifically, Sununu's seat.

"Certainly, the environment is more favorable for a Democrat than it has been in quite some time," said Portsmouth Mayor Steve Marchand (D), who last week indicated he would weigh a challenge to Sununu. "From a Democratic perspective, New Hampshire had about as favorable a day as any state in the country a few weeks ago."

The state-level action was overshadowed nationally by the losses of the state's two House members, Republican Reps. Jeb Bradley and Charlie Bass. Bradley was stunned by underfunded anti-war activist Carol Shea-Porter while Bass lost to Democrat Paul Hodes.

Shea-Porter and Hodes both figure to be attractive targets in 2008, and the state GOP is already attacking them in press releases.

The events of last month capped off a shift in the political landscape of New Hampshire, said St. Anselm College politics professor Dante Scala.

Scala said the transition from red to blue in New Hampshire is something that has been evolving for a while. The Republican-dominated state government simply hadn't yet changed to reflect it, he said.

"The political demographics of the state have deteriorated for John Sununu since 2002; 2002 was, in retrospect, a high-water mark for the Republican Party for the whole decade and maybe for longer than that," Scala said. "Ever since then, Democrats have really had the upper hand in terms of simple voter enthusiasm.

President Bush won New Hampshire in 2000, but Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) won it in 2004.

"Republicans can no longer count on a lead among the base voters the way they used to," said Scala.

Scala suggested that Sununu would be especially vulnerable in the absence of a Republican presidential nominee who appeals to the state's voters, adding that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who ran away with nearly 50 percent of the vote in the 2000 presidential primary there, would be a boon to Sununu.

The trick for Democrats is finding a candidate worthy of the race, and three potential challengers with valuable statewide experience appear unlikely to run.

Perhaps the strongest candidate, Lynch, was returned to office with a record 74 percent of the vote last month and doesn't plan to leave.

Former state Sen. Burt Cohen (D), who dropped a bid against Sen. Judd Gregg (R) in 2004 amid flawed financial filings, was recently charged with disobeying a police officer and resisting arrest during an incident stemming from a traffic stop.

And former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen (D), who lost to Sununu by four points in 2002, is unlikely to run again, according to a New Hampshire Democratic Party source who "would be surprised" if Shaheen left her post as head of Harvard University's Institute of Politics. Asked about Sununu, Shaheen was reported in The Harvard Law Record as saying she has noticed that Sununu's approval rating is under 50 percent. She could not be reached for comment.

State senators who have been mentioned as potential candidates are also faced with deciding between their newfound majority and a difficult and costly bid to unseat Sununu. State Sen. Maggie Hassan, who will be a part of the new majority's leadership, told The Hill last week that her party's ascent quashed any thought she might have had of running.

State Sens. Peter Burling, Joe Foster and David Gottesman have also been mentioned, along with former Rep. Dick Swett.

Marchand, 32, indicated he would mull the decision with his family over the next several weeks and said it is important that he or any candidate decide by early next year so he or she can compete financially. Sununu, who raised $3.5 million and was outspent by more than $2 million in 2002, had $560,000 on hand at the end of September.

State Democratic Party Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan said she is optimistic that the gains Democrats made in the state will lead to increased interest in running against Sununu, since candidates will feel better about their chances.

She said adding hotly contested U.S. Senate and presidential races to defending their gains in the state and the U.S. House will surely make for a full plate for state Democrats, but that it's a nice problem to have.

DOJ_NMG_0102311

"We were saying on election night — it's like the New Hampshire we always hoped we would see but never dreamed would happen," Sullivan said. "It's great. Now we've got to just try to hold on."

In a statement, Sununu said he would run his 2008 campaign just like past efforts.

"As they have always been, our campaign in 2008 will be an aggressive town-to-town, person-to-person effort — strong on grassroots organization and focused on the issues that matter most to New Hampshire citizens," Sununu said.

Brownback Moves Toward White House Bid (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, December 5, 2006

After taking the first step in a presidential bid on Monday, Sen. Sam Brownback said he would start a 10-state tour with a traditional stop in Iowa. Then he's going to jail.

The Kansas Republican plans to spend Friday night at Louisiana's notorious state penitentiary in Angola to highlight the problem of recidivism and programs that can help prisoners become law-abiding members of the community.

It's an unusual route, possibly a first for a potential presidential candidate. But the prison stay captures the complexity of Brownback's views and his desire to broaden his appeal beyond religious conservatives who form his natural base.

"There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion," Brownback said in a statement.

Brownback established an exploratory committee that will allow him to travel the country and raise money while gauging support for his long-shot White House bid.

Brownback, 50, says his deep faith in God guides his well-known opposition to abortion, gay marriage and embryonic stem-cell research. He pledged to make "issues of life," fiscal restraint and tax reform key components of his effort to woo supporters.

But his faith also leads him to tackle social injustice around the world. He's spearheaded legislation to fight genocide in Sudan and clamp down on human slave trafficking. Last week, he took an AIDS test with a potential White House rival on the Democratic side — Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois — to encourage others to be tested.

"We believe in a culture of life — that every human life is a beautiful, sacred, unique child of a loving God," Brownback said in a statement on his new Web site.

Brownback has openly weighed a presidential bid for nearly two years, but has struggled to build a national profile despite more than a dozen trips to Iowa and other states with early nomination contests.

The senator's best chance to make a splash in Iowa remains with influential members of the GOP's powerful conservative Christian wing. Those voters tend to be skeptical of better-known, more moderate Republicans such as Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, who also have established exploratory committees.

The number of possible candidates with a claim to the religious right has shrunk in recent weeks with the defeat of Sen. George Allen of Virginia in the midterm election and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's decision to forego a run for president.

But with many other contenders expected to jump into the wide-open race, Brownback needs to focus on Iowa and spend as much time as he can to generate more name recognition, said Chuck Hurley, president of the conservative Iowa Family Policy Center and an old law school classmate who's been supporting Brownback.

"The next 30 to 60 days obviously will be critical," Hurley said. "He's really got to describe who he is and get enough recognition that people see for sure that he's serious and that he's credible."

On Monday, Brownback announced 20 members of his exploratory advisory committee, an eclectic mix ranging from anti-abortion activists to business executives, including: Domino's Pizza founder Tom Monaghan, former Major League Baseball commissioner Bowie Kuhn, and the Rev. Frank Pavone, head of the advocacy group Priests for Life.

Brownback, who grew up on a farm near tiny Parker, Kan., was elected to the U.S. House in 1994 with the wave of Republicans who seized control of Congress. Two years later, he won a special election to succeed Bob Dole in the Senate after Dole left the seat to run for president.

Brownback promised to serve no more than two terms and has said he will not seek re-election in 2010.

Brownback Takes Step Toward Seeking GOP Presidential Nod (CQ)

By Martin Kady II

Congressional Quarterly, December 5, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback is joining an increasingly crowded field of 2008 presidential candidates, hoping his social conservative credentials will appeal to Republican primary voters.

Brownback, R-Kan., has formed an exploratory committee, allowing him to raise money and travel. He would be considered a dark horse right out of the gate, standing in the shadows of Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani. But Brownback says there is room in the Republican race for a committed social conservative who has been more outspoken on gay marriage, judicial activism and abortion. In courting the right wing, Brownback will be competing immediately with outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, another favorite of conservatives.

"I am running to spread hope and ideas," Brownback said Monday in a statement on his Web site. "We are a blessed nation at an important crossroads. War, corruption, disintegrating families, and for some, hopelessness, tear at the American dream. We need hope and ideas."

On the Democratic side, Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., announced over the weekend he was creating an exploratory committee to run for president, and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., is reportedly conducting closed-door meetings with New York Democrats to discuss her possible candidacy.

Brownback may have a tough time standing out in the crowded GOP field, but he has ways of courting controversy.

Brownback caused a stir in recent weeks by holding up a judicial nominee who had merely attended a gay marriage ceremony, saying that going to the ceremony could affect the judge's professional judgement should gay marriage issues come before the court.

In his announcement, Brownback made it clear his faith would be front and center in his nascent campaign.

"We believe in a culture of life—that every human life is a beautiful, sacred, unique child of a loving God," Brownback said.

But Brownback's social conservative activism extends beyond the traditional issues of gay marriage and abortion. He is one of the Senate's most frequent travelers to Africa, speaking out for the continent's AIDS victims. He has five children, including two adopted internationally. He is an advocate for prison reform and sees himself as a true believer in compassionate conservatism.

"The place to grow the vote for Republicans is in the compassionate conservative field," Brownback said in an interview this summer with Congressional Quarterly. "Bush had a great line on compassionate conservatism, but a lot of people feel like he hasn't delivered on it. I'm really mining the area, whether it's prison reform, reconciliation — particularly with African Americans, poverty reduction."

Brownback converted to Catholicism late in life, and on Sundays he has been known to attend two separate church services — a Catholic Mass on his own and Protestant services with his family.

Brownback realizes he is a long shot, but says there is a "calling" for people who run for president.

"My decision has always been based on whether you feel a real calling to do it at all," Brownback said in the interview. "If you feel like this is really something you're called to do, do it. I don't care what the polls say and what the money is."

Brownback Begins Bid For White House (KCS)

By Matt Stearns

The Kansas City Star, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON | For Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, the time for coyness is over.

The conservative Republican, "after much prayerful consideration," took his first official step in a long-anticipated, long-shot 2008 bid for the White House Monday when he filed papers with the Federal Election Commission creating a presidential exploratory committee.

Forming an exploratory committee allows Brownback to raise money and hire staff for a presidential campaign and to transfer money from his Senate campaign committee to the exploratory committee. It is one step short of a full-fledged campaign announcement, but in a prepared statement Brownback sounded like a full-throated candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0102313

Calling the United States "a blessed nation at an important crossroads," Brownback said "I am running for America…to be of service in a crucial time of trial."

His first campaign stop will be Tuesday in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to be followed by visits to ten states over the next month.

Brownback has spent the past two years road-testing a theme he describes as "renewing the culture."

It's a unique amalgam of old-fashioned Republican social and fiscal conservatism combined with a progressive, internationalist message of reconciliation between rich and poor, deeply informed by religious faith.

He is a leading opponent of abortion rights, embryonic stem cell research and gay marriage. But he is generally opposed to the death penalty and has made alleviating disease and poverty in the developing world a cornerstone of his Senate efforts.

Brownback called for a flat tax, for term limits for judges and members of Congress, and for "compassionate yet practical programs to help the poor here and around the world," in his prepared statement Monday.

He wrote that he considered "my citizenship and the responsibilities it carries today in the light of eternity."

A 20-member exploratory advisory group includes Tom Monaghan, founder of Domino's Pizza; Bowie Kuhn, former Major League Baseball commissioner; retired Gen. Charles Krulak, former U.S. Marine Corps commandant; and Steve McEveety, a Hollywood producer closely affiliated with Mel Gibson (his credits include The Passion of the Christ).

Also officially on board: Chuck Hurley, a friend of Brownback from law school who is a leader among social conservatives in Iowa, site of the crucial first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses in 13 months.

Brownback's Senate chief of staff, Rob Wasinger, will leave to run the exploratory committee. Kansas native Wasinger has worked for Brownback for 10 years and is well-known and well-regarded in Washington and national social conservative circles.

Brownback joins a field expected to be crowded.

Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani recently created presidential exploratory committees. Other Republicans in various stages of running: Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, and California Rep. Duncan Hunter.

But the field has thinned unexpectedly in ways that could help Brownback. Three Republicans also expected to compete for the party's socially conservative base in the party won't be factors: Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist dropped out last week. Virginia Sen. George Allen and Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum lost Senate re-election bids.

Still, Brownback faces daunting challenges, chiefly fundraising and name recognition.

Between his Senate committee and his Restore America political action committee, Brownback has about $650,000 at his disposal.

Compare that to Sen. Evan Bayh, an Indiana Democrat who said Sunday he'll form an exploratory committee this week for his own dark horse 2008 candidacy. He's got $10.5 million in his Senate account that he can transfer.

In early polls, Brownback routinely is near the bottom, around 1 or 2 percent. But he is a darling of the social conservatives who are the backbone of the Republican party in many states. He must persuade them he is electable.

"Ours is an exceptional nation united by our ideals," Brownback said. "But we are a great nation because of our goodness. If we ever lose our goodness, we will surely lose our greatness… we need a culture that encourages what is right and discourages what is wrong – and has the wisdom to understand the difference."

Brownback, A Favorite Among Social Conservatives, To Explore 2008 Presidential Bid (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., a favorite of social conservatives, announced Monday that he was taking the first step toward a 2008 White House run by setting up an exploratory committee.

"I have decided, after much prayerful consideration, to consider a bid for the Republican nomination for the presidency," he said in a statement. "There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture, and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion."

DOJ_NMG_0102314

The formation of such a committee allows Brownback to begin raising money and test support for a presidential race without making a formal commitment to seek the nomination. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani already have such groups, but neither GOP hopeful has wide appeal among conservatives.

In recent weeks, several candidates on the right have fallen from contention: Sen. Bill Frist, R-Tenn., see took himself out of the running, and Sens. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., and George Allen, R-Va., were defeated in their re-election bids, dashing their presidential hopes.

"Obviously there's a vacancy on the right, and (Brownback) may well fit the niche," said Stu Rothenberg of the Rothenberg Political Report. "He's a long shot -- but you don't have any shot if you don't throw your hat in the ring."

Raised as a Methodist, Brownback became a Roman Catholic in 2002. He has worked with Democrats on bills to stop human trafficking, end starvation in Uganda and genocide in Sudan, extend a path to citizenship to illegal immigrants, curb recidivism and ease the AIDS epidemic in Africa.

He also has pushed for a Smithsonian museum on black history and for a federal apology to American Indians to "help us move toward reconciliation" with two groups that "didn't feel like America had been fair to them."

And, outraged by singer Janet Jackson's 2004 Super Bowl halftime "wardrobe malfunction," he was instrumental in requiring the Federal Communications Commission to increase the fines for indecency on the airwaves.

An opponent of abortion, same-sex marriage and embryonic stem-cell research, Brownback often chairs meetings of the Values Action Team, where advocacy groups meet to track social conservative legislation.

"He will add a lot to the national, not just the presidential, debate," said Wendy Wright, president of Concerned Women for America, a group represented at those meetings. "He truly understands the conservative point of view. It is so frustrating for us when politicians try to pander to us. Brownback is consistent."

Elected to the House in the "Republican revolution" of 1994, Brownback ran for the Senate four years later, pledging to serve only two terms.

In an interview this summer with the Weekly Standard, a conservative magazine, he signaled that he intended to model himself on Ronald Reagan, whom he first supported when Reagan unsuccessfully sought the GOP presidential nomination in 1976.

Brownback, a graduate of Kansas State University and the University of Kansas law school, was raised on his family's farm in Parker, Kan., and served as secretary of the Kansas Board of Agriculture for seven years. He was named a White House Fellow in 1990, working for Trade Representative Carla Hills. A supporter of free trade and a flat tax, he has voted to authorize trade relations with China and phase out estate and gift taxes. He voted for -- and, aides say, still supports -- the Iraq war.

"Culturally and geographically, Sen. Brownback is a tremendous fit for Iowa -- the strongest fit of any candidate, Democrat or Republican," said David Kensinger, his former chief of staff and an informal campaign adviser. "He's clearly going to run as a Reagan Republican."

Brownback Seeks '08 Conservative Mantle (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, December 5, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) yesterday established a presidential exploratory committee, seeking to fill what conservatives say is an absence of strong conservative leadership among top-tier Republican White House candidates.

Brownback immediately sought to position himself as the leading social conservative of the 2008 field.

"I have decided, after much prayerful consideration, to consider a bid for the Republican nomination for the presidency," Brownback said in a statement. "There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion."

Brownback, along with outgoing Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), has in recent years been the Senate's most vocal advocate of social conservatives' agenda on abortion and related issues.

Brownback's appeal to social conservatives could help him become the leading alternative to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the perceived frontrunner.

DOJ_NMG_0102315

"The way I see the race shaping up is that it's going to be McCain against someone who's not McCain," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union. "McCain has a lot of people in the party who don't like him."

McCain has opposed his party on key issues such as tax cuts, campaign finance reform, gun control and global warming — stances that won the admiration of the nation's media elite, whom conservatives distrust.

Brownback is the third Republican member of Congress to create an exploratory committee. McCain and House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) have both established such panels, as has former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani.

McCain, Giuliani and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is expected to set up an exploratory committee soon, are considered by Republican insiders and political analysts as the top tier. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, an ordained Baptist minister popular with social conservatives, is also among the upper echelon of GOP candidates.

The two Republican officials who were thought to have the best chance of becoming the conservatives' choice candidate, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), have both dropped out of contention. Frist announced last week that he would not run, and Allen lost his reelection bid in an upset after a dismal campaign that did much damage to his long-term appeal.

Social conservatives are wary of McCain for his stance on campaign finance, of Romney for his views on abortion, and of Giuliani because of his beliefs on both abortion and homosexual rights.

Many are gravitating toward Huckabee because of his experience as a minister, but Huckabee has alienated small-government fiscal conservatives because he raised taxes as governor.

The three most prominent aspirants, McCain, Giuliani, and Romney, are expected to run as centrists, even though they are all now working hard to court conservative support.

"Each of those three is going to run toward the center of the Reagan coalition," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, a leader of libertarian small-government conservatives, who hosts a weekly meeting of prominent activists. "McCain despite his apostasy is trying to get in the right place on guns and taxes; Romney is trying to run as a more conservative candidate [and] Giuliani I assume will do the same thing when he gets in the race."

Norquist criticized Huckabee's record on fiscal issues.

"He keeps raising taxes," Norquist said, then alluded to Huckabee's authorship of a book on his personal weight loss. "He has raised taxes more than once. The one thing Huckabee is known for is that he's lost lots of weight. I would prefer a fat guy with a skinny budget."

Tom McClusky, vice president of government affairs for the Family Research Council, one of the most influential conservative advocacy groups in Washington, said Giuliani has been historically "pro-gay rights and pro-abortion."

McCain, he said, has been "moderately pro-life" and supported issues adamantly opposed by social conservatives, such as embryonic stem-cell research and fetal- tissue research.

Romney, who declared his support for abortion rights during an unsuccessful 1994 Senate race, has a "spotty record on life," said McCluskey, who said Romney is now "certainly coming around on the issue, which we hope he will, and he has good people working for him."

McClusky said Brownback might be able to fill a conservative leadership void among top-tier candidates. But even if he does not win the nomination, Brownback could have a major impact on the Republican primary by defining the debate on abortion and other related "life" issues, he said.

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, who hosts a weekly meeting of influential social conservatives, acknowledged the perceived weakness of conservative credentials among the GOP's presidential frontrunners. He said Brownback or Huckabee could fill the role of a strong socially conservative candidate.

"Brownback's candidacy potentially gives us a vehicle and there may be others, like Gov. Huckabee of Arkansas, who many favor because he's a former preacher and is mesmerizing in his speaking ability."

Weyrich said that he and other conservative leaders would meet with and question leading presidential candidates to understand their views.

DOJ_NMG_0102316

"If we can, we're gong to try to get behind one of them," said Weyrich. "If we do, we can give one of the candidates a considerable boost and could kick one of them to the top tier."

Conservative leaders uniting behind Brownback could push him to the final stages of the GOP primary or perhaps to the nomination.

But Keene, who is also columnist for The Hill, said Brownback's strength is also his weakness. He may appeal to social conservatives but faces the challenge of having to win over a broader spectrum of Republicans.

"His reach doesn't go much beyond the social conservative base," said Keene. "To run a viable candidacy you have to do more than that. At least Brownback has a claim that none of the others have on that segment of the movement. His challenge will be to get other conservatives, [such as] anti-tax people."

Keene said Brownback is better known by conservative voters than other Republicans positioning themselves as alternatives to McCain. He cited former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson and former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore as examples.

Keene said conservatives are afraid of McCain because of his past stances on tax cuts and campaign finance reform, and because he has a reputation for doling out political retribution.

"Conservatives are afraid of him because they think he doesn't like them and goes after most people he doesn't like," said Keene.

Sen. Brownback Forms Group To Explore White House Bid (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback joined the ever-growing group of politicians with an eye on the White House by announcing the creation of an exploratory committee for a presidential run yesterday.

The Kansas Republican made clear that he will focus on the socially conservative themes that have formed the foundation of his career in elected office. "There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture, and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion," he said.

Brownback allies noted that the formation of the exploratory group, which will allow the senator to raise money and travel the country to gauge support for a presidential bid, is a pro forma move and that he will almost certainly launch a full-fledged campaign.

Brownback is the fifth Republican to signal his intention to pursue the presidency in 2008. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and Rep. Duncan Hunter (Calif.) have formed exploratory committees, while Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is expected to join the race in early 2007. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.) and former congressman Newt Gingrich (Ga.) also have been mentioned as candidates for the GOP nomination.

In declaring his intentions so early, Brownback is hoping to stake out a position as the most viable conservative in the field. Neither McCain nor Romney is the first choice of social conservatives, and analysts said there is room for a candidate who fills that niche.

"He is the candidate of movement conservatives," said David Kensinger, a former Brownback chief of staff and a member of the senator's political inner circle.

Brownback began his political career with his 1994 election to the House. He was elected to the Senate in 1996, filling the seat vacated by Robert J. Dole (R). Throughout his tenure, Brownback has been one of the staunchest conservatives in Congress. He speaks often about the importance of religion in his life -- he converted from Protestantism to Catholicism in 2002 -- and is a critic of abortion and its impact on the culture more broadly.

Matt Keelen, a Republican lobbyist not affiliated with any '08 candidate, said Brownback's campaign will be "compassionate conservatism on steroids" with a strong focus on poverty and moral issues.

Kensinger argued that Brownback's political positioning makes him the ideal candidate for the Iowa caucuses, which tend to be dominated by social conservatives. While Brownback has kept a low public profile in Iowa, he has been working hard behind the scenes to build a volunteer-heavy grass-roots effort -- meeting with small groups in churches and living rooms -- under the belief that President Bush's reelection effort affirmed the import of ground troops.

Brownback's social-conservative credentials should get him in the door of many Iowa Republican households. What's more, having been raised on a farm outside of Parker, Kan., Brownback is as well versed as any candidate in the field on the agriculture issues so important to Iowa and enjoys home-state proximity, his supporters say.

Money is a major hurdle for Brownback, who has never raised or spent more than $2.5 million on a race. At the end of September, he had $600,000 in his Senate campaign account.

Kensinger acknowledged that Brownback's fundraising ability remains an open question but added: "If you can win Iowa, you are going to have all the money you need overnight."

Swelling 2008 Field Signals Expensive Race (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas on Monday became the fourth major presidential hopeful to set up a fundraising committee for 2008, testimony to the demands of a White House race shaping up as the most expensive in U.S. history.

Brownback is a Roman Catholic and social conservative active on issues such as abortion, prison reform, global AIDS and poverty. On Monday, he said he wants to talk to the country about fiscal restraint, tax reform, economic growth and a foreign policy that is "vigorous yet compassionate and consistent."

Two leading GOP prospects, Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, already have formed exploratory committees. A third, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, is also preparing to run. Other prospects include Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and New York Gov. George Pataki.

On the Democratic side, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is in the race and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh is expected to form a fundraising committee today. Decisions one way or the other are expected after the holidays from a half-dozen Democrats, among them New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry and former North Carolina senator John Edwards.

The pace of campaigns has been accelerating since 2000, when then-Texas governor George W. Bush formed an exploratory committee in March 1999 and started campaigning in June. Democrat Howard Dean officially started his 2004 bid in May 2002.

The big change for 2008 is the sheer scale of fundraising necessary to compete with celebrity candidates such as Clinton and McCain, and to prepare for spending unfettered by federal rules and caps.

Bush, Dean and Kerry turned down public money for the 2004 primary season because it would have required them to limit their spending. Nominees Bush and Kerry did accept about $75 million apiece in government funds for the general election campaign.

Michael Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission, says he expects that "for the first time ever," nominees of both parties in 2008 will opt out of the public financing system for both the primaries and the general. "The stage is set for the first billion-dollar presidential election," Toner says, predicting the eventual nominees will raise $500 million apiece.

Top-tier prospects such as McCain, Giuliani, Romney and Clinton should plan on raising $100 million by the end of 2007, Toner says. "If you're not in that ballgame, it's going to be hard to be taken seriously." That's nearly four times as much as Kerry, the Democratic nominee in 2004, raised in 2003.

The demands are equally stiff on lower-tier candidates. Republican strategist Alex Vogel says "the threshold for respectability" for Brownback and other long shots is $10 million by the end of March 2007. "This early money is friends and family money," he says. "If you can't bank $10 million in easy money, how long realistically are you going to stay in this process?"

Edwards raised the most money of the Democratic hopefuls in the first quarter of 2003, $7.4 million.

Brownback says he'll visit 10 states this month, including an overnight stay Friday at a Louisiana prison to dramatize the need for prison reforms and promote faith-based prison programs. Today he is in Iowa, where he has been cultivating Christian conservatives.

Ray Dearin, an active Republican and a professor of campaign rhetoric at Iowa State University, calls Christian conservatives "the predominant organized force" in the Iowa Republican Party. He says they view Brownback and Huckabee favorably — but after Republican defeats last month nationally and in Iowa, "they probably are going to be pretty pragmatic and look for someone who's likely to win."

Two early favorites of religious conservatives are no longer options: Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, who says he won't run, and Virginia Sen. George Allen, who lost his re-election bid. Dearin said McCain, who skipped Iowa in his 2000 nomination race, could benefit.

Brownback released a list of supporters that includes several active in the fight against abortion. But McCain outmaneuvered him in Iowa last week by snagging Marlys Popma, a prominent GOP activist who used to head Iowa Right to Life. Dearin called her decision "a signal to a lot of Christian evangelicals that John McCain is OK."

Obama Meets Party Donors In New York (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

Senator Barack Obama treaded onto Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's home turf last night to meet with prominent Democratic donors and feel out those who might prefer the sound of President Obama to President Clinton (as in Hillary, not Bill).

Amid intensifying presidential musings by Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama met with George Soros, the liberal billionaire philanthropist, then some other donors last night at Mr. Soros's offices. Afterward he spoke at a charity event that was to be followed by a news conference.

One of the donors who met with Mr. Obama, and who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he did not want to offend Mrs. Clinton, said that he and several others had supported Mrs. Clinton's Senate campaigns but were not committed to her as a presidential candidate.

"I like Hillary a lot, but I'm also impressed with Obama — his message, the way he connects to people," said the donor, a prominent businessman. "It's a little too early for Democrats to be certain that Hillary is the strongest bet for 2008. There are a lot of good people interested in running."

Mr. Obama's reconnaissance mission came as Mrs. Clinton was starting to talk about 2008 not only with New York elected officials, but also with some prominent donors whom she would like to lock in for a possible White House bid.

John Catsimatidis, a loyal Clinton donor, said he had recently received a phone call from Mrs. Clinton asking to have dinner before the holidays. He believes she wants to run for president and is moving to ramp up her Senate fund-raising operation for a White House campaign.

"I think they have a phenomenal political machine set up that's far superior to any of the other candidates, or theoretical candidates," Mr. Catsimatidis said. "Now they're getting ready to put that machine to use."

To that end, the Clinton team disclosed yesterday that they had a new national finance director lined up in case the senator decided to run. Jonathan Mantz, a fund-raiser for Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey and a former finance official for the Washington-based operations to elect a Democratic House and Senate, has agreed to work for her if she is a candidate.

"It's not anything that is imminent," said Howard Wolfson, a senior adviser to Senator Clinton. The senator is expected to decide this winter whether to create an exploratory presidential committee.

The Clinton team also announced that Phil Singer, a communications strategist for the Democrats' successful takeover of the Senate last month, had agreed to play a similar role for Senator Clinton, should she run. Mr. Singer is a protégé of Senator Charles E. Schumer and was an aide on Senator John Kerry's presidential campaign.

Derek Shearer, a former ambassador, a donor to President Bill Clinton's campaigns and a supporter of Senator Clinton, said he believed that Mrs. Clinton's moves did not reflect concern about financial or political competition from Mr. Obama or others, but rather an orderly process of consultation and preparation.

"She's very deliberate about these things," he said. "What most concerns her is, does she think she could win and really make a difference in the country."

DOJ_NMG_0102319

Supporters of Mr. Obama, a freshman senator from Illinois, described his New York visit as a combination of fact-finding and meet-and-greet as he considers whether to seek the Democratic nomination.

They said, and political analysts echoed, that Mr. Obama acknowledged Mrs. Clinton's home-state advantage in New York, but that there was surging interest in Mr. Obama, an eloquent antiwar Democrat who, if successful, would be the country's first black nominee for president.

"Most of the people Barack is seeing are either doing it out of respect for anyone who is a United States senator, or out of curiosity, or to leave their options open in case she decides not to run," said Ken Sherrill, a political scientist at Hunter College. "I can't imagine his picking up any significant support, but he can establish good will."

Mr. Soros, an early supporter, was the host of a fund-raiser during Mr. Obama's campaign for the Senate in 2004, said Michael Vachon, a senior aide to Mr. Soros. Mr. Obama's staff asked to use the Soros offices for last night's meetings since it was near the Midtown hotel where the senator spoke last night at a fund-raiser for K.I.D.S. (Kids in Distressed Situations), which assists children living in poverty.

Mr. Soros has not publicly endorsed or committed to any 2008 presidential hopeful.

While another possible Democratic candidate, Senator Chris Dodd of Connecticut, raised $500,000 in New York last week, others have been less aggressive in reaching out to New York donors than in past cycles, some of these donors say.

Former Senator John Edwards and former Vice President Al Gore have been in New York recently, and others plan to be, including Senator Joseph R. Biden of Delaware and Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa.

Yet the donors say that neither Mr. Edwards nor Mr. Obama, who are receiving perhaps the most buzz as possible opponents of Senator Clinton, nor anyone else has made an assertive push to challenge Mrs. Clinton and her local donor base in the aftermath of the 2006 elections. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Message From A Megachurch (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

American politics took an important turn last week at a church in the foothills of Southern California's Santa Ana Mountains.

When Rick Warren, one of the nation's most popular evangelical pastors, faced down right-wing pressure and invited Sen. Barack Obama to speak at a gathering at his Saddleback Valley Community Church about the AIDS crisis, he sent a signal: A significant group of theologically conservative Christians no longer wants to be treated as a cog in the Republican political machine.

For his part, Obama, the former community organizer from Chicago, showed why he is this moment's hottest commodity in 2008 presidential politics, even though he has not entered the race yet.

For a quarter-century since the rise of the Moral Majority and the Christian Coalition, white evangelical Christians have been widely seen as a Republican preserve. No one did a more comprehensive job of organizing them than President Bush, and he carried the white evangelical vote in 2004 over John Kerry by a ratio of nearly 4 to 1. Many of the most politically active evangelical leaders have insisted that the morally freighted social issues -- abortion, stem-cell research, same-sex marriage -- took priority over all questions.

Enter Warren, or Pastor Rick, as he likes to be known. Warren is no political liberal. On the contrary, his views on the hot-button issues are reliably conservative, and he has said that members of his sprawling Orange County congregation probably vote overwhelmingly Republican.

But Warren speaks for a new generation of evangelicals who think that harnessing religious faith too closely to electoral politics is bad for religion, and who are broadening the evangelical public agenda to include a concern for global poverty and the scourge of AIDS.

Warren is also the most gifted religious entrepreneur since Billy Graham. Warren's book "The Purpose Driven Life" has sold in the tens of millions, and his specific model for the megachurch has spread all over the country. He is not building a new denomination. He is building a new network, and it's powerful. Warren and his wife, Kay, have made alleviating the AIDS crisis in Africa one of the central components of their mission.

And thus it came to pass that when Warren called a conference at his church last Friday on World AIDS Day, among those he invited were two potential presidential candidates. It was unsurprising that one of them was Sen. Sam Brownback, the Kansas Republican and a loyal social conservative who has taken up the AIDS issue with passion and commitment.

But when the other invitee turned out to be Obama, parts of the old evangelical political apparatus went after Warren as a heretic. Rob Schenck, president of the National Clergy Council, declared that Obama's views on abortion -- Obama is pro-choice -- represented "the antithesis of biblical ethics and morality" and insisted that Warren had no business inviting him to Saddleback.

Warren's church issued a statement reaffirming its strong opposition to abortion, but Warren did not back down. Indeed, he seemed to revel in rejecting the old evangelical political model. "I'm a pastor, not a politician," Warren told ABC News. "People always say, 'Rick, are you right wing or left wing?' I say 'I'm for the whole bird.' "

When it came his turn to speak, Obama took on the moral message of evangelical AIDS activists -- and then challenged them.

"Let me say this and let me say this loud and clear: I don't think that we can deny that there is a moral and spiritual component to prevention," he declared. "In too many places . . . the relationship between men and women, between sexuality and spirituality, has broken down and needs to be repaired."

Then Obama got to what "may be the difficult part for some," as he put it, that "abstinence and fidelity, although the ideal, may not always be the reality."

"We're dealing with flesh-and-blood men and women, and not abstractions," Obama said, and "if condoms and potentially things like microbicides can prevent millions of deaths, then they should be made more widely available. . . . I don't accept the notion that those who make mistakes in their lives should be given an effective death sentence."

That Obama received a standing ovation suggests that Warren is right to sense that growing numbers of Christians are tired of narrowly partisan politics and share his interest in "the whole bird." In their different spheres, Warren and Obama are both in the business of retailing hope.

One more thing: If you read Obama's speech, you'll realize he demonstrates a much truer Christian spirit than the GOP masterminds who have recently tried to push people away from Obama by pointing out that his middle name is Hussein.

Hillary Clinton Begins Calling Iowa Democrats (DMR)

Des Moines Register, December 4, 2006

Sen. Hillary Clinton began making calls today to Iowa Democrats about the state's political landscape with an eye toward its 2008 presidential nominating caucuses, aides to Clinton said.

The moves come as the New York senator has accelerated the steps she has taken since her November re-election toward making a decision about whether to run for president.

"She's begun the process of making some calls into Iowa," Lorraine Voles, Clinton's communication director, said today in a telephone interview with The Des Moines Register.

In the past week, Clinton has had conversations with supporters in New York and the state's congressional delegation to discuss the possibility of running.

"As a continuation of this process, she is starting to reach out across the country and specifically to some friends in Iowa," Voles said.

Clinton spoke today with Des Moines Democrat Bonnie Campbell, who worked in the Department of Justice during the administration of President Bill Clinton, the senator's husband.

Campbell, a former Iowa attorney general, declined to discuss the details of her brief talk with Sen. Clinton, except that it touched on her running for president and competing for the caucuses, scheduled to launch the 2008 nominating process.

"She is looking at the possibility of running for president and is looking for a read on Iowa," Campbell said.

Sen. Clinton, by far the best-known among the Democrats eyeing the 2008 campaign, has ranked first in all national polls measuring support for prospective Democratic candidates for president.

However, two Iowa polls in the past year have borne out what some party activists worry are potential problems for Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0102321

A Register poll in June showed Clinton second to former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards among likely Democratic caucusgoers. In September, a Register poll of Iowa voters showed Clinton trailing all four Republicans listed in a hypothetical general election matchup.

Clinton handily won election to a second Senate term on Nov.7, but had not made any gestures toward the presidential campaign until last week, while others in the large, gathering field had begun to take visible steps and make key contacts.

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and Edwards, a candidate for president in 2004, also rank high in national polls and are contemplating the 2008 race.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is the only announced candidate among the large number of nationally recognized Democrats considering the race. The two-term governor formed a federal campaign organization on Nov. 9 and wrapped up his kickoff national tour Monday with stops in South Carolina.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh announced Sunday he was forming a presidential exploratory committee and was in Iowa today.

All of them have made efforts to visit and appeal to Iowa Democrats during the past two years.

Campbell said she would support Clinton if she ran, as did Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's former chief of staff JoDee Winterhoff, a former Iowan now living in the Washington, D.C.-area.

Winterhoff said Clinton called her today but the two failed to connect.

"I would assume that Senator Clinton would compete in the caucuses if she runs," Winterhoff said.

There has been speculation about whether she would campaign in Iowa, considering her husband bypassed the caucuses in his winning 1992 bid.

Voles said there had been no discussion of an Iowa visit by Clinton.

Hillary Sizes Up Support Among NH Democrats (UL)

By John Distaso

Union Leader.com, December 5, 2006

New York Sen. Hillary Clinton has begun weighing in with New Hampshire Democratic activists about a possible run for President in 2008.

Clinton during the past few days has placed initial calls to key Democrats in the first-in-the-nation primary state seeking advice, according to veteran state and national party activist Karen Hicks.

Hicks, who headed Howard Dean's New Hampshire presidential campaign in 2004, said those calls will continue. Hicks also confirmed that if Clinton runs for President, "I'll be with her," reportedly as national field director, a position similar to the one she held for the Democratic National Committee during the 2004 general election.

The New Hampshire Union Leader learned that Clinton had a telephone conversation last week with Gov. John Lynch. The two officials had been trying to contact each other since Clinton initiated the calling immediately after the Nov. 7 election.

Clinton reportedly met on Sunday with New York Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer to solicit his support for a White House bid. A top aide to Clinton also told The Associated Press that Clinton aides have begun interviewing possible campaign staffers and have hired a communications specialist and a national fund-raising director.

Word of Clinton's New Hampshire overtures comes as state Democrats prepare to welcome their party's newest "rock star," Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, to a celebration of their 2006 election day sweep on Sunday afternoon in Manchester. Yesterday, Obama added a Sunday morning visit to Portsmouth to his schedule.

As first reported on UnionLeader.com yesterday afternoon, Hicks said Clinton has "begun calling a whole variety of people in New Hampshire to get their advice as she enters a new phase of thinking" about a run for President in 2008.

Hicks said she spoke with Clinton recently about the former First Lady's possible Presidential bid. She said Clinton told her she would be making the New Hampshire calls.

"I still think she is exploring this," Hicks said. "She, of course, has a huge interest in New Hampshire, and she is interested in getting people's advice about what the campaign should look like if she runs."

Hicks said she did not have the names of all of those Clinton has called and will be calling.

DOJ_NMG_0102322

"I don't know the whole list," Hicks said, "but obviously they are going to be some of the leaders that you would think would be on the list, some of the good grassroots organizational people on the electoral level, and a whole variety of people that, should she decide to run, would be in a position to help her."

Hicks was a long-time New Hampshire-based activist who, after working for Dean's campaign and then the DNC, became a senior advisor to the Labor Party in Great Britain for the 2005 British general election. She said she is currently engaged in a fellowship in political organizing at the John F. Kennedy School of Government's Institute of Politics in Boston.

Hicks called Clinton "the kind of leader we need, and I'm excited about the fact that she is considering this. I'm willing to do whatever I can to help."

She said she did not know either Clinton's timetable for a formal decision or whether plans are being made for a Clinton visit to New Hampshire.

State Democratic chair Kathy Sullivan yesterday declined to comment when asked if she has heard from Clinton.

State Rep. Patricia McMahon, D-North Sutton, and former Bill Clinton-appointed ambassadors Terry Shumaker and George Bruno, all key players in former President Clinton's New Hampshire Presidential campaigns in 1992 and 1996, said they had not yet heard from her.

"I have no idea if she will run," McMahon said, "and my bet is that she is not sure yet and her husband does not know yet. But McMahon, asked if she would support a Clinton run for President, said, "It's early, but I'd have to say it would be hard to say 'no' because of the experience she's had and the issues that she has supported."

The Host With The Most (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Senator John McCain hardly needs a holiday to give a party. Just last week, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, presented a lavish feast for Republican governors gathering in Florida. From the 2004 Republican convention in New York City, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, is still fondly remembered, at least among the A-list crowd, for holding an event for his 68th birthday at La Goulue on Madison Avenue and another soiree at Cipriani on 42nd Street. And in this bustling season of holiday parties, Mr. McCain was among the first to have an event, on Monday evening. The senator and his wife, Cindy, invited several hundred people to the Corcoran Gallery of Art in Washington for a party to be paid for by his primary campaign account. Cameras were not only allowed, but also encouraged. JEFF ZELENY <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Why The Early Field For 2008's Election Is The Biggest Yet (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON

Twenty-three months before the 2008 presidential election, the jockeying among hopefuls is already fierce. No fewer than two dozen men - and a woman - are running or thinking of running or being urged to run for the top spot. On an almost daily basis, exploratory committees are forming, first trips to New Hampshire are taking place, and Internet campaigns both for and against possible candidates are sprouting up.

The 2008 race is morphing so fast that four possible candidates have already dropped out. Then there's the X factor - the unprecedented front-loading of primaries and caucuses that will make it more difficult than ever for a dark horse to come out of nowhere and take the nomination.

This election is going to be "the mother of them all," Democratic adviser James Carville declared at a political conference last week. He marvels at the array of "larger than life people" definitely or possibly mounting campaigns - John McCain, Rudolph Giuliani, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama, Al Gore, and "to make it interesting," Newt Gingrich. These are people who "change the temperature of the room" when they walk in, Mr. Carville says.

It may be a sign of the vulnerabilities of both putative front-runners - Senators McCain (R) and Clinton (D) - that so many other people are talking about running, but in the end, many political oddsmakers are still betting that today's front-runners end up facing off in November 2008. And the size of the field is likely to shrink fast.

This is good news, at least, for most news organizations, which don't have the staff to follow dozens of Oval Office wannabes all over Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Nevada, not to mention Michigan, Florida, and California, which are taking steps to hold early primaries, too.

"A big field will become a little field very quickly," says Jack Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont-McKenna College in Claremont, Calif. "I suspect a lot of the people talking of running now or even announcing exploratory committees will flunk the invisible primary."

He refers to the early fundraising, polls, and media attention that indicate whether a candidate is viable.

For now, it's the Democratic world that's buzzing, as the charismatic Senator Obama starts making moves toward a possible run; he delivers his first speech in New Hampshire next Sunday. Obama's maneuvering may have quickened the pace of other hopefuls' moves, though they deny it.

Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa has become the first fully announced Democratic candidate. Over the weekend Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana announced an exploratory committee. Team Hillary has whispered to the media that the senator is lining up support among top Democrats in New York for an increasingly likely run.

For a candidate like Governor Vilsack, who is not widely known nationally, the early rollout has provided him some time in the spotlight that will become increasingly difficult to commandeer.

His next task is to raise enough money to mount at least a minimal campaign, in the hopes that he catches fire as an outsider alternative to the top-billed senators he faces. As a governor, with roots in both Pennsylvania and Iowa and a life story that stresses overcoming adversity, he can tout executive experience that has made other governors successful presidential candidates. But even he acknowledges that he is a long shot.

"As a sheer matter of math, the more candidates, the lower the odds," says William Mayer, a political scientist at Northeastern University in Boston. "For long shots, the question is, can you get a bare minimum amount of attention to break through to the public consciousness."

Just how much money a candidate needs to raise in the first quarter of 2007 is open to debate, but a common benchmark is $30 million. Obama would probably be able to hit that mark; Clinton would have little trouble raising several times that; former Vice President Gore also still has his network. Beyond those three, access to big money is dubious; there's a lot out there, but it's not infinite.

Top advisers are also limited in supply, and will soon be married up to one candidate or another, if they aren't already.

The possible expansion of the early primary and caucus calendar will also favor those with big war chests. If Vilsack stays in the race until the Iowa caucuses, his presence as a native son could diminish the importance of that race, which would add even more clout to the New Hampshire primaries. And even though New Hampshire Democrats are upset that the national party has added early nominating contests in Nevada and South Carolina, New Hampshire's key role remains in place. The same will hold true if Michigan, California, and Florida move up their primaries to just after New Hampshire's.

Assuming that New Hampshire maintains its status as the first primary state, then the additional front-loading could serve to enhance New Hampshire's clout.

"If you are anybody but Hillary, your only chance of breaking out of the pack is in New Hampshire," says Mr. Mayer. "You can't say, 'It's OK if I come in fifth in New Hampshire; I'll emerge by doing well in California.' "

So the race is on to see who becomes Clinton's top challenger. For now, the excitement is around Obama. If he runs and does not stumble, there may not be enough political oxygen left for any of the other Democrats running or thinking of running or being urged to run.

Democrats Eyeing '08 Face Stumbling Blocks (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

The 2008 Democratic presidential race was off and running as soon as last month's midterm elections concluded, with front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton facing more opposition than she may have expected at this point in the two-year campaign cycle.

The New York senator and former first lady, who easily won a second term on Nov. 7, is the leading choice of her party in all the polls. But more than half a dozen other candidates are likely to challenge her expected bid for the nomination, including Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 nominee; Mr. Kerry's running mate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina; and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, the Democrats' hottest political figure, who has rocketed into contention like a rock star.

But the Democrats' growing pack of presidential hopefuls is fraught with problems. Mrs. Clinton remains one of the most polarizing political leaders in the country, with nearly half of the voters polled earlier this year saying they did not like her. Mr. Kerry, who hurt himself in the final weeks of the midterm elections when he told a joke that suggested only uneducated soldiers ended up fighting the war in Iraq, has fallen in the polls since then.

And both Mr. Edwards and Mr. Obama have thin experience on their resumes. Mr. Edwards of North Carolina served only one term in the Senate, while Mr. Obama, who was elected in 2004 has been in the Senate for just two years, and has little or no legislative accomplishments of which to speak.

"I don't think anyone is going to doubt Hillary's credentials. She certainly was an activist first lady. On the other hand, there will be issues raised about her [lack of] foreign-policy experience and gender," said pollster John Zogby. "She does have problems."

"Right now, Barack Obama and John Edwards are both blank slates, empty slates," Mr. Zogby said.

A national poll of 530 registered Democratic voters conducted last month by Opinion Research for CNN showed Mrs. Clinton favored by 33 percent. Mr. Obama was in second place with 15 percent and Mr. Edwards and former Vice President Al Gore were tied for third with 14 percent. Mr. Kerry, in the wake of what he called his "botched joke," dropped from 12 percent in late October to 7 percent.

"Worse news for Kerry: a majority of registered Democrats say they do not want to see Kerry win the party's nomination in 2008," CNN said.

The rest of the pack of potential candidates were all in the low single digits, including retired Gen. Wesley Clark, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who on Thursday became the first Democrat to formally announce his presidential candidacy.

As first lady in the Clinton White House, Mrs. Clinton had a reputation as the most liberal figure in her husband's inner circle. But during the past six years in the Senate she has reinvented her political persona as more of centrist. She voted for the Iraq war resolution and rebuked Democratic calls for a complete U.S. troop withdrawal.

The centrist Democratic Leadership Council, which helped Bill Clinton put together the agenda that helped him win the presidency, has been in her corner, too, defining her as one of them and giving her prominent speaking roles at their political conventions.

"There has been an attempt at an image makeover in which she is attempting to portray herself as a centrist Democrat," Mr. Zogby said.

But in the past few months, and particularly since the midterm elections, most of the political buzz in the party has been about Mr. Obama and his announcement that he is considering a run for the presidency.

Mr. Obama reportedly has been talking to top Democratic campaign strategists, including John Norris, the Des Moines Democrat who was the architect of Mr. Kerry's come-from-behind win in the state's 2004 delegate-selection caucuses.

Mr. Norris said Mr. Obama "truly wanted to know what he had to do and when he had to do it," to wage a competitive campaign in Iowa, political reporter Thomas Beaumont wrote last week in the Des Moines Register.

For 1,000 Or More Homeless In Hawaii, Beaches Are The Best Option (NYT)

By Janis L. Magin

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

HONOLULU, Dec. 4 — When the home she had rented for 30 years for $300 a month was sold, Alice Greenwood and her 6-year-old son joined an estimated 1,000 people living in tents along the 13 miles of beaches on the Waianae Coast of Oahu.

DOJ_NMG_0102325

"There was no choice but to come on the beach," said Ms. Greenwood, 60, who is disabled because of a work-related injury eight years ago and lost her benefits a month before losing her home.

Homelessness in Hawaii has become so pervasive that the governor has assigned a state employee to work full-time at getting people off the beaches and into transitional housing. Once there, they have access to rent assistance programs and low-income housing.

While hundreds of homeless people live on Honolulu's beaches, including the tourist center Waikiki, it is the Waianae Coast on the semiarid west shore where the problem is most visible. The population of Waianae, home to about 40,000 of Oahu's 900,000 people, is predominantly native Hawaiian and is historically low income.

Hawaii's economy has been strong in the last two years, and the state consistently has one of the lowest unemployment rates in the nation. The real estate market has skyrocketed along with the job growth, and houses on the Waianae Coast that rented for $200 or $300 a month a couple of years ago are now advertised for more than $1,000.

Nobody knows exactly how many people are living on the beach. Kaulana Park, the state's point man for the homeless, estimated that more than 1,000 people lived on the Waianae Coast beaches, but cautioned that any count was good only on the day it was taken. And that estimate does not account for the hidden homeless: people who sleep on a relative's sofa, or in their cars, or camp in areas not as visible as the public beaches.

Many living on the beach have jobs, mostly in the service and construction sectors. They include families with children, who attend public schools by day and sleep in tents on the beach at night.

Venise Lewis, 35, who lives near Ms. Greenwood at Maili Beach Park with her husband and two of their four children, said her daughters, ages 8 and 10, must finish their homework in the afternoon because there was no lighting at the beach after sunset.

Ms. Lewis's oldest daughter lives with a grandmother, and her son lives with the family's pastor.

"They don't like the idea of living on the beach," she said of her younger children. "Usually when we go camping, we go home if it rains."

The homeless problem in Hawaii came to light in March, when the City and County of Honolulu began a cleanup of Ala Moana Beach Park, at the entrance to Waikiki, and began closing the park at night in response to complaints.

Hundreds of homeless people, or "illegal campers," as the city calls them, moved to an emergency transitional shelter set up by the state in a warehouse close to downtown Honolulu. But some went west, closer to the Waianae Coast communities where they were raised. The city has since conducted similar cleanups at other beaches.

Lester Chang, the city's parks and recreation director, said the number of illegal campers made it difficult for his department to keep the parks safe and clean.

"I think all communities have to deal with this situation, but Hawaii is unique because it's an island," Mr. Chang said. "There's no place to push them off to."

Honolulu officials say finding long-term solutions to the homeless problem on Oahu is the state's responsibility. The city's housing department was abolished in the late 1990s after a scandal.

Mr. Park has been talking with New York City officials about how to adapt New York's solutions to an island state.

He said he was inspired by a speech last summer by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York, who told of how the city secured financing for some 12,000 units of supportive housing, and of the city's program to help people stay in their homes by interceding with landlords to head off evictions. Hawaii has started a similar program.

In late October, the state opened a transitional shelter for 30 families, including 90 children, at a converted 1940s-era military building in Kalaeloa, the former Barbers Point Naval Air Station.

On Nov. 18, the state poured the foundation for an emergency transitional shelter in Waianae that will house up to 300 people when it opens early next year. The state is looking at building shelters at eight more sites along the Waianae Coast.

But Dino Palisbo, who has been living at Maili Beach Park with his girlfriend and their three dogs for about a year, said some people did not want to trade the freedom of the beach for the rules of a transitional shelter. "Half of them can pay rent, but it is so high it is going to take them out of the comfort zone," Mr. Palisbo said. "When a studio costs $700 or $800, how can a family put four or five kids there?"

Others, like Ms. Greenwood, did not want to leave their communities for the state's shelter at Kalaeloa, which is 10 miles from the beach park and several miles from the nearest bus route. She plans to move to the new shelter in Waianae, set to open next spring, because it is closer to her son's school and her community activities.

Mr. Park said other homeless people on the beach looked up to Ms. Greenwood, who is a member of the state's Oahu Island Burial Council, which works to protect ancient Hawaiian remains. A widow, she also has four adult children, but the only daughter who lives nearby has a studio apartment too small for Ms. Greenwood and the boy she adopted, Makalii Hatchie.

"She takes it upon herself to be somewhat of a leader," Mr. Park said.

Ms. Greenwood said she hoped to begin collecting Social Security benefits and settle her workers' compensation case soon so that she and her son could find a new home.

"Being homeless is not a crime, it is the fault of the government," she said. "I can understand when its 20, 30 people, but when it hits the thousands. ..."

French: 6 Powers Near Iran Nuke Accord (AP)

By Angela Charlton

AP, December 5, 2006

The six powers seeking a U.N. resolution to punish Iran for its nuclear program are nearing agreement on a text, France's foreign minister said Monday.

High-ranking diplomats from the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members plus Germany will meet Tuesday in Paris to discuss imposing penalties on Iran for refusing to stop uranium enrichment.

"I think that we should now reach agreement on this," Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said in Brussels.

He gave no details of the possible text, but indicated progress had been made in his talks in Brussels on Monday with his Russian counterpart, Sergey Lavrov.

"We are in agreement with Russia to adopt sanctions against Iran's proliferation program, that is to say the sensitive nuclear activities and the ballistic missile program. ... We want to reach as broad an agreement as possible in the U.N. Security Council," Douste-Blazy said.

The Security Council has been at odds over how to deal with Iran's defiance of an Aug. 31 U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment. The Europeans and Americans want tough sanctions. Russia and China have pushed for dialogue instead, despite the failure of a EU effort to bring the Iranians to the negotiating table.

On Friday, Lavrov reaffirmed Russia's readiness to back a U.N. ban on exports of nuclear materials and sensitive technologies to Iran, but said U.S.-proposed sanctions were "too tough."

A European draft U.N. resolution in October would order all countries to ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missiles programs. It would also impose a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in those programs.

The draft would exempt a nuclear power plant being built by the Russians at Bushehr in Iran, but not the nuclear fuel needed for the reactor.

Russia want to scratch any travel ban, asset freeze, or mention of Bushehr. They proposed major changes that would limit sanctions solely to measures that would keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles.

"We have taken the Russian amendments into consideration," Douste-Blazy said. "We want to reaffirm the unity of the international community. We are trying to find a plan that is both firm and effective."

A representative of EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana was expected to join Tuesday's talks in Paris with political directors of the foreign ministries of Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States, plus Germany, "for an update on the Iranian nuclear file," French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei told reporters Monday.

No other details of the meeting were immediately available.

Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry said Friday that he didn't expect the Iran resolution to make its way back to New York for discussion until at least Dec. 11.

DOJ_NMG_0102327

In Brussels, Nicholas Burns, U.S. undersecretary of state for political affairs, said it was time to send a strong message to Tehran that "we're all unhappy with Iran."

"We just wish the Iranian government would stop developing nuclear weapons, supporting ... terrorist groups in the Middle East and destabilizing Lebanon," said Burns, who will represent the United States at the meeting. "We stand for peace and overcoming divisions in the Middle East and Iran stands for disrupting everything through the barrel of the gun."

Time For Russia And China To Accept Iran Resolution: US Official (AFP)

AFP, December 5, 2006

A top US official said it was "time" for Russia and China to agree with Britain, France, Germany and the United States on the sanctions to impose on Iran for refusing to suspend its uranium enrichment program.

"It's been too long we have been debating ... we have to pass the sanction resolution" at the UN Security Council, US undersecretary of state for political affairs Nicholas Burns said to journalists on the margins of a conference of the pan-European OSCE watchdog.

"It is not that complicated," he added, "we need to send a strong message to the Iranians."

The six world powers are to meet Tuesday in Paris in their latest bid to secure agreement on a package of sanctions against Iran for its refusal to suspend sensitive nuclear activities.

High-ranking diplomats from the five veto-wielding UN Security Council members plus Germany will attend the talks at the French foreign ministry.

A representative of European Union policy chief Javier Solana will also take part in the meeting.

Burns said that the participants would "see if we can narrow our differences and agree so that our ambassadors (at the UN) in New York should pass in the quickest possible time a decisive sanction resolution".

World powers have been trying for weeks to agree what sanctions to impose on Iran for its refusal to comply with a UN deadline to freeze uranium enrichment, which can be used to generate electricity or to build atomic weapons.

A draft resolution circulated by Britain, France and Germany would have barred trade with Iran in goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programmes and applied financial and travel restrictions to persons and agencies involved in either area.

But Russia and to a lesser extent China, have tried to water down the text, saying the sanctions should not target individuals and should be limited in duration.

Meanwhile Washington wants to harden at least the wording of the text.

Iran's Web Crackdown Shows Ease Of Government Internet Censorship (WSJ)

By Christopher Rhoads

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Iran's campaign to shutter popular Web sites and curtail text-message traffic reflects the growing ability of governments to control online content inside their national borders.

The crackdown, reported earlier by Britain's Guardian newspaper, is part of a broader offensive against what authorities consider immoral Western culture. It has targeted Web sites including Amazon.com, publicly edited online encyclopedia Wikipedia.com, movie Web site imdb.com and online video-sharing portal YouTube.com, among others. Some of these sites are working again, but the clampdown is consistent with a tightening of online content in Iran dating back two years.

The blockage isn't airtight, as more-savvy Internet users in the country have access to software and other measures that allow them to get around government restrictions, Internet experts say. It is uncertain how long the restrictions will last.

Iran is one of a host of nations that have taken steps to limit access to the Internet or control what users can see in cyberspace. Others that have taken such steps include China, Cuba and North Korea. Tehran's recent actions are noteworthy given the country's flourishing and relatively free Internet culture in recent years. Iran has an estimated 7.5 million users, up from 250,000 six years ago, according to InternetWorldStats.com. A lively blogosphere emerged in recent years, as state control of the country's traditional print media increased.

Arash Sigarchi, for example, was a member of the reformist press that developed under President Mohammad Khatami in the late-1990s. When this media was shut down in 2000, Mr. Sigarchi began blogging on a collective site called "The Man from Gilan," and later on his own personal site, called "The Window of Hope." The now 28-year-old Mr. Sigarchi was arrested in early 2005 and sentenced to 14 years in prison for "propaganda against the regime," according to Reporters Without Borders, a Paris-based press-freedom group.

As Internet usage has increased in more countries, so has the ability of governments to restrict the online experience within their countries.

"Countries with the political ability and desire to limit info will do so," said Robert Faris, director of research for a global project on Internet filtering at the Berkman Center for Society and Internet at Harvard Law School. "The technical means are available now."

The Internet crackdown in Iran reflects efforts by the Islamist government of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to cleanse Iran of what its leaders deem decadent Western culture, including music and movies. Government authorities in recent days have broached several new measures, such as requiring bloggers and operators of Web sites to register with an official body, strengthening the government's ability to police what it views as objectionable content.

The government began tightening its grip on the Internet two years ago, when it arrested a handful of bloggers and others whose writings were deemed offensive, according to Reporters Without Borders. One blogger, Mojtaba Saminejad, faced the death penalty for "insulting the prophets," but was found guilty of a lesser charge.

Last month, the government blocked two Web sites, tik.ir and meydann.com. The first contained criticism of the government and its spiritual leadership, and the second published articles calling for an end to the stoning of women, according to Reporters Without Borders.

The government has also taken the unusual step of attempting to curtail the speed of Internet access, essentially banning broadband.

"It's weird" said Julian Pain, head of the Internet freedom desk for Reporters Without Borders, because limiting connection speed not only curbs dissidents but "economically has a huge impact." Trade, government business and private-sector activities can all be hurt by hobbled Internet speeds, he said.

Tools to get around restrictions are spreading quickly. The University of Toronto, for example, late last month announced a program called psiphon, which works on the principle of social networking. It enables a person in an uncensored country who downloads the software to turn his computer into an access point for users in censored countries. People in censored countries can use the computer as a proxy to access the broader Internet without detection by authorities.

Realism And Iran (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Realism is an academic theory that holds that nations should, and typically do, conduct foreign policy with greater regard for their interests than their values. But realism is also an ordinary word that tells us that good sense and experience are better practical guides to action than theory. That's a distinction worth bearing in mind as the Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group releases its report this week and we debate whether the U.S. should engage diplomatically with Iran.

To hear the so-called realists tell it, engaging Tehran is a matter of necessity and ought to be one of choice. Necessity, they say, because there will be no good outcome in Iraq -- or Lebanon and Palestine -- without Iranian acquiescence, which can only be achieved through face-to-face talks and confidence-building measures. Necessity, too, because they think that neither the U.S. nor Israel can stop Iran's nuclear ambitions militarily and so they must be dealt with as part of a broader negotiation.

Yet the same people who now call for engagement also believed in it long before the invasion of Iraq or the recent revelations about Iran's nuclear advances. They argue that Iran's pressing political and economic problems -- the country's huge youth cohort, cleavages within the regime and its loss of popular legitimacy, ethnic and labor unrest and growing unemployment -- mean the Islamic Republic has reasons of its own to come to the table. The same logic also suggests that the real purpose of its nuclear program is to serve as a bargaining chip to obtain bigger concessions from the West rather than as an end in itself. * * *

But here's where realism of the common sense kind should intrude. Iran's domestic problems are hardly new and in some ways have been eased by the high oil prices of recent years. In 1997, Iranians "elected" a supposedly moderate president, Mohammed Khatami, on a reformist platform. As Iranian journalist Amir Taheri notes in the November Commentary magazine, the Clinton Administration sought to establish openings with the Khatami government by lifting some sanctions and apologizing for U.S. political meddling. President Clinton even planned an "accidental" encounter with Mr. Khatami during the U.N.'s millennium summit, but Iran's Supreme Guide Ali Khamenei canceled it at the last minute. The stood-up President "was left pacing the corridors of the U.N.," writes Mr. Taheri.

Presidents Carter and Reagan earlier tried engagement with the Ayatollah Khomeini, each time with disastrous consequences: the seizure of the U.S. embassy in 1979; the Iran-Contra scandal of 1986. One problem is that however sincere Iranian moderates may be in seeking an accommodation with the West, Iranian hardliners have proved equally intent on torpedoing any deals. The hardliners have consistently held the upper hand.

This point should be obvious now that Mr. Khatami has been replaced by Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Much has been said about Mr. Ahmadinejad's election being a victory for populism over clericalism. But his candidacy was promoted by Supreme Guide Khamenei and a clerical establishment that pre-selects its officeholders according to narrow ideological and religious criteria.

In Mr. Ahmadinejad, they found a man whose wipe-Israel-off-the-map rhetoric is matched by his record as a hostage-taker, prison interrogator and organizer of violent domestic paramilitaries. If the "realists" greeted Mr. Khatami's election as a sign of regime softening, why then do they not draw opposite conclusions about his successor?

The Bush Administration has also tried diplomacy, agreeing to allow the Europeans -- hardly the most truculent negotiators, except on Guantanamo -- to take the lead on the nuclear issue. In late 2003, Iran agreed to suspend its nuclear work as a confidence-building measure; within months, they were caught cheating. A second go-around a year later led to the same result, with Tehran dismissing a package of incentives that included security guarantees, technical assistance, commercial ties and prospective membership in the World Trade Organization.

An effort to get Iran to agree to have Russia enrich its uranium was negotiated for months and led nowhere. Iran has consistently misled U.N. inspectors and illegally obstructed their work by denying them multiple-entry visas. It has flouted the Security Council's August 31 deadline to cease enriching uranium, choosing instead to expand its enrichment work while pursuing other nuclear programs such as a heavy water plant at Arak that has few possible non-military uses.

The deeper issue concerns Iran's strategic ambitions. "Realists" argue that despite the regime's avowed revolutionary principles, what it really seeks is to become a status quo power, secure in its neighborhood and linked to the wider world.

Even assuming Iran's ambitions extend only to the region, its unneighborly behavior belies this hope. Iranian agents were almost certainly responsible for the 1996 murders of 19 U.S. servicemen in Saudi Arabia. Hezbollah waged its summer war against Israel using arms supplied by Tehran; those arms may yet be turned on the Lebanese government.

Both Britain and the U.S. have publicly accused Iran of supplying increasingly sophisticated improvised explosive devices to anti-Coalition forces in Iraq; IEDs are the leading cause of U.S. military deaths. Now Iran says that a swift American withdrawal from Iraq is the key to peace. That may be music to the ears of Western critics of the war. But it's hardly surprising given that the U.S. is what chiefly stands in the way of Iran's desire to dominate Iraq through the likes of Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army is responsible for some of the worst sectarian violence.

Iran actively supports more than a dozen Parties of God (aka, Hezb Allah) in places as faraway as Paraguay and Argentina. Asian regional powers such as India and Pakistan have not sought the long-range ballistic missiles as Iran has through its Shihabs, which can now reach parts of Europe. Whereas India and Pakistan have deployed modest nuclear arsenals adequate to defend against each other, the scope of Iran's enrichment program suggests a desire to construct scores of bombs a year. * * *

Finally, there is the matter of values. One has to wonder about "engaging" a regime whose recent domestic practices include taking a razor to the tongue of labor leader Mansour Ossanloo, whose crime was to have organized an independent union for bus drivers. Realists would have us believe that a country that indulges such barbarism can still be expected to act as a predictable and, under certain conditions, reliable partner in diplomacy.

It's true that we also "engaged" the Soviet Union during the Cold War, but most successfully when Ronald Reagan also spoke candidly about Soviet reality and on behalf of Russian freedom and the U.S. resisted the Kremlin's global designs. We suppose in that sense the Gipper was an idealistic realist. President Bush has spoken repeatedly, in his major speeches and in interviews, about American support for Iranians who aspire to more freedom, which is one reason the U.S. is popular among the Iranian people. What message would it now send those Iranians if the U.S. turned around and embraced the rule of Tehran's mullahs?

We think it's simple realism to believe the fate of people like Mr. Ossanloo explains Iran's past behavior, and well predicts its future.

Blair Proposes Sub-based Missile Shield (USAT)

USA Today, December 5, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair unveiled plans Monday for a new submarine-based nuclear-missile defense system to thwart threats from rogue regimes and state-sponsored terrorists.

Blair told the House of Commons that despite the end of the Cold War, threats were posed by North Korea, Iran and others. Blair said land- or air-based alternatives were considered too costly and too vulnerable.

"It would be unwise and dangerous for Britain alone of any of the nuclear powers to give up its independent nuclear deterrent," he said. Blair said Britain would cut back on its nuclear stockpile from 200 warheads to 160.

Parliament will vote on the proposal by March. Blair's Labor Party was once committed to unilateral disarmament.

Coup underway in Fiji, prime minister says

Fiji's elected leader said a military takeover was under way in the South Pacific country as armed troops surrounded his house and locked down the capital. Heavily armed soldiers set up check points around the capital, Suva, and seized official vehicles from government ministers.

Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase was asked in a radio interview if he was still in control of the country.

"There are some things that aren't clear," Qarase told the Legend network. "If the military has completed the takeover then they are in control. If they have not completed the takeover, then we are still the government of the day."

U.S. Marine gets 40 years in Philippine rape case

U.S. Marine Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith was convicted of rape in the Philippines and sentenced to 40 years in prison. A 23-year-old Filipino woman accused Smith of sexually assaulting her while she was drunk on Nov. 1, 2005. Smith, 21, of St. Louis, testified that the sex was consensual. Three other Marines were acquitted of complicity.

The U.S. Embassy had retained custody of the men during prosecution, in line with the Visiting Forces Agreement signed in 1998. Smith became the first American soldier to be convicted of wrongdoing since then. The judge ruled Smith would be temporarily held in a Philippine jail during his appeals.

Egypt arrests foreigners for allegedly plotting attacks

Egyptian police arrested an American, two Belgians, nine French and several others from Arab countries for allegedly plotting terrorist attacks in Middle Eastern countries including Iraq, the Interior Ministry said.

The group was part of an Islamic terrorist cell that was in Egypt under the guise of studying Arabic and Islamic studies, a ministry statement said. "They were seeking to recruit others … urging them for jihad, traveling to Iraq to carry out operations," the statement said.

It did not give names or the number of Arabs arrested.

Blair Unveils Plan For Nuclear Missiles (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, December 5, 2006

Prime Minister Tony Blair launched plans Monday for a new multibillion-dollar submarine-based nuclear missile defense system, warning lawmakers the future may hold perilous threats from rogue regimes and state-sponsored terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0102331

In what is expected to be among his last major acts as premier, Blair told the House of Commons that despite the end of the Cold War, potential threats were posed by North Korea, Iran and others.

"In these circumstances, it would be unwise and dangerous for Britain alone of any of the nuclear powers to give up its independent nuclear deterrent," he said.

Blair said Britain would cut back on its stock of nuclear warheads from 200 to 160 — a move intended to make the proposal more acceptable to detractors within his own party. But he said any decision to reduce the nuclear-armed submarine fleet from four to three would be made only after a new vessel is designed. Blair said advisers had ruled out land or air based alternatives as too costly and too vulnerable.

The existing submarine fleet will be phased out from 2022, defense officials said.

Blair also said a decision on whether Britain will build a new arsenal of warheads to replace current stocks — expected to last only until the 2020s — would not be made before 2009.

That means Blair — due to stand down in 2007 — avoided the most contentious aspect of committing to a future nuclear defense program. Debates over a new warhead program are expected to stir up fierce divisions in his Labour party, once committed to unilateral nuclear disarmament

Britain's conservative opposition leader, David Cameron, endorsed the new deterrent, though he urged options be kept open for fourth submarine.

The replacement fleet would cost around $40 billion.

Blair said Britain would join in a U.S. program to extend the Trident D5 missile, currently used by both countries, until the early 2040s. President Bush has assured Blair that Britain would also be included in designing a successor missile, defense officials said.

Blair told legislators they would be asked to decide on the number of new submarines and a new missile design in the next Parliament, following national elections expected in 2009.

Kate Hudson, chairwoman of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, said Iran and North Korea would see Blair's decision as a vindication of their own aspirations.

Opponents of a replacement system — including nuclear disarmament campaigners — claim the new fleet is likely to cost as much as $150.6 billion.

Lawmakers will be asked to vote on the proposal by March and senior officials said the plan was expected to win overwhelming support.

Britain's first Trident submarine, the HMS Vanguard, went on a maiden patrol in December 1994.

Britain's third party Liberal Democrats have argued that a decision could be put off until as late as 2014. The government claims a decision is urgent because it will take up to 14 years to design, commission and build the submarines.

Menzies Campbell, leader of the Liberal Democrats, questioned the timing of the decision. "Is this about Britain's interest or your legacy?" he asked Blair in the Commons.

A survey of members of the House of Commons indicated that Blair faces strong resistance within his party.

Among 80 Labour lawmakers who completed a questionnaire, 39 percent were opposed to a new generation of nuclear-armed submarines, CommunicateResearch reported for The Independent newspaper.

In contrast, 94 percent of 52 Conservatives supported a new generation.

Beyond five formally declared nuclear weapons states — the United States, Russia, China, France and Britain — four others are known or thought to have such arms. They are India, Pakistan, Israel and, following its October missile test, North Korea.

Of the nuclear powers, only the United States and Russia have submarine, air and land-based capability.

Blair Urges Keeping Nuclear Arms Program Alive (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102332

LONDON, Dec. 4 — Citing a potential nuclear threat from nations like North Korea and Iran, Prime Minister Tony Blair urged legislators on Monday to extend the life of Britain's nuclear arms program with a new generation of submarines costing as much as $40 billion.

Mr. Blair made his proposal as he presented a white paper to Parliament on the subject of Britain's nuclear capacity that is expected to be debated at some length before a vote next March.

Mr. Blair proposed a plan to replace four Vanguard nuclear-powered submarines, equipped with Trident D5 missiles manufactured in the United States, that he said were the nation's only nuclear deterrent. The vessels will begin to go out of service in 2022, he said, and it will take 17 years to design and build replacements.

Nuclear weapons are a sensitive issue for the governing Labor Party since many of its supporters — including at one time Mr. Blair himself — have traditionally opposed nuclear weapons. Indeed, until the late 1980s, the party was formally committed to unilateral nuclear disarmament.

Mr. Blair insisted Monday that Britain should not dispense with its nuclear capacity.

"The risk of giving up something that has been one of the mainstays of our security since the war, and moreover doing so when the one certain thing about our world today is its uncertainty, is not a risk I feel we can responsibly take," he said in Parliament. "Our independent nuclear deterrent is the ultimate insurance."

Apart from other arguments, Mr. Blair said, "The new dimension is undoubtedly the desire by states, highly dubious in their intentions, like North Korea and Iran, to pursue nuclear weapons capability."

But Mr. Blair's supporters are calculating that they can muster sufficient parliamentary support from the opposition Conservatives to squash Labor opposition in next year's vote. As a sop to Labor dissent, however, Mr. Blair said Britain would consider reducing its nuclear submarine force to three from four and might cut its "stockpile of operationally available warheads" by one-fifth, to "no more than 160."

In addition to Britain, nations with nuclear weapons include the other four permanent members of the United Nations Security Council — the United States, Russia, China and France — and India and Pakistan.

Western nations like the United States and Britain accuse Iran of seeking a nuclear weapons capacity, which it denies. North Korea conducted a nuclear test in October. Israel has not commented on claims that it has nuclear weapons capacity.

"The notion of unstable, usually deeply repressive and anti-democratic states, in some cases profoundly inimical to our way of life, having a nuclear capability is a distinct and novel reason for Britain not to give up its capacity to deter," Mr. Blair said.

"It is not utterly fanciful either to imagine states sponsoring nuclear terrorism from their soil," he said. "We know this global terrorism seeks chemical, biological and nuclear devices. It is not impossible to contemplate a rogue government help such an acquisition."

Some opponents of nuclear weapons said that Britain should spend its money on the environment, not on weapons. But labor unions representing shipyard and engineering workers said thousands of skilled jobs would be secured by a new nuclear submarine program. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Blair Calls For New Nuclear Sub Fleet (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

LONDON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday called for building a multibillion-dollar, new-generation nuclear submarine fleet to counter future threats from "rogue" nuclear states and nuclear terrorism.

The move, which Blair justified as a hedge against potential threats from terrorists and states with nuclear ambitions, such as Iran and North Korea, rekindled debate over Britain's nuclear future and the role of such weapons in the post-Cold War world.

Blair said his government would support a top-to-bottom renewal of the nation's nuclear-powered Trident submarine fleet, which is equipped with nuclear ballistic missiles, to ensure that Britain retains its seat among the world's five major nuclear powers for decades to come.

"The risk of giving up something that has been one of the mainstays of our security since the [Second World] War, and moreover doing so when the one certain thing about our world today is its uncertainty, is not a risk I feel we can responsibly take.

Our independent nuclear deterrent is the ultimate insurance," Blair told an occasionally skeptical Parliament, which will vote on the program in March.

"Proliferation remains a real problem," he said. "The notion of unstable, usually deeply repressive and anti-democratic states, in some cases profoundly inimical to our way of life, having a nuclear capability, is a distinct and novel reason for Britain not to give up its capacity to deter."

There have been mounting calls in Britain to dismantle the four-vessel nuclear-weapons fleet that many believe has outlived its purpose. Spending billions on a new fleet could undermine negotiations with North Korea and Iran at a time when those nations are being asked to adhere to international nonproliferation obligations, these critics say.

"How can this cost be justified in the post-Cold War environment, when it will severely restrict much more needed conventional military expenditures, undermine the Nonproliferation Treaty and drain off colossal sums of money from real threats of terrorism, climate change and long-term energy security?" Michael Meacher, a lawmaker from Blair's Labor Party, argued during Monday's opening debate in the House of Commons.

But Blair's proposal can survive misgivings in his own camp because he is assured of substantial support among opposition Conservative lawmakers. Tory leader David Cameron said "the case is very powerful" for building "a credible system … that isn't vulnerable to preemptive attack," and even questioned Blair's commitment to a 20% reduction in the number of Trident nuclear warheads.

"Does he realize he doesn't have to make concessions to those who've never supported the concept of deterrence?" Cameron said.

Blair is calling for revamping U.S.-made Trident D5 missiles to extend their utility into the early 2040s while reducing their number to 160 from 200. British designers would immediately launch the design and construction of as many as four new submarines to replace within 17 years the current fleet of four Vanguard-class nuclear-powered submarines, launched in the mid-1990s.

The estimated cost would range from $30 billion to $40 billion, an average of 3% of the defense budget over the next two decades.

Britain would continue to field the smallest stockpile of nuclear weapons among the five recognized nuclear powers and would be the only one with a single delivery system, Blair noted.

He said the end of the Cold War had not ended Britain's potential future vulnerability to possible threats. "The new dimension is undoubtedly the desire by states, highly dubious in their intentions, like North Korea and Iran, to pursue nuclear weapons capability," he said.

Gavin Ireland, a military sciences researcher at the Royal United Services Institute, said Britain's nuclear posture was founded on the concept of deterrence based on ambiguity.

"It's there in the back pocket. It's not intended to be an overt threat," Ireland said.

Unlike U.S. nuclear policy, he said, which calls for deployment of a wide range of missiles on multiple platforms capable of striking a broad range of targets, Britain's strategy calls for keeping at least one sophisticated and elusive nuclear submarine deployed somewhere in the world's oceans whose orders to launch would be difficult, if not impossible, to subvert.

Ultimately, Blair said, relying on the substantially larger U.S. arsenal to shield Britain is not a foolproof option.

"The independent nature of the British deterrent is again an additional insurance against circumstances where we are threatened but America is not," he said. "These circumstances are also highly unlikely, but I am unwilling to say they are nonexistent."

Offering Video, Israel Answers Critics On War (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 4 — Israel's military, which has been accused of abuses in its war against Hezbollah this summer, has declassified photographs, video images and prisoner interrogations to buttress its accusation that Hezbollah systematically fired from civilian neighborhoods in southern Lebanon and took cover in those areas to shield itself from attack.

DOJ_NMG_0102334

Lebanon and international human rights groups have accused Israel of war crimes in the 34 days of fighting in July and August, saying that Israel fired into populated areas and that civilians accounted for a vast majority of the more than 1,000 Lebanese killed.

Israel says that it tried to avoid civilians, but that Hezbollah fired from civilian areas, itself a war crime, which made those areas legitimate targets.

In a new report, an Israeli research group says Hezbollah stored weapons in mosques, battled Israelis from inside empty schools, flew white flags while transporting missiles and launched rockets near United Nations monitoring posts.

The detailed report on the war was produced by the Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center at the Center for Special Studies, a private research group headed by Reuven Erlich, a retired colonel in military intelligence, who worked closely with the Israeli military.

An advance copy was given to The New York Times by the American Jewish Congress, which has itself fought against the use of "human shields," provided consultation and translated the study.

In Lebanon, a Hezbollah official denied the study's allegations, saying its military units were based outside towns and villages and had come into populated areas only when circumstances required it. "We tried to avoid having to fight among civilian areas, but when Israeli troops entered villages, we were automatically forced to fight them from inside these villages to defend it," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on military matters.

Israel's critics charge that its military either singled out civilians or was reckless in its pursuit of Hezbollah. The new report is an attempt to rebut such criticism.

The report includes Israeli Air Force video that it says shows several instances of Hezbollah personnel firing rockets next to residential buildings in southern Lebanon and then being bombed by Israel. The adjacent buildings were presumably damaged, but there is no information on whether civilians were inside.

"This study explains the dilemma facing the Israeli military as it fights an enemy that intentionally operates from civilian areas," Mr. Erlich said. "This is the kind of asymmetric warfare we are seeing today. It's not only relevant to Lebanon, but is also what we are seeing in the Gaza Strip and in Iraq."

The report says: "The construction of a broad military infrastructure, positioned and hidden in populated areas, was intended to minimize Hezbollah's vulnerability. Hezbollah would also gain a propaganda advantage if it could represent Israel as attacking innocent civilians."

In video from July 23, a truck with a multi-barreled missile launcher, presumably from Hezbollah, is parked in a street, sandwiched between residential buildings. The video was transmitted from an Israeli missile approaching the truck. The screen goes fuzzy as the missile slams into the target.

In another video, from a Lebanese village, rockets are seen being fired from a launcher on the back of a truck. The truck then drives a short distance and disappears inside a building. Seconds later, the building itself disappears under a cloud of smoke from an Israeli bomb.

The report says that there were many such examples, and that Hezbollah has been preparing for such an engagement for years, embedding its fighters and their weapons in the Shiite villages of southern Lebanon. When Hezbollah fired its rockets from those areas, Israel faced a choice of attacking, and possibly causing civilian casualties, or refraining from shooting because of the risk, the report said.

Elias Hanna, a retired Lebanese Army general, said of the Israeli allegations, "Of course there are hidden invisible tunnels, bunkers of missile launchers, bunkers of explosive charges amongst civilians."

He added: "You cannot separate the southern society from Hezbollah, because Hezbollah is the society and the society is Hezbollah. Hezbollah is holding this society together through its political, military and economic services. It is providing the welfare for the south."

Asked whether Hezbollah should be seen as responsible for the deaths of Lebanese civilians in the war, he replied: "Of course Hezbollah is responsible. But these people are ready to sacrifice their lives for Hezbollah. If you tell them, 'Your relative died,' they will tell you 'No, he was a martyr.' The party's military preparations from 2000 till 2006 took place in their areas. They were of course done with complete secrecy, but in accordance with the civilians."

During the war, Israel dropped leaflets urging villagers to leave southern Lebanon and also to evacuate from Hezbollah strongholds in southern Beirut. Many did flee, but some remained and among them were hundreds who were killed.

In one highly publicized Israeli strike on July 30, at least 28 Lebanese civilians, including many women and children, were killed when Israel bombed a residential building in the village of Qana. Israel said it struck a Hezbollah rocket cell that had recently fired from near the building.

In several other instances, Israel bombed vehicle convoys that were trying to leave the combat zone in southern Lebanon, killing many civilians. Human Rights Watch, a New York-based advocacy group, said shortly before the war ended that it had documented the deaths of 27 Lebanese civilians killed while trying to flee.

Kenneth Roth, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, wrote shortly after the war that the Israeli military "seemed to assume that because it gave warnings to civilians to evacuate southern Lebanon, anyone who remained was a Hezbollah fighter."

He wrote, "But giving warnings, as required by international humanitarian law, does not relieve the attacker of the duty to distinguish between civilians and combatants and to target only combatants."

Amnesty International said that Israel "consistently failed to adopt necessary precautionary measures," and that its forces "carried out indiscriminate and disproportionate attacks on a large scale."

The group also accused Hezbollah of "serious violations of international humanitarian law" for deliberately attacking Israeli civilians with rockets. But it did not address the accusation that Hezbollah hid its militants among Lebanese civilians.

The Israeli report defended the Israeli operations, saying "airstrikes and ground attacks against Hezbollah targets located in population centers were carried out in accordance with international law, which does not grant immunity to a terrorist organization deliberately hiding behind civilians."

The Israeli report included video of what it said were three Hezbollah prisoners being questioned by Israeli military personnel.

Muhammad Srour, a young Hezbollah fighter, said he had initially received training in Iran and was undergoing further training in eastern Lebanon's Bekaa Valley when the war broke out. He was sent to the front lines.

Like many Hezbollah fighters, he traveled by motorbike, but they were frequently the targets of Israeli forces. While transporting missiles, hidden in cloth, in and around the southern village of Aita al Shaab, "I carried a white flag," Mr. Srour said.

Hezbollah operated freely from homes in the village, with the permission of residents who had fled. The departing residents either left their doors unlocked or gave their keys to Hezbollah, he said. Mr. Srour acknowledged that homes used by Hezbollah were more likely to draw fire.

But, he said, "better that the house is destroyed and the Israelis don't enter and come back to conquer Lebanon."

Another captured fighter, Hussein Suleiman, explained how he had set up a rocket-firing position on the front porch of a house on the outskirts of Aita al Shaab.

A third Hezbollah man, Maher Kourani, said group members had worn civilian clothes, tried never to show their weapons, and traveled in ordinary civilian cars. "We use Volvos, Mercedes, BMW," he said. "We use Range Rovers, too."

The Israeli report makes frequent references to Hezbollah's using Lebanese civilians as human shields, though it cites only two villages where it says Hezbollah prevented residents from leaving. Mr. Erlich acknowledged that over all, Hezbollah did not use coercion against Lebanese civilians.

Rather, he said, "Hezbollah was operating inside a supportive population, and cynically used them to further its own goals."

Hezbollah fired some 4,000 rockets into northern Israel, and most Israeli civilians either fled the region or took refuge in bomb shelters.

Over all, more than 1,000 Lebanese were killed, and a vast majority were civilians, according to the Lebanese government. Hezbollah has said that no more than 100 of its fighters were killed.

The Israeli report disputes this, claiming that at least 450 and perhaps as many as 650 of the Lebanese dead were from Hezbollah.

Israel suffered 159 deaths, including 41 civilians and 118 military personnel, according to the report.

DOJ_NMG_0102336

Israel withdrew its troops from southern Lebanon in 2000 after a presence of nearly two decades, much of it spent fighting Hezbollah. There was periodic cross-border shelling in the ensuing years.

The war erupted on July 12 when Hezbollah crossed the border and attacked an Israeli jeep patrol, killing three soldiers and capturing two more, who remain held by Hezbollah, according to the group.

The fighting stopped Aug. 14, shortly after the passage of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1701, which reaffirmed an earlier resolution calling for Lebanese militias to disarm.

Israel says Hezbollah has only hidden its weapons and is being resupplied from its longtime patrons, Syria and Iran. Israel continues to send warplanes on reconnaissance missions over southern Lebanon, despite criticism from the United Nations forces in the region. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

More Troops Deployed In Beirut After Killing Of Protester (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

Lebanon's army deployed more soldiers in Beirut on Monday after the killing of a pro-Syrian demonstrator raised fears peaceful anti-government protests could turn to violence.

Security sources said the military increased its forces in the Sunni districts that Shia protesters drive through to get to central Beirut where the Hezbollah-led opposition is holding a sit-in aimed at forcing the government of Fouad Siniora to step down.

The anti-government demonstrations in Lebanon claimed their first life on Sunday after a protester was killed in a clash when Shia marchers entered a largely Sunni neighbourhood of Beirut. The man was shot when Hizbollah supporters were making their way home through the suburbs.

Both sides in the country's power struggle vowed not to budge, with thousands of anti-government demonstrators camping out in the heart of Beirut for a third night while Mr Siniora insisted that he would not resign.

The prime minister said that "protest is no solution". The opposition, led by the pro-Syrian, Shia Hizbollah movement, is demanding a government of national unity. Margaret Beckett, the British foreign secretary, and Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the German foreign minister, were in Beirut over the weekend.

They met Mr Siniora separately and expressed their support for him. In the Arab world, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia and Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak voiced strong support for the Lebanese government. Amr Moussa, the head of the Arab League, called for a compromise.

Troops Patrol Beirut After Shooting (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi

AP, December 5, 2006

Troops in armored cars deployed to Sunni Muslim neighborhoods in the capital Monday after the shooting death of a young Shiite man, but that failed to prevent renewed friction. Shiite leaders urged the victim's family to avoid revenge, fearing sectarian violence that could detonate Lebanon's political crisis.

Lebanese were struggling to contain tensions after Shiites were fired on Sunday as they walked through Sunni and mixed neighborhoods following an anti-government demonstration in downtown Beirut. The attack raised memories of Lebanon's 1975-1990 civil war, when Beirut was divided by the Green Line between its warring Christian and Muslim districts.

Now Lebanon's divisions fall along different lines: The government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora has widespread support among Sunnis, while its opponent, the pro-Syrian Hezbollah, is backed by Shiites. Lebanon's Christians largely support the government, though a major faction has allied with Hezbollah.

Police said two people were injured late Monday when a group of Shiites, returning home from downtown Beirut, smashed windows of parked cars and stores in a neighborhood near Qasqas, the mainly Sunni area where Sunday's shooting took place.

Troops fired several warning shots in the air and intervened to prevent the friction from escalating, said security officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media.

About 300 people also gathered on the highway to Beirut international airport, in an apparent attempt to block the road, but security forces prevented them, the security officials said.

The body of Ahmed Mahmoud, a 20-year-old Shiite, was brought by ambulance Monday night to downtown Riad Solh Square, where thousands of pro-Hezbollah protesters were camping for the fourth straight night demanding the ouster of Saniora's U.S-backed government.

The protesters cheered, blared nationalist songs and waved the Lebanese flag as the coffin was placed on a platform in front of the crowd, just a few hundred yards from Saniora's offices, which were ringed by troops.

Hezbollah's Al-Manar television station, which aired the event live, called Mahmoud "the martyr of national unity." Mahmoud's funeral was scheduled for Tuesday.

Mahmoud's father, Ali, said he initially had thought of revenge, but backed down after a visit by envoys of Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah and his ally, Parliament Speaker and leader of the Shiite Amal Movement Nabih Berri, who said vengeance would only play into the hands of those trying to divide Lebanon.

"They said my son was martyred for the homeland and they don't want chaos, but want all sects to live in harmony, to love each other," Mahmoud said as he received well-wishers at a funeral hall.

He said he hoped that Saniora, who has been holed up in his office since Friday, will quit. "Then, everything will be fine. We don't want problems between Sunnis and Shiites, Christians and Druse," he said.

Ahmed Mahmoud and his brother Hassan were returning home from the protest Sunday and had just turned a corner when heavy gunfire broke out.

"Ali said, 'Let's run the other way,'" said Hassan, 22. He said he heard his brother scream, and saw him fall, but kept running. An hour later, the family got a call saying Ahmed had been killed by a bullet to the back.

Hassan Mahmoud accused Saniora and his top ally, Saad Hariri — son of slain Sunni former prime minister Rafik Hariri — of causing problems "so Sunnis and Shiites start fighting each other."

Accounts of how the shooting started varied. Sunnis in the neighborhood said the Shiites returning from the rally began chanting rude slogans against Sunni leaders, provoking Sunnis to throw stones. Some — Sunnis and Shiites — said they believed the came from outsiders not connected to the rally.

"I expect things to get worse, there will be war. The signs are all there," said Issam Qadah, a Sunni coffee vendor who heard the gunfire.

Mazen Mizhir, 19, a Sunni student, said he was worried about his safety because his college was in a Shiite neighborhood. "Tomorrow, Nasrallah and Saad Hariri will kiss and make up. It's only the ordinary people who will lose," he said.

Mohammed Barakat, a 34-year-old Sunni, blamed Hezbollah for the crisis. "We (Sunnis) feel like foreigners in our own land," he said. "We're living on the edge."

The political crisis began escalating when six pro-Hezbollah ministers resigned from the Cabinet last month after Saniora and his anti-Syrian majority in parliament rejected the group's demand for a new national unity government that would effectively give it and its allies veto power.

Hezbollah says it will continue its protest campaign until Saniora agrees to step down; the prime minister and his supporters have vowed to stay.

Saniora, a Sunni, gave a veiled warning Sunday of the possibility of Sunni-Shiite fighting, saying that any attempt by Hezbollah's supporters to storm his office would lead to "a major and serious problem."

Beirut Protester Killed In Brawl Is Hailed As Hezbollah 'Martyr' (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102338

BEIRUT, Dec. 4 -- The posters went up Monday morning, followed by slogans and chants. And within a day of his death in a street brawl along Beirut's increasingly tense fault lines of sect and politics, Ahmed Mahmoud became the first symbol of the mass demonstrations by Hezbollah and its allies meant to bring down the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

"Lift the Lebanese flag," an announcer intoned over loudspeakers, as tens of thousands at the protest in downtown Beirut surged toward an ambulance carrying Mahmoud's coffin, draped in a Lebanese flag. "Let us give respect to the martyr."

The bells of St. George Cathedral rang, and protesters recited Koranic verses as his body was carried through the streets. At times, the crowd shouted, "Down with the government!" His posters were hung over the crowd and plastered on car windshields. "Martyr of Lebanese national unity," one read. "Martyred at the hands of the authority's militias," said another.

Mahmoud was shot Sunday in clashes that erupted on the edge of Tariq Jdideh, a tense Sunni neighborhood, between its residents and Shiite protesters returning from downtown. The exact circumstances of his death remained unclear, but the conflicts there and elsewhere in the city sent a chill through Beirut, bracing for more trouble between the tens of thousands going back and forth to the protest and other residents who say they see the banners, flags and chants as a provocation.

Soon after the clashes, the Lebanese army deployed more soldiers in the capital, particularly along protesters' routes. Downtown, dozens of soldiers and riot police stood behind barbed wire and barricades guarding the government headquarters known as the Serail, where Siniora and other ministers have taken up residence. Even the arrival of Mahmoud's body at the protest went unannounced; organizers, sensing that tempers were running high, said they were trying to act responsibly.

Hours after nightfall Monday, Lebanese television aired footage of more fights in the same neighborhood, which is near the largely Shiite Muslim southern suburbs. Car windows were shattered, and groups of youths surged down the streets.

"We're not scared of sectarian strife, but we're ready for it," said Wael Ali, a 27-year-old protester. "We don't want to aggress against anyone, but if someone aggresses against us, we'll never give in."

He stood with a friend, Hassan Qassem, both of whom have come each day to the demonstrations.

"We're ready for everything," said Qassem, also 27. "We had martyrs in the war with Israel, and we won. We're not ready for just one martyr. We're ready for 1,000 martyrs, but in the end, the government will be brought down."

As they spoke, the Lebanese national anthem played as the body was driven through the streets, with crowds rushing toward the ambulance. Some threw red and white rose petals on top of the hood. As it made its way toward the edge of downtown, the crowd shouted, "There is no god but God; the martyr is beloved by God."

Hezbollah and its allies called the protest Friday after the government rejected their demands for a greater share of power in the cabinet. The government and its supporters, allied with the United States and France, have described the demonstrations as a coup attempt. Hezbollah, backed by Syria and Iran, has insisted the protesters will remain in the streets until the government resigns.

The arrival of Mahmoud's body was a dramatic moment in the otherwise carnival-like atmosphere of the demonstrations, which entered their fourth day. Boys played cards in the street or smoked Arabic water pipes outside dozens of tents that have gone up in parking lots and parks.

Families posed for pictures, and youths tried to outdo each other with chants. Most were directed at Siniora and his government allies, particularly Ahmed Fatfat, who as acting interior minister during the recent war had authority over a police commander who served tea to Israeli troops who had entered his headquarters as they occupied the southern town of Marjayoun.

"Oh Fatfat, you tough guy, we'll take three coffees and a tea!" they shouted.

As protesters passed police checkpoints, some motioned their hands downward, a gesture made to order tea.

British Police Take Poisoning Inquiry To Moscow (WP)

By Mary Jordan And Peter Finn

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 4 -- A team of British police investigators arrived in Moscow on Monday to begin questioning people about the poisoning death of Alexander Litvinenko, a former Russian spy who had recently become a British citizen, in a case that is straining relations between the two governments.

DOJ_NMG_0102339

Home Secretary John Reid, speaking at a European Union meeting in Brussels, said the Scotland Yard officers in Moscow would "follow the evidence wherever it goes."

Although Russian officials have pledged to cooperate in the inquiry, their irritation over the case showed through in official comments. Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov warned Monday against "politicizing this issue" and "speculations on this subject." The Interfax news agency also quoted him as saying, "This is, of course, harming our relations."

In Russia, a jailed former intelligence officer made a plea Monday through his lawyers for British investigators to talk to him. Mikhail Trepashkin, who used to work in the Federal Security Service, or FSB, said an FSB officer had told him that Litvinenko was being targeted and "won't escape Trotsky's ice pick," a reference to the 1940 murder of Bolshevik figure Leon Trotsky by a Soviet agent in Mexico City.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko's, said he hoped British investigators would be allowed to interview Trepashkin in jail because he would be able to tell them about "rogue elements within the FSB," the domestic successor to the KGB.

Litvinenko, 43, an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, a former KGB officer, accused Putin of ordering his killing, according to a statement Litvinenko's family and friends said he dictated on his deathbed. The Kremlin has called those allegations absurd, and Reid has cautioned against making assumptions about the case before the facts are known.

Scotland Yard detectives in Moscow are treading on delicate ground as they look into the business and personal relationships of former members of Russia's secretive intelligence services. A central focus of the investigation in Moscow will be interviews with three men, at least one of them a former KGB officer, who met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1, hours before he fell violently ill from poisoning by radioactive polonium-210.

In comments to Russian news organizations, the three men -- Andrei Lugovoy, Dmitry Kovtun and Vyacheslav Sokolenko -- have denied any involvement in Litvinenko's death. All three met Litvinenko in the Millennium Hotel in London, across the street from the U.S. Embassy. Police later detected traces of radiation at the hotel.

Police are investigating whether there are also links between any of the men and traces of polonium-210 found in London hotel rooms and on British Airways planes that flew from London to Moscow, among other destinations.

The three Russians met in the 1980s at the Supreme Council Military School in Moscow, according to a recent joint interview with Echo Moskvy radio. Lugovoy is a former KGB agent -- as was Litvinenko -- but the backgrounds of Kovtun and Sokolenko are less clear. Sokolenko said he runs an association of security companies called the Ninth Degree, and Kovtun described himself as a business consultant.

Many private security companies in Russia are stocked with former officers of the KGB and FSB, according to Olga Kryshtanovskaya, head of the Center for the Study of Elites at the Institute of Sociology in Moscow. She said the former agents provide physical security and gather political and economic intelligence for corporations.

"They are very valuable to employers of private security firms," agreed John Barber, an expert in modern Russian history at Cambridge University, especially because of their connections.

Sokolenko told the radio station that he was in London on Nov. 1 to join Lugovoy at a soccer game between British and Russian teams. Sokolenko said he "didn't have a meeting" with Litvinenko at the Millennium but merely "exchanged greetings" with him as Litvinenko spoke to the other two.

Kovtun said he first met Litvinenko in London with Lugovoy on Oct. 16, then again on Nov. 1. Kovtun said on Echo Moskvy that Litvinenko had "serious contacts with serious British companies which wanted to get into the Russian market, but had experienced difficulties with this."

Lugovoy described himself as an owner of a factory producing wine and nonalcoholic drinks made from herbs and honey. "This is my main business now," he said. "This factory is the largest in the country, 50,000 square meters, 500 employees. The company is very successful."

After graduating from the military academy, Lugovoy said, he worked in a KGB Kremlin regiment that provided security for VIPs. After the fall of the Soviet Union, he provided security in 1992 and 1993 for then-Prime Minister Yegor Gaidar -- who himself fell mysteriously ill recently during a visit to Ireland. He was released from a Moscow hospital Monday evening.

After leaving government service, Lugovoy spent several years as head of security for ORT, a national television channel once controlled by Boris Berezovsky, a billionaire now living in self-imposed exile in London. Berezovsky was a friend of Litvinenko's and is another harsh critic of Putin, who arranged a state takeover of ORT.

Lugovoy, like Litvinenko, spent time in prison in Russia. Lugovoy was charged with trying to help an official of the Russian airline Aeroflot, in which Berezovsky was a major shareholder, escape from police custody.

Litvinenko, for his part, angered his superiors when he publicly accused them of ordering him to kill Berezovsky. He was jailed on several charges of abusing his authority before he was released and fled the country, arriving in Britain in 2000.

Russia: Poison Probe Has Hurt UK Ties (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Jimmy Burns And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

Russia warned on Monday that the mounting furore over the poisoning in London of Alexander Litvinenko was damaging relations between the two countries.

As British investigators arrived in Moscow last night for a highly unusual joint probe, Sergei Lavrov, Russian foreign minister, hit out at what he called the "politicisation" of the case.

UK investigators and officials have refused to rule out the possibility that the former KGB agent was killed as a result of a conspiracy involving Russian security services involved in political manoeuvring.

The Russian prosecutor-general's office confirmed that London's police had requested assistance with its investigation. Mr Litvinenko died after being poisoned with radioactive polonium 210. His death led to a health scare in Britain in which buildings and people were found to be contaminated with radiation and three British Airways aircraft were grounded.

Moscow has been irritated by newspaper reports from London that Moscow tried to prevent the publication of Mr Litvinenko's deathbed letter. "This is damaging our relations," Mr Lavrov was quoted as saying by Russian news agencies. "We must avoid speculation on this subject."

British investigators plan to interview at least three Russians who met Mr Litvinenko on November 1, the day he fell ill.

Particular attention is focusing on Andrei Lugovoi, a former KGB officer who also has past links – like Mr Litvinenko – with Boris Berezovsky, the exiled Russian oligarch.

Mr Lugovoi was unavailable for comment on Monday but in previous media statements has denied any responsibility for Mr Litvinenko's poisoning.

British Spy Probe Turns To Émigrés (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Aaron O. Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

LONDON -- The investigation into the poisoning of the former Russian spy who died here last month has cast a spotlight on some of London's wealthiest jet-setters: the thousands of Russian émigrés who have moved here in the past decade.

Russians, as with other wealthy émigrés from the Middle East, come to protect their wealth and take advantage of the tax laws, or send their children to British schools. Some Russians are exiles seeking escape from the regime of President Vladimir Putin.

It was in these circles that former spy Alexander Litvinenko moved before his death in a London hospital on Nov. 23 from poisoning by the radioactive substance polonium 210.

Mr. Litvinenko was an associate of Boris Berezovsky, one of the most prominent Russian exiles in the United Kingdom and, like Mr. Litvinenko, a critic of Mr. Putin.

Many Russians here maintain ties back to Russia and its murky business and government connections, and while police haven't publicly identified any suspects, those links appear to be key. Yesterday, British investigators traveled to Moscow, testing relations between the U.K. and Russia.

To many, it follows that the plot leading to Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning would play out, like a spy novel, in London. London's Metropolitan Police Service has investigated nearly a dozen sites Mr. Litvinenko visited, or sites that police say require monitoring by health officials because of his radioactive poisoning. While Mr. Litvinenko blamed Mr. Putin in a note from his death bed -- a claim the Russian government has denied -- with the many wealthy Russian businessmen in London, a former spy could have crossed others who had the means to poison him.

Russian wealth makes a big contribution to London's economy, driving up house prices and boosting retail sales. Communities of wealthy Russians can be found in a number of other major cities, such as New York. London, and the U.K., do a lot to court these émigrés and other wealthy foreigners. Foreigners who reside in the U.K. but can show they don't live here permanently don't have to pay taxes on overseas income as long it resides offshore.

London's business climate also helps. The city has seen an influx of Russian businessmen rich with oil and telecommunication assets who have tapped the city's deep well of capital. Britons refer to a top London soccer team, Chelsea, as "Chelski" because the team is owned by Russian oligarch Roman Abramovich. Since 2000, Russian companies have taken part in 27 equity sales on the London Stock Exchange's main and alternative investment market, raising $24.6 billion, according to research firm Dealogic.

Earlier this year, in a huge offering, state-controlled Russian oil company OAO Rosneft listed its global depositary receipts on the London Stock Exchange. Underscoring the disputes from Russia that have spilled over into London, the stock offering came about only after lawyers for Russian oil company OAO Yukos failed to stop the listing after claiming that Rosneft's assets came from the unlawful seizure and sale of Yukos.

Among home sales, from June 2005 to June of this year, Russians have bought one in every five properties priced at and above £6 million ($11.9 million), according to real-estate firm Knight Frank.

This year, Russian homeowners are expected to buy 243 London homes priced above £1 million, compared with 67 in 2001, according to Liam Bailey, head of residential research at Knight Frank. The average sales price during that same period has risen 80% to £2.5 million for homes in London and the English countryside.

Last month, one of the U.K.'s top real-estate agents, Savills PLC, formed a joint venture with a Russian real-estate company, Intermark, to sell English houses and apartments to wealthy Russians. Virginia Garnett, a Russian-speaking executive with Savills in London, says Russians are prepared to spend £15 million to £30 million for homes in London.

Lately, Russians are discussing Mr. Litvinenko, Ms. Garnett says. "Socially, it comes up. Overwhelmingly, the Russian position is that Putin is being unfairly accused. I think there is definitely an attitude of disappointment in that right now that [Putin] is guilty until proven innocent" in the U.K., she says.

Iconic department store Harrods hired Russian-speaking personal shopping assistants last year. The store's export bureau, which helps foreign customers claim back sales tax, has had Russian-speaking staff since 2004. "The Russian market is very attracted to all of the top-of-the-range international designer labels," says a Harrods spokesman.

Peter Eatenton, a joint partner at Chelsea's Rolls Royce and Bentley car dealership, says Russians usually will only buy the latest and most expensive models. "They tend to be a bit over the top and want the best of the best," he says.

At the outpost of Sotheby's auction house in London, sales of Russian art are booming. Two sales of Russian art last month raised £22 million, including £2.25 million for two vases which Tsar Nicholas I gave to a French ambassador in 1830. Sotheby's declined to disclose the buyers, but Jo Vickery, head of the Russian department, says "the vast majority of our buyers are Russians. They made their money during the [Russian President Boris] Yeltsin period and now they are building up their collections."

A Familiar Mystery (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

In the 10 days that have passed since Alexander Litvinenko, an ex-KGB agent, died of radiation poisoning in London, we have learned a lot about his death -- haven't we?

Well, we have learned that Litvinenko died after somehow ingesting polonium-210, a relatively rare radioactive substance. We have learned that a mysterious Italian, Mario Scaramella-- a self-employed "security expert" who last year claimed that he'd found ex-KGB men selling nuclear material in the postage-stamp republic of San Marino -- has been poisoned too. We have learned that various other ex-KGB agents floating around London also have tested positive for polonium-210, as have a Piccadilly sushi restaurant, a London hotel room and a few airplanes.

We have seen a photograph of Litvinenko flaunting KGB gauntlets, a Chechen sword and a Union Jack. We have also seen a photograph of Litvinenko with tubes in his body, on his deathbed.

We have learned that Litvinenko may or may not have known who murdered the Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya earlier this year (and that the same people may have killed him too); that he may or may not have been involved in a scam to blackmail various prominent Russians (unless that's just information planted in the British press); that he may or may not have possessed a dossier proving that the Kremlin framed the imprisoned billionaire boss of the Yukos oil company, Mikhail Khodorkovsky (unless that's what Khodorkovsky's people, or some other people, want us to think); that he may or may not have possessed proof that Vladimir Putin -- another ex-KGB officer, now president of Russia -- ordered his goons to blow up some apartment buildings in Moscow several years ago, a terrorist act that launched the current Chechen war.

In other words: Though we don't know who killed Litvinenko, we have learned that London is a more exciting place than we thought it was. We have learned that the complex plots of Dostoevsky novels merely reflect Russian reality. And we have learned that the old KGB lives on in new guises.

Or rather -- we have been reminded that the old KGB lives on in new guises, because in fact we have known this for some time. True, the old employees no longer belong to a single all-powerful institution. Some ("the stupidest," according to Oleg Gordievsky, the former double agent) have stayed with the agency, joining either the domestic service (FSB) or the foreign intelligence bureau (SVR). Others went into business, some joining the security entourages of new Russian millionaires, some becoming Russian millionaires in their own right. Still others, to put it bluntly, went into organized crime. And some -- President Putin is the shining example here -- went into politics.

Despite their widely varying fates, it has long been perfectly clear that many of these old comrades continue to work together in mutually profitable ways. As far back as 1999, for example, a group of Russian-born bankers was caught laundering money through a New York bank, probably using information obtained, one way or another, by Russian intelligence. Since then it has become clear that a number of Russia's largest companies were launched with money from mysterious sources, and a number of former KGB officers have shown up at the helm of businesses and banks, too.

Of course this same mutually profitable relationship will also make it extremely difficult to find Litvinenko's real killer. After all, this set of post-KGB relationships is nothing if not complex: There are conspiracies within conspiracies, agents of agents of agents, people who pretend to be acting on behalf of a particular oligarch or Chechen insurgent who are actually acting on behalf of someone quite different. It is possible that Litvinenko was murdered by "rogue secret policemen," as the British press suspects. It is also possible that the "rogue secret policemen" were working for someone who worked for the Kremlin, or someone who worked for a Russian oligarch, or who worked for a Russian oligarch who worked for the Kremlin.

As the investigation progresses, I'm sure many more wonderfully shady characters will emerge, along with many theories about who was trying to discredit whom. But though it's doubtful that he ever gave an actual order to an actual thug, Putin is certainly responsible for Litvinenko's death in this deeper sense: He presides over this web of old intelligence operatives, indeed, sits at its center. And he approves of their methods.

One of his first acts as prime minister in 1999 was the unveiling of a plaque to Yuri Andropov, the former KGB boss best known for his harsh treatment of dissidents. Last year Russians built a statue to Andropov. No one should have been surprised that the former KGB's harassment of modern "dissidents" grew harsher with every passing year -- or that it culminated in this strange murder.

That we were surprised, are surprised, is both tragic and ironic: After all, for the better part of a decade now, we've been desperately looking for weapons of mass destruction and for the strange new enemies, the Islamic radicals who might be planning to use them. And now we've discovered that there really is nuclear material for sale and that it really is being used, in the West, to kill people. And that the killers aren't strange, or new, or even Islamic.

Ukraine Committed To U.S., Leader Says (AP)

By Desmond Butler, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0102343

AP, December 5, 2006

Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych of Ukraine told an American audience Monday that his country is committed to democracy and on a path toward political and economic reform.

On his first trip to the U.S. after becoming prime minister, Yanukovych sought to convince U.S. officials and business leaders that he has strong democratic credentials, even though he was previously identified with efforts to rig the 2004 presidential election.

"There can never be too much democracy in the Ukraine, just as there can never be too much freedom," Yanukovych said in remarks at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a think tank.

Yanukovych's meetings Monday and Tuesday with Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and members of Congress were designed in part to discuss Ukraine's economy and its possible entry into the World Trade Organization and NATO.

But more was at stake than that.

"The main goal that Yanukovych is coming with is to establish some credibility with the administration," said Steven Pifer, a former U.S. ambassador to Ukraine and now a senior adviser at the think tank.

In 2004, Yanukovych was seen as a foe of democracy. Western officials expressed outrage at stolen votes that initially helped him win the presidential election. Protesters rose up in what became known as the "Orange Revolution." The country's Supreme Court overturned the election and ordered a new vote, which he lost to his pro-Western rival, Viktor Yushchenko.

Yanukovych was widely discredited, while Yushchenko was praised in the West and given a standing ovation when he addressed the U.S. Congress last year.

But Yanukovych became prime minister after parliamentary elections in March that were declared Ukraine's freest and fairest ever. He now shares power with Yushchenko.

Yanukovych's trip comes after the Ukrainian parliament on Friday ousted the country's foreign and interior ministers, two key allies of Yushchenko. Pro-Western Foreign Minister Borys Tarasyuk was fired after criticizing Yanukovych's Washington trip and grappling with Parliament about the president's constitutional primacy over foreign policy.

U.S. officials have played down the moves by Yanukovych's party against the ministers as an internal Ukrainian matter. But they have cautioned that Ukraine's democratic development is their primary concern.

"With respect to Ukraine, as with respect to any other country, we certainly want to see those that are elected democratically, govern democratically," said State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey at a briefing Friday.

Despite setbacks for Yushchenko, he has argued that the wrangling between two directly elected power centers — the parliament and the presidency — are indeed signs of democracy.

Venezuelans Give Chávez A Mandate To Tighten His Grip (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 4 — If President Hugo Chávez rules like an autocrat, as his critics in Washington and here charge, then he does so with the full permission of a substantial majority of the Venezuelan people, Sunday's election here showed.

Sent to power for a third time, Mr. Chávez seems intent on assuming the mantle from the fading Fidel Castro of chief Latin American scourge of the United States. He also has made no secret of his intent to consolidate his power further through legal and personnel changes.

He has spoken of a desire to unite his supporters in one political party and to alter legislation to allow him to remain in power past 2020.

Winning support for such measures may not be difficult in a country where his allies already control the legislature and the Supreme Court as well as governorships in all but two states, and where the military, the national oil company and other government bureaucracies and institutions have been systematically packed with Chávez boosters and stripped of opponents.

Now, facing an anemic opposition that could not win in any of Venezuela's 23 states or Caracas, Mr. Chávez is expected to tighten his grip, first and foremost over his own supporters in an effort to prevent challenges to his rule from emerging.

"A priority for Chávez right now is what he calls a 'revolution within a revolution,' " said Steve Ellner, a political scientist at the Universidad de Oriente in eastern Venezuela. "This means a purging process of those associated with corruption or excess bureaucracy. In January you're going to see some heads being chopped."

Venezuela leading newspapers, El Nacional and El Universal, published maps in their pages on Monday showing the entire country painted red, the color of Mr. Chávez's campaign, as a reflection of his convincing victory.

Red, in fact, colored not just the clothing and advertisements of the Chávez campaign. Rafael Ramírez, the energy minister, described the national oil company as "red, really red," in comments caught on video in which he told workers that they had no place in the company if they were not supporters of the government.

Mr. Ramírez's words, which Mr. Chávez promptly adopted as one of his refrains, point to a creeping "with us or against us" radicalization in Venezuelan society that goes beyond the government-run oil company to institutions like public schools and museums.

That polarization may now worsen, a prospect that clearly concerns leaders of Venezuela's political opposition as they regroup after their defeat.

"Chávez is not a dictator," Teodoro Petkoff, the editor of the newspaper TalCual and a key adviser to the president's defeated opponent, Manuel Rosales, said in an interview. "But he's not a Thomas Jefferson either."

The reality of Venezuela's democracy is indeed far more nuanced, as is Mr. Chávez's "21st-century socialism" in an oil-exporting country experiencing a boom in conspicuous consumption.

Mr. Rosales's campaign itself illustrated that complexity. Mr. Rosales, the governor of Zulia State, rose from near obscurity to lead a movement that won nearly 40 percent of the vote nationwide. Much of the established media in the capital, Caracas, clearly supported him, although in relatively restrained coverage compared with their previous opposition to Mr. Chávez.

Beyond Venezuela, Mr. Chávez's rise to international prominence in Latin America and beyond has much to do with his supremacy in Venezuela.

With his new term and the slow demise of his hero Fidel Castro, who was too ill to attend his own 80th birthday celebrations in Havana over the weekend, Mr. Chávez may indeed solidify his place as the new the standard-bearer of the left in Latin America, where leftist candidates have won presidential elections in the last five weeks in Brazil, Ecuador, Nicaragua and Venezuela.

That left is indeed varied, and Mr. Chávez is not necessarily its most representative figure. But he is its most vocal one, especially when it comes to chiding President Bush.

Mr. Chávez's prominent position will continue to depend, of course, on the price of oil, the volatile commodity at the heart of Venezuela's economy. Those prices may remain high as the war in Iraq drags on and markets gaze nervously at the Middle East. Meanwhile, paradoxically, the United States remains the largest buyer of Venezuelan oil and has in effect helped to finance Mr. Chávez's ambitions.

"Chávez is getting stronger as an unintended consequence of war and globalization," said Kenneth Maxwell, a professor of Latin American history at Harvard.

Despite Venezuela's tight commercial embrace of the United States, the obstacles to improving relations may now loom larger.

Washington remains wary of Venezuela's warm ties to Cuba, Iran and Syria. The Bush and Chávez administrations hold different views on hemispheric integration, with United States wanting to expand it, based on the model of trade agreements like Nafta, and Venezuela promoting Latin America first, before further integration with the North American economies.

"The chances for improvement are minimal for the remainder of the Bush administration," said Daniel Hellinger, a political scientist and an expert on Venezuela at Webster University in St. Louis. "More is involved here than the personal animosity between Bush and Chávez."

U.S.: We Can Work With Venezuela (AP)

AP, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102345

The Bush administration, long at odds with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, greeted the populist leader's landslide re-election victory by holding out the possibility of a more cooperative relationship.

"We look forward to having the opportunity to work with the Venezuelan government on issues of mutual interest," State Department press officer Eric Watnik said Monday.

His brief comment did not offer congratulations to Chavez. Nor did it make direct reference to him or what it regards as the increasingly authoritarian course he has pursued.

Watnik noted that Tom Shannon, who heads the State Department's Latin America bureau, has praised the campaign run by Chavez's main opponent, Manuel Rosales.

"The opposition demonstrated its ability to put forth an important, peaceful and democratic campaign and it garnered a significant share of the vote," Watnik said.

He said reports of irregularities should be investigated.

"We look forward to hearing from the Organization of American States, the European Union and civil society groups that observed the electoral process," Watnik added.

The administration, he said, closely followed reports of intimidation and voter harassment during the campaign, including various instances of irregularities reported by the media.

On Friday, two days before the election, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte outlined U.S. concerns about Chavez in a wide-ranging speech at Harvard.

He said Chavez's "meddling in the domestic affairs of other states in the region — granting Colombia's FARC insurgents safe haven and other material support, for example — already has made him a divisive force."

He criticized Venezuela's attitude toward drug trafficking as "permissive," an allegation Venezuelan officials have denied.

Venezuela's growing ties to Iran and other states, such as North Korea, Syria, and Belarus, "clearly demonstrate a desire to build an anti-U.S. coalition that extends well beyond Latin America," Negroponte said.

The High Road To Caracas (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

Washington should heed Venezuela's opposition leader and greet Chavez's election victory with grace.

THERE ARE PLENTY of reasons for Venezuelans not to like Hugo Chavez. Crime, especially murder, has skyrocketed during his eight years as president. Corruption is ubiquitous — the country ranks No. 138 out of 163 on Transparency International's annual misgovernance index (the higher the number, the more corrupt the country is perceived to be). Democratic institutions have been subverted, foreign investors are jittery and Chavez's clownish anti-American rhetoric has made Venezuela a pariah in most Western countries, even if it has warmed the hearts of dictators everywhere.

None of that mattered Sunday, when Chavez was reelected with an impressive 61% of the vote. The source of Chavez's popularity is apparent: High oil prices have fueled 9% annual growth in Venezuela and allowed him to buy the loyalty of the poor by pumping oil revenue into social programs. Oil wealth also has given him free rein for socialist tinkering — such as seizing energy production facilities and increasing government control over the private sector — that has backfired in nearly every nation in which it's been tried.

Yet as long as the petrodollars pour in, Chavez will remain a daunting political force, and the impracticality of his economic policies will be rendered moot. And if he has his way, he may be in charge for a lot longer than six more years; he has promised to push through a constitutional reform ending term limits for Venezuela's president.

Not all the news was bad for the beleaguered opposition, led by the middle and upper classes. In the past, it has reacted badly to Chavez's political successes, including an attempted coup in 2002. These moves only made Chavez stronger by allowing him to paint his opponents as undemocratic. By gracefully conceding after the election results became clear, opposition candidate Manuel Rosales has assured that the coalition he patched together will continue to be a political player.

The U.S. should also take the high road. President Bush, a.k.a. "the devil" in Chavez's lexicon, should disappoint the Venezuelan leader by taking his win in stride. That means ratcheting down the anti-Chavez rhetoric and U.S. support for the opposition. The point is not to play into Chavez's narrative portraying the U.S. as an intolerant hegemonist. Chavez has shown himself to be his own worst enemy, capable of acting as much the bully as he portrays Bush to be.

Washington should try to improve bilateral ties not just because there is a long-term strategic value to cordial relations with this big oil producer. A goodwill effort to be reasonable toward Caracas will also undermine Chavez's own credibility when he tries to sell his Yankees-are-devils pitch to the rest of Latin America.

Now Is The Time To Engage With Hugo (FT)

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

On the face of it Hugo Chávez's decisive election victory in Sunday's election in Venezuela and his promises to radicalise what he calls "21st century socialism" might seem to present something of a problem for policymakers in Washington.

After all, the Venezuelan leader seems to go out of his way to make friends with US enemies and elections in Latin America during the past 12 months have shown that he has pull in the smaller and more economically vulnerable countries of the region.

Firm allies are now installed in Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua, which, alongside Cuba, are all likely to form part of the anti-US axis that Mr Chávez aspires to lead.

Yet, it is important not to exaggerate the Venezuelan leader's influence. This year's election round has also highlighted the limits of Mr Chávez's reach. Moderate candidates keen to work with Washington won elections in five of the six important countries. In two of those, Peru and Mexico, perceived association with Chavismo contributed to the defeat of left-wingers.

And at home, the re-elected leader faces significant obstacles as he looks to radicalise. True, a six-fold rise in the oil price has transformed Venezuela's economy in the eight years since Mr Chávez was first elected, allowing the government to spend heavily on social programmes and build up considerable financial reserves.

However, Venezuela's rapidly growing economy is not creating enough jobs nor making enough goods. A boom in liquidity and credit is adding to inflationary pressures.

Opinion polls, which forecast the election result and demonstrated the popularity of health and education programmes, also showed that government supporters are worried about the extent of corruption and crime.

And there are signs too that Mr Chávez may also face opposition from within his own ranks if he presses through a constitutional reform that would allow him to run for office yet again, remaining in power into the next decade and beyond.

Mr Chávez also faces a more effective opposition. Judging by the dignified way Manuel Rosales, the losing candidate, accepted defeat on Sunday night, he realises that building up a viable alternative is a long-term process.

Better then, for the US and its hemispheric friends to cease the rhetorical barrages against Mr Chávez that are such grist to his populist mill. After appearing to collude in the failed 2002 coup against his elected government, moreover, Washington has ground to make up. It should continue a recent more pragmatic approach, engaging Venezuela in areas such as oil, energy policy and border security.

None of this will be easy, but it will place the onus on Mr Chávez to deliver prosperity for his people and make it more difficult for him to hide behind a smokescreen of nationalist rhetoric.

Efforts To Aid Darfur Reach Dead End (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, December 5, 2006

Sudan's final rejection of a joint U.N.-African peacekeeping force in Darfur came as little surprise to many involved in failed international efforts to end the region's deadly violence.

But many say civilians will be the ones to bear the costs of that opposition — thousands more will die, they fear, and many more will be forced to flee their homes unless the West can somehow muster strong sanctions against Sudan's government.

"Khartoum will not stop the massive war crimes taking place in Darfur until it is forced to," said Tom Cargyll of Chatham House, a British think tank.

The U.N. compromise deal was announced last month by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan as a major diplomatic breakthrough to bring peace to Darfur — one that would allow him to keep his pledge to solve the Darfur crisis before he steps down as U.N. chief later this year.

Annan said Sudan had agreed in principle to a "hybrid mission" of some 20,000 peacekeepers — mostly from Africa — to deploy in Darfur under U.N. command to replace an overwhelmed AU force.

Yet within 24 hours, Sudan's foreign minister said there was a misunderstanding and that a "mixed operation" in Darfur did not mean a "mixed force."

That put Sudan back to its original stance: No U.N. peacekeeper could deploy in Darfur, but the U.N. was welcome to provide logistical and financial support.

"International troops are a colonization of Sudan," Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir later told reporters.

An African Union summit in Nigeria last week — which had been due to fine-tune the joint mission — instead was forced to yield to Sudanese pressure. It voted to prolong by another six months the stay of the underfunded and ill-equipped 7,000 AU peacekeepers.

Sudan's opposition is deeply rooted, some analysts say.

"Its entirely coherent with (Sudan's) pattern of behavior over the last 17 years," since al-Bashir came to power in a 1989 Islamist and military coup, said Colin Thomas-Jensen of the International Crisis Group, a U.S. think tank.

Several Sudanese government hard-liners are believed to be on a list of suspects that the International Criminal Court has said it would prosecute for crimes against humanity.

That could explain why Sudan adamantly refuses to let the U.N. into Darfur, even though 10,000 peacekeepers are already in the country's south on a separate mission, Cargyll said.

"Khartoum has much more to lose at Darfur being internationalized than any other country has to win," he said.

Thursday's AU summit in Abuja came as a bitter reminder of dashed hopes.

In the same city last May, the Sudanese government and a leading rebel group signed a deal meant to end three years of violence that have killed at least 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million. The deal has since largely collapsed, and Sudan's policy has since been to win time by appearing to negotiate, while pro-government militias rampage through Darfur on an ever-larger scale, analysts say. The Sudan's latest backtracking shows it will only yield to strong pressure, they say.

But al-Bashir and other Khartoum hard-liners have grown increasingly savvy at playing the rifts in international diplomacy, he said.

Sudan gained sympathy in the Arab world, for example, by comparing its confrontation with the West to the plight of Lebanon, Iraq and the Palestinians — which many Arabs see as victims of U.S. foreign policy.

More importantly, Sudan knows that Russia and China, two veto-yielding powers at the U.N. Security Council, oppose sanctions.

Previous U.N. sanctions against Sudan were lifted after it cooperated with U.S. counterterrorism efforts after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. U.S. sanctions were re-imposed in 1997 and recently strengthened, but such one-country measures have little effect in a globalized economy, analysts say.

More than 5 percent of China's oil imports come from Sudan, and Khartoum knows that its key Asian ally is unlikely to let it down if the Security Council considers an embargo, Cargyll said.

"Over the past four years, there has been no real cost imposed on the Sudanese government for what is happening in Darfur," Thomas-Jensen said.

The United States has given some indications it may take a more robust stance soon.

Andrew Natsios, the special envoy named by the White House, recently warned that if Khartoum did not accept an international solution by January, the U.S. and it allies would find an alternative.

Analysts say the new strategy could be targeted sanctions against Sudan's main oil companies, suspected to be owned by regime hard-liners. But Khartoum appears confident it will face no harsh measures, because too many countries now rely on its resources.

"Just when some countries gave us sanctions, God gave us oil," al-Bashir said last week.

'Hotel Rwanda' Hero Hasn't Fared Well Back Home Lately (WSJ)

By Christopher Rhoads

DOJ_NMG_0102348

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

KIGALI, Rwanda -- Since the movie "Hotel Rwanda" was released two years ago, Paul Rusesabagina has become a hero in the U.S. In Rwanda, he is seen in a different light.

The film shows him saving hundreds of refugees from his country's genocide in 1994, as the manager of a Rwandan hotel. Mr. Rusesabagina was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom by George Bush. He has published his autobiography, "An Ordinary Man," and is currently on a U.S. speaking tour. There's talk he will enter Rwandan politics.

Back home, the Rwandan media, former refugees in the hotel and even the country's president in recent months have denounced Mr. Rusesabagina as an impostor profiting from the genocide. They say the Hollywood movie greatly exaggerated his role and distorted these sensitive events. The head of the country's genocide survivor association has called for criminal charges against him. A government adviser is interviewing more than 100 people who were in the hotel and intends to write a book on his findings.

Efforts to discredit Mr. Rusesabagina have taken some bizarre turns: His detractors used criticism from a supposed U.S. journalist who turned out to be a 12-year-old Arizona boy. Mr. Rusesabagina says an attempt was made on his life on a highway in Belgium and that agents of the Rwandan government tried to disrupt a speech he made recently at a school in Ohio.

"I never expected to be in the public as I am," says the 52-year-old Mr. Rusesabagina, who has declined invitations to return to Rwanda because he fears for his life. In his travels to speaking engagements in the U.S., he rides with police escorts.

Twelve years after genocide orchestrated by a Rwandan government led by the majority Hutus killed more than 800,000 minority Tutsis and some moderate Hutus in just 100 days, tensions in Rwanda are rising again -- this time over the writing of history. Once again, Mr. Rusesabagina finds himself at the center of it.

Mr. Rusesabagina's case comes as anti-French protests sprang up in the capital Kigali in recent days, after a judge in France charged associates of President Paul Kagame with downing the presidential plane in 1994. The event set the genocide in motion. In response to the judge's action, Rwanda last month severed diplomatic relations with France. President Kagame, the Tutsi military leader whose rebel forces ended the genocide, says radical Hutus shot down the plane.

France supported the Hutu government in the civil war with the Tutsis, but France denies any involvement in the genocide.

Mr. Rusesabagina's father was Hutu, his mother Tutsi. By Rwandan custom, that made him a Hutu. He worked his way up from receptionist at the Hotel des Mille Collines, the meeting place for the country's elite here in Kigali. He later became manager of a sister hotel up the road.

After the bloodshed began on April 6, 1994, he was asked to oversee both hotels. Over the next two months, the Mille Collines became a sanctuary for Tutsis and some moderate Hutus, including prominent politicians and a handful of United Nations personnel. The Mille Collines was one of the few gathering places where nobody was killed. The film depicts Mr. Rusesabagina saving the refugees by plying the militants with bribes, including fine alcohol, and by calling on his extensive network of contacts.

Mr. Rusesabagina subsequently moved with his family to Brussels, where he was driving a taxi when his life took another turn.

In 1999, Keir Pearson, fresh out of New York University film school, heard about what happened at the hotel from a friend living in Tanzania and got in touch with Mr. Rusesabagina. He thought the story was so compelling that he turned it into a screenplay. The film, directed by Terry George, won several film prizes and three Academy Award nominations.

In May 2005, Mr. George watched the movie in Rwanda with most of the Rwandan parliament and President Kagame. The president thanked Mr. George for making the world aware at last of what had happened in the country, Mr. George says.

Then, in the fall of 2005, as Mr. Rusesabagina's fame grew in the U.S., he began criticizing the Rwandan government for limiting political opposition, controlling the media and having only a few token Hutus in cabinet positions.

Around that time, the attacks against him began. Rwanda's New Times newspaper called him, among other things, a "dirty political animal." After Mr. Rusesabagina was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom in November 2005, an editorial declared he had "sold the soul of the Rwandan genocide to amass medals."

DOJ_NMG_0102349

At a public ceremony in Rwanda last February, Mr. Kagame weighed in, saying, "Film stars have no place on the list of our national heroes." During a visit to Washington in June, Mr. Kagame dismissed Mr. Rusesabagina as someone who just happened to be in the hotel at the time. "Someone is trying to rewrite the history of Rwanda, and we cannot accept it," he said.

Mr. Rusesabagina was beginning to get scared. He says that in Belgium at about that time, a car driven by several Africans tried to run his car into a truck. He escaped with minor bruises and cuts, he says.

To buttress its condemnation of Mr. Rusesabagina, the New Times in one article quoted someone identified as an American reporter named Richard Cesare saying, "None of his actions made him a hero even in the eyes of Americans." Mr. Cesare later in the article dismissed the Medal of Freedom as no big deal.

It turns out Mr. Cesare is, in fact, a 12-year-old from Sahuarita, Ariz., who had contacted the New Times for help with a history paper he was writing on Mr. Rusesabagina.

"We were laughing so hard when we saw this article," says Lea Cesare, Richard's mother. "He was just a kid doing a homework assignment." Ms. Cesare says her son was in contact for months with several reporters and editors at the New Times who were well aware of his age. The New Times did not respond to requests for comment.

In an interview in his Kigali office, President Kagame said his concern is to set the record straight. He said he believes the hotel was spared, in part, because Hutu militants wanted to use the refugees there to exchange for hostages held by the Tutsi rebel forces. He says he also believes Mr. Rusesabagina is being used by "subterranean forces trying to pull back what we are trying to move forward."

One evening recently after speaking to about 150 college students in Providence, R.I., Mr. Rusesabagina acknowledged the income from his new fame has allowed him to quit his other jobs and put two of his children in private schools in Massachusetts.

He said he believes the attacks on him come from people worried that he will turn his celebrity into a credible opposition and run for president somewhere down the road. "I haven't made a decision yet," he said. "But you never know."

Cuba's Future Is Already Here (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Fiercely implacable exiles in Miami, perennially outfoxed bureaucrats in Washington and salivating real estate developers around the world have spent years trying to predict what will happen in Cuba the day after Fidel Castro dies. Now I think everyone knows the answer: nada.

That chuckling you hear is Fidel, in his hospital room, having the last laugh.

The 80-year-old revolutionary icon, evidently at death's door, appears to have engineered a seamless transition to the post-Fidel era. Brother Ra?l presided over last week's 50th-anniversary shindig with none of Fidel's charisma but all of his authority. If any lingering doubts about the de facto succession needed to be dispelled, Havana's biggest military parade in years on Saturday reminded everyone that Ra?l has been running the Cuban armed forces since Day One.

Fidel's absence from the festivities marking the 50th anniversary of the Cuban revolution pretty much ended any uncertainty about his health. Government officials say he's recovering like a champ and will be back on the job any day, and they sound so sincerely optimistic that you could almost look past the images of a gaunt, frail old man that were released a few weeks ago. But I doubt that anything except the looming hand of death could have kept Fidel Castro away from a cheering, flag-waving crowd of millions -- Fidel's people, filling the vast plaza named for Fidel's revolution, hoping for a last glimpse of the only leader most Cubans have ever known.

We have to assume that Fidel is not long for this world. We also have to assume that a day, a month or even a year after he dies, Cuba will be essentially unaltered.

A year isn't forever, and some kind of change will eventually come. But the Bush administration has been even more idiotic than its predecessors in its policies toward Cuba, which means that the United States is perfectly positioned to have little or no influence over what kind of Cuba finally evolves.

About all this administration can do is make things worse. Julia E. Sweig of the Council on Foreign Relations, a leading Cuba expert, writes in the current issue of the journal Foreign Affairs that by "continuing the current course and making threats about what kind of change is and is not acceptable after Fidel, Washington will only slow the pace of liberalization and political reform in Cuba and guarantee many more years of hostility between the two countries."

In the article, Sweig points out what any visitor to Cuba who is not wearing ideological blinkers quickly realizes: that the Cuban government's hold on power does not derive from repression alone. In my visits to the island, I've been struck by how Cubans can be bitterly critical of the hard-line restrictions the regime imposes on speech, assembly, movement, commerce and other activities, and in the next breath speak with pride of the government's achievements in providing free health care and education.

In Washington and Miami, the prediction was that when the Soviet Union and the East Bloc dissolved, Fidel Castro's regime would soon follow. But Ra?l Castro and a group of pragmatic-minded young officials -- basically, the people who are running the country now -- opened the spigot and allowed just enough economic reform to keep the place going. Now, with Ra?l's armed forces functioning essentially as the island's biggest business conglomerate, and with Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez shipping his mentor Fidel all the oil he needs, the government seems increasingly secure.

That security hardly looks permanent. Many Cubans are indeed restless for change. There are focal points around which a kind of civil society has started to coalesce -- the black-market economy, the Catholic Church, the Afro-Cuban faiths, the arts -- and the government has had little success in co-opting these independent movements.

Ra?l Castro is 75, so his time in the driver's seat will be brief. Maybe he will try to move Cuba toward the Chinese model of continued one-party rule in exchange for free-market liberalization of the economy -- something Fidel would never abide. Lacking his older brother's presence and oratorical skills, maybe Ra?l will have to be oppressively heavy-handed in using the army he built to maintain order.

For now, though, the Cuban regime has accomplished something that the Bush administration had pledged to thwart: an uneventful transition that leaves the Cuban Communist Party still comfortably in charge. The handover of power took place in August, when Fidel's illness was announced and power was transferred "temporarily" to Ra?l and other party leaders.

Fidel's revolution won't survive forever -- the tide of history is flowing in the opposite direction. But surely it will survive the old man's death.

Islam Gets Concessions; Infidels Get Conquered (LAT)

By Raymond Ibrahim, Raymond Ibrahim Is A Research Librarian At The Library Of Congress. His Book, "The Al Qaeda Reader,"

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

What they capture, they keep. When they lose, they complain to the U.N.

IN THE DAYS before Pope Benedict XVI's visit last Thursday to the Hagia Sophia complex in Istanbul, Muslims and Turks expressed fear, apprehension and rage. "The risk," according to Turkey's independent newspaper Vatan, "is that Benedict will send Turkey's Muslims and much of the Islamic world into paroxysms of fury if there is any perception that the pope is trying to re-appropriate a Christian center that fell to Muslims." Apparently making the sign of the cross or any other gesture of Christian worship in Hagia Sophia constitutes such a sacrilege.

Built in the 6th century, Hagia Sophia — Greek for "Holy Wisdom" — was Christendom's greatest and most celebrated church. After parrying centuries of jihadi thrusts from Arabs, Constantinople — now Istanbul — was finally sacked by Turks in 1453, and Hagia Sophia's crosses were desecrated, its icons defaced. Along with thousands of other churches in the Byzantine Empire, it was immediately converted into a mosque, the tall minarets of Islam surrounding it in triumph. Nearly 500 years later, in 1935, as part of reformer Kemal Ataturk's drive to modernize Turkey, Hagia Sophia was secularized and transformed into a museum.

Protests aimed at keeping the pope out of Hagia Sophia rocked Istanbul right up to the morning of his visit to the site. Contrast that intolerance with the tolerance granted Muslims in regard to the Al Aqsa mosque — this time, an Islamic site in Jerusalem annexed by Judaism. Unlike the permanent Muslim desecration of Hagia Sophia, after Israel's victory in the 1967 war, the Jews did not deface or convert the mosque into a Jewish synagogue or temple, even though the Al Aqsa mosque is deliberately built atop the remains of the Temple Mount, the holiest site of Judaism and, by extension, an important site for Christians. Moreover, since reclaiming the Temple Mount, Israel has granted Muslims control over the Al Aqsa mosque (except during times of crises).

All this illustrates the privileged status that many Muslims expect in the international arena. When Muslims conquer non-Muslim territories — such as Constantinople, not to mention all of North Africa, Spain and southwest Asia — those whom they have conquered as well as their descendants are not to expect any apologies, let alone political or territorial concessions.

Herein lies the conundrum. When Islamists wage jihad — past, present and future — conquering and consolidating non-Muslim territories and centers in the name of Islam, never once considering to cede them back to their previous owners, they ultimately demonstrate that they live by the age-old adage "might makes right." That's fine; many people agree with this Hobbesian view.

But if we live in a world where the strong rule and the weak submit, why is it that whenever Muslim regions are conquered, such as in the case of Palestine, the same Islamists who would never concede one inch of Islam's conquests resort to the United Nations and the court of public opinion, demanding justice, restitutions, rights and so forth?

Put another way, when Muslims beat infidels, it's just too bad for the latter; they must submit to their new overlords' rules with all the attendant discrimination and humiliation mandated for non-Muslims. Yet when Islam is beaten, demands for apologies and concessions are expected from the infidel world at large.

Double standards do not make for international justice. Either territorial conquests are always unjust and should therefore be ameliorated through concessions, or else they are merely a manifestation of the natural order of things — that is, survival of the fittest.

If some Muslims wish to wage eternal jihad until Islam dominates the globe, they are only being true to Islam and its doctrines as they understand it. However, in that case, where the world is divided into two warring camps, Islam and Infidelity — or, in Islamic terms, the Abode of Islam and the Abode of War — how can these Muslims expect any concessions from the international community? The natural conclusion of the view that "might makes right" is "to the victor go the spoils."

The fact that Turkey conquered Constantinople more than 500 years ago does not prevent the Turkish government from returning Hagia Sophia to Christendom today, which would undoubtedly be a great gesture. But of course that can never be. The Muslim world would undergo a "paroxysm of fury" if a Christian pope dares pray in the conquered church; what would the Muslim world do if Hagia Sophia were actually converted back to a church?

But perhaps Muslims cannot be blamed for expecting special treatment, as well as believing that jihad is righteous and decreed by the Almighty. The West constantly goes out of its way to confirm such convictions. By criticizing itself, apologizing and offering concessions — all things the Islamic world has yet to do — the West reaffirms that Islam has a privileged status in the world.

And what did the pope do in his controversial visit to Hagia Sophia? He refrained from any gesture that could be misconstrued as Christian worship and merely took in the sights of the museum. Moreover, when he was invited into the Blue Mosque nearby, he respectfully took off his shoes and prayed, eyes downcast, standing next to the the grand mufti of Istanbul like a true dhimmi — a subdued non-Muslim living under Islamic law and acknowledging Islamic superiority.

And therein is the final lesson. Muslims' zeal for their holy places and lands is not intrinsically blameworthy. Indeed, there's something to be said about being passionate and protective of one's own. Here the secular West — Christendom's prodigal son and true usurper — can learn something from Islam. For whenever and wherever the West concedes ideologically, politically and especially spiritually, Islam will be sure to conquer. If might does not make right, zeal apparently does.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Justice Department Says Secrecy Needs Bar ACLU Surveillance Suit (AP)

By DAVID N. GOODMAN
AP, December 5, 2006

DETROIT - The Bush administration asked a federal appeals court Monday to toss out a lawsuit challenging a warrantless surveillance program, saying the government can't defend itself without revealing national secrets.

The American Civil Liberties Union sued the National Security Agency in January on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say the surveillance has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets.

"This suit must be dismissed because its very subject matter is a state secret, and litigation would inevitably result in disclosing state secrets," Justice Department lawyers wrote in a brief filed Monday.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled in August that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers.

The Justice Department appealed to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati, which ruled that the administration could keep the program in place during the appeal.

The Bush administration secretly launched the surveillance program in 2001. It monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links.

A secret court was established in the late 1970s to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the Justice Department said it can't always wait for the court to act.

The president and his advisers "have determined that the current threat to the United States demands that signals intelligence be carried out with a speed and methodology that cannot be achieved by seeking judicial approval" through traditional channels, Monday's brief said.

The journalists and other plaintiffs lack standing to sue because secrecy considerations mean that "they cannot show, and the government cannot dispute, that the government has intercepted or likely will intercept their communications," the government brief said.

In a brief filed Nov. 14, the ACLU said that the Bush administration's "sweeping theory of executive power would allow the president to violate any law passed by Congress."

"This theory presents a profound threat to our democratic system," it said.

The 6th Circuit Court of Appeals has set a Dec. 18 deadline for other interested groups to file their own briefs in the case.

Padilla Lawyers Claim Images Cause For Throwing Case Out (MH)

By Jay Weaver
The Miami Herald, December 5, 2006

Providing a rare glimpse of a locked-up "enemy combatant," attorneys for South Florida terror suspect Jose Padilla released declassified images of him in chains and a mask to bolster their bid to have his Miami case thrown out because of alleged mistreatment during military detention for more than three years.

The still video images show Padilla wearing blacked-out goggles, noise-blocking headphones, and shackles on his hands and feet. Dressed in an orange prison-like jumpsuit, he is being led out of his cell by three guards dressed in camouflage, riot helmets and visors at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C.

The first disclosed images of his military detention were filed on Friday along with a psychiatrist's sworn statement in Miami federal court to counter the U.S. government's contention that Padilla was treated humanely before his transfer here last January to face terror charges.

"Mr. Padilla asserts that he was not treated humanely, but instead was tortured and that the government's conduct was outrageous," one of Padilla's attorneys, Orlando do Campo, wrote in a court filing. He added that the treatment "has left him damaged, both mentally and physically" -- leaving him unable to assist his legal team.

Padilla, 36, and two other Muslim men, Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi, are charged with conspiring to support terrorist activities overseas.

The trio face trial on Jan. 22, though the proceeding is likely to be delayed because the U.S. government has appealed a judge's dismissal of one count in the Miami indictment. The high-profile case is built largely on classified wiretaps of defendants' communications between 1993 and 2001, when Padilla lived in Broward County and traveled to the Middle East as a recruit for a suspected North American terror cell.

THE JUDGE'S DECISION

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke must decide whether to toss out the indictment based on the defense team's allegation that Padilla's constitutional rights were violated by the military during his detention as an enemy combatant.

Carl Tobias, a constitutional scholar at the University of Richmond School of Law in Virginia who has followed Padilla's legal odyssey, said his attorneys' bid is a long shot.

But he said the photo of Padilla in chains and a mask, published on the front page of The New York Times on Monday, ``makes an impression on people. Whether it has the same impression on the judge is another matter. It's hard to know."

Padilla had been in the Middle East allegedly training with the al Qaeda terrorist group before his arrest by the FBI in the United States on May 8, 2002.

He was designated an enemy combatant without being formally charged, though the Bush administration accused him of plotting to detonate a radiological "dirty bomb" on U.S. soil and to blow up apartment buildings in various cities.

After President Bush dropped that designation a year ago to avoid a Supreme Court confrontation, Padilla was transferred to the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami to face the terror-support charges. They are unrelated to the earlier accusations.

Padilla initially made his allegations in October.

CLAIMS OF TORTURE

In court papers, Padilla asserted he was isolated in a tiny cell around the clock, deprived of sleep on a steel bunk with no mattress, shackled and manacled for hours on end, and threatened with being cut with a knife and having alcohol poured on the wounds. He also alleged he was given drugs against his will -- believed to be LSD or PCP -- to act as a sort of truth serum during his interrogations.

But he had provided no evidence until his latest court filing on Friday.

It includes not only the images, taken from a declassified Defense Department video, but also an affidavit by psychiatrist Angela Hegarty. She evaluated Padilla several times last summer and concluded he cannot help his defense because of psychiatric harm he allegedly suffered during detention and interrogation at the Navy brig.

THE GOVERNMENT'S SIDE

Federal prosecutors insist that Padilla was treated humanely in the Navy brig.

"Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security," assistant U.S. Attorney Russell Killinger and other prosecutors said. ``His basic needs were met in a conscientious manner."

That included halal food, some outdoor exercise and medical attention when necessary.

Prosecutors also said Padilla never made any abuse claims while in custody: ``Padilla's allegations of torture have no merit whatsoever."

Attorneys: Images Show Harsh U.S. Treatment Of Padilla, Shows Him In Chains, Headphones (FINDLAW/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 5, 2006

(AP) - MIAMI-Still video images of alleged terror operative Jose Padilla in chains and wearing headphones and blacked-out goggles demonstrate the harsh tactics used by U.S. interrogators while he was in military custody as an "enemy combatant," his lawyers said in court papers.

The images, taken from an unclassified Defense Department video, show Padilla being chained hand and foot and led out of his cell by three guards dressed in camouflage and wearing riot helmets and visors. The video images are the first publicly released of Padilla's 3 1/2-year detention at a Navy brig in Charleston, South Carolina.

They were filed late Friday in federal court in Miami as part of an attempt by Padilla's lawyers to get criminal terrorism support charges against him dismissed, based on what they claim was treatment that amounted to torture while in military custody.

"The extended torture visited upon Mr. Padilla has left him damaged, both mentally and physically," Padilla lawyer Orlando do Campo said in one court filing. "The government's treatment of Mr. Padilla has robbed him of his personhood."

Existence of the filing containing the video images was first reported Monday by The New York Times. The court papers do not give details about the actual video, but The Times reported that it was made as Padilla was being taken out of his cell for dental work.

Several of his lawyers did not return e-mail and phone messages left Monday by The Associated Press. A spokeswoman for Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta declined comment Monday.

Padilla claims, among other things, that he was forced to stand in painful stress positions, given LSD or some other drug as a "truth serum," subjected to loud noises and noxious odors and forced to endure sleep deprivation, extreme heat and cold, and harsh lights.

The new court papers include a affidavit from Dr. Angela Hegarty, a New York psychiatrist who has met with Padilla for 22 hours over several days this year. Hegarty said Padilla appears to suffer from post-traumatic stress syndrome and is unable to adequately help prepare his legal defense.

"When approached by his attorneys, he begs them, 'please, please, please' not to have to discuss his case," Hegarty wrote. "He refuses to watch the videos of his interrogation and he refuses to answer questions pertaining to aspects of the evidence in his case."

One of Padilla's attorneys, Andrew Patel, said in court papers his client fears being returned to the Navy brig if he discusses what happened there and that "he often exhibits facial tics, unusual eye movements and contortions of his body" when the subject of his detention comes up.

"Mr. Padilla remains unsure if I and the other attorneys working on his case are actually his attorney or another component of the government's interrogation scheme," said Patel, who has represented Padilla for four years.

Federal prosecutors and Pentagon officials have repeatedly denied that Padilla was tortured, contending in their own court filings that he was humanely treated and that the tactics used were for "safety and security" reasons.

A Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, said Monday that Padilla's claims of abuse are false and that shackles are used when necessary.

"Detainees are moved based on their threat. If they pose a threat to the individuals charged with transporting them, clearly appropriate measures must be taken to protect the guards and any other personnel involved," Gordon said.

Padilla, a 36-year-old former Chicago gang member, was declared an enemy combatant by President George W. Bush in June 2002, shortly after he was arrested upon arrival at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. U.S. authorities initially claimed he was on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a U.S. city.

Amid an intense legal battle over Bush's wartime detention powers, Padilla was transferred to civilian custody in January to face federal terrorism support charges along with two others in Miami. Trial on those charges, which do not mention the "dirty bomb" allegations, is currently scheduled to begin Jan. 22.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke has not yet scheduled a hearing on the torture claims.

Egypt Arrests American On Plot Charge (AP)

By Nadia Abou El-magd

AP, December 5, 2006

Police have arrested an American, 11 Europeans and several others from Arab countries for allegedly plotting terrorist attacks in Middle Eastern countries including Iraq, the Interior Ministry said Monday.

The group was part of an Islamic militant terror cell that had adopted extremist ideas and were living in Egypt under the guise of studying Arabic and Islamic studies, the ministry said in a statement.

Along with the American, police arrested two Belgians, nine French and several others from Egypt and other Arab countries including Tunisia and Syria, the statement said.

The ministry did not provide names or say how many Egyptians and Arabs were arrested.

"Investigations have confirmed that those elements are related to some terrorist organizations abroad," the ministry said. "They were seeking to recruit others, teach them destructive beliefs, urging them for jihad, traveling to Iraq to carry out operations via other countries in the region."

In Washington, the State Department confirmed an American had been arrested in Egypt about a week ago but could not provide any details.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said American officials were "seeking consular access to this individual" but declined to give more information, citing U.S. privacy laws.

DOJ_NMG_0102358

A government official in Brussels also confirmed that the two Belgians were arrested and said they were Belgian citizens of Moroccan origin. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the press.

"It seems they had sympathies with fundamentalist, Islamist circles," the official said. "There is no evidence that they perpetrated any violent act, and we expect them to be expelled from Egypt soon."

A spokesman for France's Foreign Ministry said several French citizens had been arrested in Egypt but said he could not immediately provide further details.

Egyptian authorities made the arrests about a week ago, and some had been studying at Al-Azhar University, Sunni Islam's most important seat of learning, police officials said. They spoke on condition on anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to the media. It was not immediately clear if all the arrests took place in Cairo or elsewhere in Egypt.

All of the arrested were in jail pending further investigation, the ministry said.

Egypt has witnessed a string of suicide terror attacks in recent years at Sinai Peninsula tourist resorts.

Last week, an Egyptian state security court condemned to death three Islamic militants convicted of taking part in suicide attacks that killed 34 people in 2004 in the Sinai resort of town of Taba.

The three belonged to the militant group Tawhid and Jihad, which Egyptian security officials and prosecutors accuse of carrying out two other bombings against Sinai resorts that killed another 87 people — Sharm el-Sheik in July 2005 and Dahab in April.

In February, three British Muslims were released from an Egyptian prison after spending nearly three years in custody for allegedly belonging to a banned Islamic group. The three accused Egyptian authorities of torturing them during their captivity, but the government denied the allegations.

Egypt operates under emergency laws, which gives the government wide powers to detain suspects without charging them. The laws have been in place since the assassination of President Anwar Sadat in 1981 despite a growing chorus of opposition from both inside and outside the country.

Egypt Detains American In Terrorist Cell Case (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

BERLIN, Dec. 4 -- Egyptian authorities said Monday that they had arrested an American and nearly a dozen Europeans after breaking up an international terrorist cell that was recruiting operatives to go to Iraq.

The Egyptian Interior Ministry said the cell was "related to some terrorist organizations abroad" but did not name the network or those arrested. The official Egyptian news agency MENA reported that the suspects included nine French citizens and two Belgians, as well as two Syrians, a Tunisian woman and an undisclosed number of Egyptians.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said U.S. officials knew the identity of the American and were "seeking consular access to this individual." He said the U.S. suspect was arrested Nov. 26 but declined to name the person, citing federal privacy laws.

A U.S. law enforcement official said the U.S. citizen "was not on our radar at all" before his arrest in Egypt and is not named on the government's voluminous terrorism watch list.

"He was not a known figure to the U.S.," the official said. "There's no record of him in the sense that he would have been a person of concern."

A handful of U.S. citizens have faced charges of engaging in terrorism overseas since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Adam Gadahn, a California native who is believed to be in Pakistan, was indicted in October on a charge of treason based on his alleged appearance in numerous al-Qaeda videotapes calling for the death of Americans and for attacks on U.S. targets.

Jose Padilla, a former Chicago gang member, stands accused of traveling to the Middle East for military training and joining a North American terrorist cell, although a federal judge in Miami dismissed a charge of murder conspiracy, the most serious count he faced.

John Walker Lindh, a Californian, was sentenced to 20 years after pleading guilty to providing services to the Taliban in Afghanistan and to carrying explosives during a felony. All three men are Muslim converts.

Egyptian officials said the cell members arrested there recently were operating in Cairo and Alexandria while masquerading as religious students, but released few other details.

"They were seeking to recruit others, teach them destructive beliefs, urging them for jihad and traveling to Iraq to carry out operations via other countries in the region," the Interior Ministry said in a statement announcing the arrests.

Police began to break up the cell in mid-November but continued making arrests for several days, according to Arab and European media reports. The French newspaper Liberation reported that four other French nationals were arrested on similar charges in Egypt in 2005 and were later deported.

Egyptian investigators did not say whether there was a connection between the European suspects and another local cell blamed for killing more than 100 people in three separate suicide attacks on the Sinai Peninsula since 2004.

On Thursday, three Muslim radicals were sentenced to death by an Egyptian court for their involvement in one of those attacks, the October 2004 bombing that killed 34 people in the Red Sea resort of Taba popular with Israeli tourists.

On Sunday, three days after the verdict, Israeli counterterrorism officials issued a warning that other attacks were being planned at Egyptian resorts along the Red Sea.

In India, a judge on Monday convicted six men of involvement in the 1993 bombings that killed 257 people in Mumbai, delivering the last verdicts for 123 defendants charged in India's worst terrorist attack.

The convictions brought to 100 the number of people convicted; 23 were acquitted. Sentences will be imposed early next year.

"This is a historic case. Never before in Indian history have 100 people been convicted in a single case," public prosecutor Ujjwal Nikam told reporters.

American Arrested In Terrorism Probe (WT/AP)

CAIRO -- Police have arrested an American, 11 Europeans and several others from Arab countries on accusations that they were plotting terrorist attacks in Middle Eastern countries including Iraq, the Interior Ministry said yesterday.

Lawyers Demand Release Of Chinese Muslims (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102360

Attorneys for a group of Chinese Muslims held for nearly five years in the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, filed suit yesterday, asking that the men be released immediately and alleging that they have been held as part of a political deal between the United States and China.

Citing new laws that allow detainees to challenge their status as "enemy combatants," the lawyers argue that their seven clients -- ethnic Uighurs (pronounced wee-gurs) -- have never taken up arms against the United States or its allies. They contend that the men have been labeled wrongfully as terrorist suspects because they oppose the Communist Chinese government.

In a 58-page filing at the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the lawyers argue that the Uighurs have been held since early 2002 as a way to win Chinese acquiescence for the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

The lawyers -- Sabin Willett and Susan Baker Manning -- allege in the court documents that their clients' detention was one of several demands the Chinese government solicited in mid-2002 as the United States was seeking global support for toppling Saddam Hussein.

U.S. officials labeled the East Turkistan Islamic Movement (ETIM) -- a group that includes Uighur separatists who want their own nation in western China -- a terrorist organization in August 2002 after diplomatic discussions with China about Iraq, the lawyers allege.

"In the crisis atmosphere of the time, the interests of a few dozen refugees paled beside the urgency of the Administration's war plans," the lawsuit said. "The Iraq deal sealed the fate of the seven petitioners here. More than four years have passed. Long-discarded pawns in a diplomatic match between superpowers, petitioners today remain illegally imprisoned at Guantanamo."

Former State Department officials acknowledged in interviews that they negotiated with China about placing ETIM and another group on a list of known terrorist organizations, and that ETIM was added after intelligence reports indicated the group had killed innocent people. The officials said, however, that labeling the group as terrorists had no effect on Uighurs already in U.S. custody, who were believed to be cooperating with the Taliban and al-Qaeda near Tora Bora, Afghanistan.

Then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage met with Chinese officials in Beijing in late August 2002 and discussed the Iraq situation with them. He said at the time that ETIM was placed on the foreign terrorist list after months of discussions with China. He also said he made clear that China needed to respect the minority Uighur population.

"They had been after us to put ETIM on the list," Armitage said in a recent interview. He said the decision did not have anything to do with winning China's tacit approval on the Iraq invasion. "But at the time, we didn't know when we were going to invade Iraq. It was done in response to information gathered by the intelligence group."

The Uighurs have been a diplomatic headache for the United States. U.S. officials working to negotiate the release of five other Uighurs held at Guantanamo who were determined not to be a threat to U.S. interests refused to return them to China out of concern they could be tortured or killed. More than two dozen countries declined requests to take them in, and the United States has been unwilling to allow them to come here.

Earlier this year, those five Uighurs were released to a U.N. compound in Albania, where they remain virtual prisoners.

Pierre-Richard Prosper, who formerly led U.S. negotiations with other countries over Guantanamo detainees, said that China wanted custody of the Uighurs but that the United States staved off Beijing because of human rights concerns. "We tried for many months to reach an understanding with China regarding the fate of the Uighurs and were unable to do so," he said.

More than a dozen Uighurs are still in Guantanamo. U.S. officials have determined them to be enemy combatants because of their participation in an alleged terrorist training camp in Afghanistan, which all fled when the United States started bombing the area after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The Uighurs have told military court officials they were not allied with the Taliban and are sympathetic to the United States, which they view as a liberator. They said they were living in a small community in Afghanistan after fleeing oppression in China.

According to military tribunal records and court filings, the men were lured to a mosque in Pakistan, where they were arrested and later turned over to Pakistani authorities. Willett said he believes the men were sold to the United States for sizable bounties and were sent to Guantanamo along with many other detainees captured there.

The lawyers challenge the way the Uighurs were determined to be enemy combatants, arguing that their encampment in Afghanistan did not make them a party to hostilities. The Uighurs have said the United States allowed a Chinese delegation to visit and interrogate them after their capture, and that the Chinese threatened them. A U.S. official confirmed that the Chinese were allowed to question the Uighurs.

"It is amazing to me that the U.S. has agreed to, in effect, hold political prisoners for China in exchange for anything," Manning said. "That goes against everything that we, I thought, stood for in this country."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Smuggling, Theft, Bribery At Agency (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Aside from patrolling the nation's borders and guarding against terrorism, the Department of Homeland Security also is battling fraud, theft, bribery, smuggling and other crimes by American citizens — with some of the most disturbing examples coming from the sprawling agency's own employees.

A semiannual report filed to Congress by the department's inspector general showed a sharp jump in arrests in the six months ended Sept. 30, with many stemming from schemes by members of the public to bilk the agency of emergency relief funds in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

But the report, released this week, also highlights a litany of staff misconduct: immigration officials demanding sex in exchange for visas, airport screeners stealing money from tourists' luggage, federal air marshals smuggling drugs, and employees from various DHS agencies committing sex crimes — including indecent exposure and distributing child pornography.

The array of staff transgressions tucked into the report reflects the continued growing pains of an agency that was formed only three years ago, and the pressures created as parts of the department have rapidly expanded, critics say.

Clark Kent Ervin, a former DHS inspector general, said the Transportation Security Administration rushed to hire screeners and air marshals in 2003 without running background checks on the applicants.

"Knowing DHS dysfunction and disingenuousness, it wouldn't surprise me if DHS doesn't fully vet employees for criminal backgrounds before hiring them or periodically recheck them," Ervin said.

Russ Knocke, press secretary for DHS, would not comment on the agency's policy on background checks but dismissed Ervin's criticism as "pure speculation" and "without merit."

Knocke said the problems were due mainly to a few individuals.

"No law enforcement agency of any government in the world is going to be immune to inappropriate behavior on the part of its employees, particularly one that is as large as we are," Knocke said. "… There's no tolerance for unethical behavior at this department and we use every authority to confront it."

Investigations by the inspector general's office triggered 321 arrests and 243 convictions in the six-month period. The report filed for the previous six months documented 200 arrests; six months earlier, there were 54.

The report did not provide a breakdown of how many cases involved DHS staff, but they came from all parts of the department.

Two TSA screeners were caught pilfering jewelry from luggage, while another was found smuggling more than $80,000 in an attempt to avoid reporting income brought into the country. Another team of four screeners targeted Japanese tourists until one was caught stealing up to $1,800 from checked luggage.

Many of the offenses involved getting contraband past barriers. Two federal air marshals were snared by a DHS and FBI investigation that found the marshals had sought and accepted a bribe to shepherd 15 kilograms of cocaine through airports. Two guards at an Immigration and Customs Enforcement prison sold alcohol and cigarettes to the illegal immigrants in their custody.

The agency's defenders said that in a department of more than 180,000 people, the number getting into trouble is relatively insignificant and that the arrests show the department's oversight is improving.

The inspector general's reports can be found online at http://www.dhs.gov/xoig/rpts/semiannl/editorial_0330.shtm .

U.S. Nuclear Labs Working On Weapons Safeguards (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian, Times Staff Writer

Los Angeles Times, December 4, 2006

LIVERMORE, Calif. -- In response to a secret order from President Bush, U.S. nuclear weapons laboratories are developing technology to make the weapons virtually impossible to use if they fall into the wrong hands.

The security system will be part of a new generation of nuclear weapons approved formally last week by a panel of the Defense and Energy departments.

A nuclear bomb equipped with the safeguards theoretically could be left on the street and terrorists would be unable, even given months of tinkering, to set off a detonation. Scientists say they are working on technology that would destroy every component inside -- including the plutonium and uranium -- if anyone even tampered with it.

But the 3-year-old effort, known as National Security Presidential Directive 28, has evoked strong criticism from many nuclear weapons experts, who doubt that absolute safeguards are necessary or even possible. Instead, they say, the federal government should plug known security weaknesses at bomb labs and nuclear weapons factories.

The nation's stockpile of 6,000 nuclear warheads is located on missiles and in military depots in places as disparate as Texas, North Dakota and Europe. They all have electronic locks or other safeguards, known as use controls.

But the new plan aims for a dramatic improvement.

The big leap would involve the self-destruction of the weapon without dispersing radioactivity or causing an explosion. The system would be able to destroy the electronic and mechanical components, rendering the plutonium and uranium materials unusable for construction of a crude improvised device.

How? That's secret. But one possible approach is that the bomb would contain a powerful acid or other chemical that would poison the uranium and plutonium. The resulting sludge theoretically could be reprocessed, but that would require transportation to a highly specialized chemical-processing factory.

And, the thinking goes, if terrorists had access to such a factory, they probably wouldn't need to steal a bomb.

The nation's two nuclear weapons laboratories -- Lawrence Livermore in California and Los Alamos in New Mexico -- are competing to design the new generation of bombs, known as the reliable replacement warhead. A winner of the competition could be selected by the Nuclear Weapons Council, a panel of top Defense and Energy officials, as soon as this week.

"It is essential that we make sure our weapons are impossible for terrorists to use," said Bruce Goodwin, chief of nuclear weapons design at Livermore. The weapons produced during the Cold War, he said, were not designed for an Age of Terrorism.

"There was no motivation for the Red Army to send in a suicide squad to steal an American weapon," Goodwin said. "They had plenty of their own. There is tremendous incentive to certain people who don't have nuclear weapons to terrorize this nation by stealing one."

Before Sept. 11, security experts had not considered the prospect of a nuclear weapons scientist leading a suicide squad that would seize and detonate a U.S. nuclear weapon.

But critics say the risk of a terrorist seizing a U.S. bomb is the least likely form of nuclear terrorism. A more probable scenario, they say, is the theft of highly enriched uranium or plutonium that could be fashioned into a crude nuclear device or the smuggling of a complete nuclear bomb into the U.S.

"The real threat is the uranium and plutonium materials that are spread across the country in totally inappropriate places and inadequate facilities," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a Washington, D.C., group that has long criticized the Energy Department for lax security.

"So, rather than fixing the problem they have, they are trying to fix a problem they don't have."

Although a U.S. nuclear weapon never has been stolen, the U.S. accidentally has lost custody of some. Bombs were dropped or destroyed in a 1961 accident in Goldsboro, N.C.; a 1966 accident in Palomares, Spain; a 1968 accident in Thule, Greenland; and a 1980 accident in Damascus, Ark. Those were recovered, but others have been lost at sea.

Philip Coyle, a former deputy director of the Livermore lab, worries that even the best U.S. technology might not be truly tamper-proof.

"They make it sound like you could leave a nuclear weapon on the streets of Baghdad and nobody would know what to do with it," Coyle said. "I don't think that is quite the case. People can reverse-engineer many things."

Another key concern comes from the military, which has worried about putting locks on weapons. The fear is that malfunctioning use controls could prevent the authorized use of a nuclear weapon.

"The argument against doing more and more of the use controls is that you lose confidence in the weapon," said David Mosher, a nuclear weapons expert at Rand Corp. Such technical concerns could lead the military to ask for a resumption of underground nuclear testing, he said.

But weapons scientists inside the labs say their goal of "absolute surety" is not only the right policy but is clearly achievable.

"We know how to do it," Goodwin said.

Registered Traveller Program Set To Go Beyond One Airport (NYT)

By Joe Sharkey

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

READY or not — and some critics say not — the long-delayed Registered Traveler program is moving forward, with the single existing operator planning a succession of openings soon at four airports, while a competitor says it is about to join in.

DOJ_NMG_0102363

Verified Identity Pass Inc., which began the first Registered Traveler program at Orlando International Airport in July 2005, is planning to open its second site, in Terminal 7 at Kennedy International Airport, with a target date of Dec. 19, said Steven Brill, the chief executive of the company, which markets its version of the expedited security program under the name Clear.

He said the company, which has more than 30,000 members at Orlando, is processing applications with the Transportation Security Administration for Kennedy and for San Jose, Calif.; Cincinnati; and Indianapolis.

"We have about 3,000 non-Orlando people signed up so far," he said. "We've been sort of keeping it quiet because we find it much easier to talk about it once the lanes are open."

Late last month, Mr. Brill's program received certification from the security administration to begin rolling out at other airports. Mr. Brill said then that he expected Clear to be operating in 12 to 20 airports within 12 months.

In all, over the last six months, more than two dozen airports have expressed interest in the program. Many are now talking with Mr. Brill and several competitors about if, when and how to proceed.

The Unisys Corporation said yesterday that it was planning soon to introduce its own version of Registered Traveler, first at Reno/Tahoe International Airport in Nevada, where the company has a contract to start operating once the security administration approves.

"We are very much in the game," said Lawrence J. Zmuda, a Unisys partner working with the Homeland Security Department and the security administration to develop the program. "We are going to be rolling this out at several locations in the spring of 2007."

The Registered Traveler program provides identity cards, which include not only data on place of birth and home address but also fingerprints and iris scans. Travelers who pay an annual fee after passing a federal background check can then go through expedited security in special lanes. Clear charges $99.95 a year, which includes a federal fee for the security clearances. Once the program expands, Registered Traveler identity cards will be interchangeable at various suppliers' lanes.

But what do you really get for the money besides a special lane? Critics of the program have questioned its customer service value and slow pace and have also asked whether it could open a security loophole for potential terrorists who are able to pass a background check.

The program's progress has been slower than anticipated, as the security administration carefully evaluates both the program itself and the various technologies it may employ to provide better benefits to members. In November 2005, Mr. Brill testified to Congress that once the government announced "a clear blueprint for benefits" to members, "we and our competitors would likely be rolled out at 30 to 40 of the 50 largest airports within six months."

Among other potential benefits that have been discussed are not having to remove shoes and coats, and not having to take laptops from their cases. The security administration continues to evaluate various technologies to address those issues, but so far hasn't approved any.

One system being evaluated was developed by GE Security in partnership with Mr. Brill's company. It uses explosives-detection technology to examine travelers' shoes as they step into the Clear kiosk where their biometric ID cards are verified.

Mr. Brill said that while the security administration has not yet given final approval for that system, it is in place for testing at Orlando and is being installed at Kennedy. And, he added, "We expect to be able to deploy at least the shoe scanner part as we open at each airport," including Kennedy when Clear starts operating there in two weeks.

Unisys already has contracts with most of the nation's airports to provide biometric-based security systems for workers in secure areas. .

"Shoes are everybody's No. 1 concern; laptops are No. 2 and outer garments are No. 3," said Mr. Brill, who predicted that technology dealing with laptops and coats would become available next year.

Mr. Zmuda said: "I think this is definitely going to be a decent business, one that's going to continually evolve, given that it is a security program as well as a customer service program." <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

DHS Plan For 'Virtual' Border Fence Still Has Gaps (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

A Bush administration plan to build a "virtual" fence along the Mexico border will cost $7.6 billion and be completed by 2011, but the government lacks clear benchmarks for success, according to a report to Congress by the Department of Homeland Security.

Confirming well-known problems along the Mexican border, DHS also reported that the United States had "effective control" over only 284 miles of its 1,993-mile southern frontier as of March, up from 241 miles in October 2005. The department set a goal of controlling 345 miles next year and the full border in five years. But it acknowledged not having "a wholly satisfactory methodology" of defining "control."

Lawmakers ordered DHS to submit a multi-year strategic plan for the Secure Border Initiative (SBI) and its virtual-fence system (SBInet), citing two failed border technology programs that have cost taxpayers $429 million since 1998. The department's inspector general warned last month that SBInet could cost as much as $30 billion, far more than the $2 billion initially projected by industry analysts, and suffers from vague objectives.

Despite a law authorizing a 700-mile physical fence on the Mexican border, the Congress and White House are pushing forward with SBInet, which would deploy a mix of fencing, vehicle barriers, sensors, cameras and other surveillance technology to create a virtual barrier along 6,000 miles of U.S. northern and southern borders.

SBInet will cost $1.2 billion this year and $7.6 billion through 2011 on the southern border alone, DHS reported. By comparison, DHS agencies expect to spend $40.7 billion for border security between 2008 and 2011.

The five-year target for operational control of the border is the latest offered by U.S. officials. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has predicted two years, three to five years, and most recently he has said control could be contingent on enactment of a guest-worker program, which could take up to six years to implement.

DHS also issued a new mission statement for SBI that emphasizes counterterrorism over immigration control. The program will promote strategies "that protect against and prevent terrorist attacks and other transnational crimes," DHS reported, while coordinating efforts to enforce immigration laws.

New Orleans Picks Professor To Lead Efforts On Rebuilding (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, December 4, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 4 — Amid continuing criticism that the city's recovery has lagged 15 months after Hurricane Katrina, Mayor C. Ray Nagin appointed an official on Monday to manage the rebuilding efforts.

Mr. Nagin's new "executive director for recovery management" is Edward J. Blakely, a former chairman of the department of city and regional planning at the University of California, Berkeley, who helped Oakland, Calif., recover from the earthquake of 1989 and the brush fire of 1991. He is now professor of urban planning at the University of Sydney in Australia.

"There are a lot of plans, and these plans have to be brought together under one umbrella," Dr. Blakely said Monday at a news conference.

Like other facets of New Orleans's tortuous comeback, the appointment of a "recovery czar" for the city has been pending for months. But at Monday's announcement, Dr. Blakely's precise responsibilities were not spelled out by Mr. Nagin, only that he would "coordinate and direct recovery efforts."

Mr. Nagin rejected a formal plan for the city's recovery months ago, because he considered it too politically divisive, as under the plan some neighborhoods were to receive greater attention than others.

Since then some parts of New Orleans have returned to life but many have not, particularly those most devastated by the poststorm flooding of September 2005. At least half the population remains displaced, block after block of houses are still vacant and gutted, downtown New Orleans is moribund, and some neighborhoods are reverting to green space.

Mr. Nagin, meanwhile, has made only intermittent pronouncements about the city's recovery, saying mostly that it should be guided by the citizens.

The mayor's hands-off approach — Mr. Nagin has said he believes New Orleans's recovery should be "market driven" — intensified calls for a competent manager to take charge. Monday's announcement drew a qualified welcome from some who have looked critically on the efforts to date.

"What will be significant will be when they actually itemize his responsibilities," said Rob Couhig, a lawyer here who ran unsuccessfully against Mr. Nagin in last spring's mayoral election, and who has been serving as an unpaid adviser to the mayor. "It's like a lot of things. You wish it happened earlier, but better today than tomorrow."

Under the loose, citizen-driven process sanctioned by the city, no single plan exists as yet for the recovery. Citizens continue to meet — they did so again this past Saturday, some linked by satellite feeds from Houston, Atlanta, Dallas and elsewhere — and exchange ideas for infrastructure renewal, for example, under municipal auspices.

Further meetings are planned, though it is unclear how much federal money will be available for whatever is eventually decided on, and there is evidence that citizens here are increasingly weary of the process, after more than a year of similar meetings.

Asked Monday why it had taken so long to name a recovery czar, Mr. Nagin responded: "I wanted to make sure we had some momentum and clarity. We now have that. We now have clarity in the planning process."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With Rival Of Iraqi Leader (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — President Bush met today with one of the most powerful Shiite leaders in Iraq — a political rival of Prime Minister Nouri Kamal al-Maliki — and urged him to "reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy."

The meeting with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, was part of an effort by the Bush administration to shore up the fragile Maliki government by reaching out to a wider circle of Iraqi politicians. The hourlong session in the Oval Office plunged Mr. Bush deep into the intricate web of ethnic Iraqi politics.

Speaking to reporters afterward, the president said he told Mr. Hakim that he was "not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq," although he said he was "proud of the courage of the Iraqi people." He also said he appreciated Mr. Hakim's commitment to the unity government, and his "strong position against the murder of innocent life."

Mr. Hakim, for his part, flatly rejected one of the recommendations that the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is expected to make this week: a call for an international conference or regional peace initiative.

"We believe that the Iraqi issue should be solved by the Iraqis with the help of friends everywhere," Mr. Hakim said, speaking through an interpreter. "But we reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue. We cannot bypass the political process."

Mr. Hakim, who wears the black turban of a descendant of the Prophet Muhammed, has close ties to Iran and is one of the most divisive Shiite politicians in Iraq. He remarked last week that if Iraq deteriorated into civil war, Sunni Arabs would be the "biggest losers" — a comment that was widely interpreted as a veiled threat to Sunnis. He is also the main Shiite leader pushing to partition the country into autonomous regions, a proposal that both Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki strongly oppose.

Today's meeting came as the White House is in the thick of re-evaluating its stance in Iraq. Mr. Bush met Mr. Maliki last week in Amman, Jordan. On Wednesday, the president will receive the recommendations of the independent Iraq Study Group, headed by James A. Baker III, the former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic congressman.

The Senate Armed Services Committee has asked Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton to testify about the report on Capitol Hill on Thursday morning. That same day, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain, perhaps Mr. Bush's closest ally on Iraq, will visit the White House. And next month, Mr. Bush will receive another Iraqi politician, Tariq al-Hashemi, the leader of the most powerful Sunni Arab party.

The Bush-Hakim visit is significant because Mr. Hakim is a fierce rival of Moktada al-Sadr, the radical anti-American Shiite cleric who has thrown his weight behind Mr. Maliki. The White House wants Mr. Maliki to lessen his dependence on Mr. Sadr; one way to advance that cause would be to bolster Mr. Hakim's ties with Mr. Maliki.

Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, outlined the strategy in a classified memo published by The New York Times last week. "Press Sunni and other Iraqi leaders (especially Hakim) to support Maliki," Mr. Hadley wrote, in a section outlining how the White House might drive a wedge between Mr. Maliki and Mr. Sadr.

By meeting with leaders other than Mr. Maliki, Mr. Bush runs the risk of undermining the Iraqi prime minister — whom he declared ''the right guy for Iraq" during their meeting in Amman — by seeming to hedge his bets with others who might claim power should the Maliki government fail.

In an interview with Brit Hume of Fox News, Mr. Bush said he raised that issue with Mr. Hakim today.

"I said, 'I just want you to understand, as you know, I met with the prime minister, the head of the government,' " Mr. Bush said. "And that I don't want the prime minister to construe that this meeting in any way doesn't support him, and he said, look, I understand that as well."

Mr. Hakim's close ties to Iran also pose potential problems for the Bush administration. His party, usually referred to by its acronym, Sciri, was founded in Iran and its armed wing, the Badr Brigade, was widely accused by Sunni Arabs of operating death squads in the aftermath of the American invasion of Iraq.

Mr. Hakim fended off those charges today in an appearance at the United States Institute for Peace, following his White House visit. "We reject all those accusations," Mr. Hakim said, asked by a reporter if his organization is responsible for murder, torture and abduction. He added, "We say there is no evidence. Nothing of that happened."

At the White House, the press secretary, Tony Snow was peppered with questions about why Mr. Bush was meeting with Mr. Hakim.

Shiite Leader Sees No Role For Iraq's Neighbors (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The leader of a key Shiite Muslim faction in the Iraqi government told President Bush on Monday that his country's problems could not be solved by enlisting the help of Iran and Syria, as a blue-ribbon commission is expected to recommend.

The remarks by Abdelaziz Hakim, whose Shiite political party holds the highest number of seats in the parliament, gave the president an important Baghdad ally in his opposition to such an overture, two days before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group is scheduled to deliver its report.

"We reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue," Hakim said after the meeting. "Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems."

Hakim rejected any international conference to solve Iraq's problems, a White House official said, speaking on condition of anonymity in accordance with White House ground rules. And Bush underscored his concerns in the private meeting, speaking directly "about Iran and Syria and the critical need for them to respect Iraqi sovereignty and stop destructive activity that undermines Iraq," the official said.

The Bush administration has promoted Hakim as a moderate Iraqi voice despite ties he formed during 20 years of exile spent largely in Iran.

Hakim's invitation to the Oval Office gave Bush an opportunity to hear an informed voice on Iran, as well as a potential courier for any messages from Washington to the leadership in Tehran. The meeting followed a week of Bush administration diplomacy on the Middle East that ended in disappointment for the White House after Arab leaders expressed concern over growing instability in Iraq and elsewhere.

On Monday, Bush renewed his declaration, in Hakim's presence, that he was "not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq," but that he wanted to continue "to work with the sovereign government" there.

Even as Hakim said that the political solution must come from within Iraq, he reached out for assistance from "the international level and the regional level in order to defeat terrorism." He also said that he and Bush had discussed the arms and training that Iraq would need to meet its security needs.

The two met privately for about 20 minutes and with aides for nearly an hour. A total of 50 minutes had been allotted for the two meetings.

In a speech later to the U.S. Institute of Peace, Hakim called for a stiffer U.S. military response to violence by militias, saying that "the deterring factors are not up to the level of their criminal activities."

"The strikes they are getting from the multinational forces are not hard enough to put an end to their acts," he said.

Hakim leads the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. It was established in Iran in 1982, providing a political home for Iraqi Shiite exiles during Saddam Hussein's rule. Members of an armed wing of the group, the Badr Brigade, have been accused of engaging in criminal activity under the cover of Iraqi security forces.

The White House official, reporting on the Oval Office discussions, said Hakim sought support for strengthening Iraqi security forces to "bring to justice those operating outside the rule of law."

Pressed on Hakim's ties to Iran and the militia, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said as the session was getting underway that Hakim was an Iraqi leader, and "not somebody who is beholden to Iran." He said Bush planned to discuss the militia activities with Hakim.

"What Mr. Al-Hakim has also done is he has talked about the importance of reconciliation within Iraq," Snow said. "He is a significant force in Iraqi politics."

In extensive comments about Hakim during an interview with Fox News Channel, Bush said he came away from the meeting convinced that Hakim was committed to a unity government. Bush also said he had heard no reference to Shiite dominance to the exclusion of others.

In a reference to the various militias, Bush said that Hakim saw no place for murderers in a constitutional government.

The president used the Fox interview to counter some of the criticism in the run-up to Wednesday's release of the report by the Iraq Study Group, which is headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.). The panel is expected to recommend that Bush shift course in Iraq and begin withdrawing U.S. troops.

Iraqi Shiite Leader Speaks Bluntly In Washington (WP)

By Robin Wright And Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

President Bush yesterday told the leader of Iraq's largest Shiite Muslim party that the United States is not satisfied with the progress in Iraq and appealed for more help in fighting extremism and reconciling the country's increasingly fractured society.

But in a speech after their hour-long meeting, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim countered that U.S. troops need to do more to fight the insurgency and denied that the Shiite militias are fueling the sectarian strife in Iraq. It was one of the starkest criticisms of U.S. military strategy by an Iraqi leader.

"The strikes [the insurgents] are getting from the multinational forces are not hard enough to put an end to their acts, but leave them to stand up again to resume their criminal acts," Hakim said in a speech at the United States Institute of Peace. "This means that there is something wrong in the policies taken to deal with that danger threatening the lives of Iraqis."

The only way to eliminate the danger of a civil war, he added, was through "decisive strikes" against insurgents once loyal to former leader Saddam Hussein. "Otherwise we'll continue to witness massacres . . . against innocent Iraqis."

Hakim, who heads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, arrived in Washington as the administration is reviewing its strategy in Iraq. The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), is due to publish its recommendations tomorrow. The meeting also comes as U.S. officials try to repair relations with Shiite leaders who had feared a recent U.S. outreach to Sunni insurgents.

The Bush administration is under pressure from both escalating sectarian strife and plummeting U.S. support for the Iraq war. "We talked about the need to give the government of Iraq more capability as quickly as possible," Bush said in a joint photo opportunity in the Oval Office. "Part of unifying Iraq is for the elected leaders and society leaders to reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy."

Hakim, who leads the Shiite coalition with the largest number of seats in parliament, told Bush that Iraqi issues should be solved by Iraqis. His words reflected the growing sentiment in both Washington and Baghdad that a shift in responsibility in managing Iraqi affairs is essential if the now multisided conflict is to be halted.

But expressing the frustration that is also rising in Washington, Bush acknowledged in an interview on Fox News yesterday that "what Americans are trying to figure out is why Iraqis are killing Iraqis when you have a better future ahead."

The growing talk of civil war in Iraq "scares us, too," Hakim said in his speech. He expressed concern that Shiite religious authorities, who have calmed tensions after the deadliest suicide bombings, would someday lose their ability to counter the violence. He called the religious authorities the "last fortress" against civil war and "catastrophic storms that no power in the world could calm or control to return Iraq to its senses."

At the White House and in his speech, Hakim signaled rejection of recent suggestions for a regional or international conference to bring Iraq's neighbors together to help defuse escalating tensions and end meddling, particularly by Iran and Syria. "We do not want to distribute shares of powers to neighboring countries," he said in his speech.

Bush and Hakim are unlikely allies in forging Iraq policy. Hakim's movement was founded during his two decades of exile in Iran, and its Badr Organization militia, formerly known as the Badr Brigade, is still widely believed to have close ties to Tehran. Hakim said yesterday that he supports the disbanding of militias, and said his own armed wing has been transformed for use in political activity. But some Sunnis allege that the Badr Organization was behind political assassinations that have contributed to sectarian violence.

White House spokesman Tony Snow called Hakim a "significant force" in Iraqi politics. "He's somebody who can play a very constructive role and we hope he will," Snow said.

Bush Says Iraq Progress Too Slow (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 5, 2006

President Bush told a Shiite political leader on Monday the United States is not happy with progress in Iraq and sought the cleric's help to curb extremists and terrorists trying to undermine the struggling new democracy.

Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim said U.S. troops need to stay in Iraq to help deal with escalating violence. He also told Bush that Iraq welcomes help from other nations, including those in the Middle East, so long as they do not bypass Iraq's political process.

"Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems," al-Hakim told Bush after they met in the Oval Office for more than an hour.

Some consider al-Hakim, who lived in exile in Iran for years, a more powerful political figure than Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Al-Hakim leads the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament. His party also is backed by the Badr Brigade militia blamed for sectarian killings.

The meeting was evidence that Bush, under pressure to find a new blueprint for his war strategy, was getting more personally involved in the political infighting among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds.

"I told him that we're not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq, and that we want to continue to work with the sovereign government of Iraq," Bush said. He said the young Iraqi government needs to be given more capability as quickly as possible to secure the country from extremists and murderers.

Bush is meeting on Thursday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair — a day after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group issues its long-awaited recommendations. Bush also plans to meet next month with Iraq's Sunni Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi. Last week, he met in Jordan with al-Maliki.

Before al-Hakim's visit to the United States, two al-Maliki aides and a third person close to al-Hakim said the cleric was expected to try to persuade Bush to enlist Iran's help in quelling violence in Iraq.

Bush spoke with al-Hakim directly about Iran and Syria and the critical need for them to respect Iraqi sovereignty and stop destructive activity that undermines Iraq's unity government, a senior administration official said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to divulge details of the meeting.

The official said it wasn't known whether al-Hakim specifically asked Bush to enlist Iran's assistance. Al-Hakim told reporters that he vehemently opposes any regional or international effort to solve Iraq's problems that goes around the unity government in Baghdad.

"We reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue," the cleric, who speaks Arabic, said through a translator. "We cannot bypass the political process. Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems."

Later, in a speech at the U.S. Institute of Peace in Washington, al-Hakim said Iraq is interested in creating good relations with all neighboring nations, including Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Iran, Syria and Jordan.

But he said: "We do not want to distribute shares of power to neighboring countries, but rather we want balanced relations."

Al-Hakim said he talked with Bush about equipment, including armaments, that the Iraqi security forces need. He pledged that the government would deal with all forms of terrorism, no matter where they originate.

He also said that eliminating the danger of civil war in Iraq can be achieved only by decisive strikes against terrorist Baathists and extremist followers of Islam. "Otherwise we will continue to witness massacres being committed every now and then against the innocent Iraqis," he said.

Monday's developments came amid rising expectations about a new U.S. policy that Bush is crafting for Iraq — one that his advisers say will be announced within weeks. He is seeking information from reviews being done by the State Department, National Security Council and the Joint Chiefs of Staff as well as the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana.

It became increasingly clear that the administration was looking for Iraq alternatives well before the November elections, when Bush was adamantly defending his policies.

A day before the elections, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld wrote a letter saying he had developed a list of alternative approaches for Iraq over a period of weeks. In his letter, obtained by The Associated Press on Monday, Rumsfeld said he and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had told the president "a number of weeks ago" that they were considering alternatives for Iraq policy because changes were needed.

Rumsfeld also wrote that at his request, Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander for U.S. forces in the Middle East, had assembled a group to work on the issue.

Iraq's Al-Hakim Gets White House Meeting (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi

AP, December 5, 2006

Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim is closer to Iran than any other Iraqi politician and runs a Shiite militia blamed for sectarian violence in Iraq.

So why did President Bush meet him in the White House?

Some Iraqi officials believe Bush wanted to find out what role Iran can play in bringing peace to this country. If anyone in Iraq knows, it is the 55-year-old al-Hakim.

Al-Hakim is the leader of Iraq's largest political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI. He lived in exile in Iran for more than two decades before returning home in 2003 after the ouster of Saddam Hussein's Sunni-dominated regime.

DOJ_NMG_0102369

SCIRI was founded in Iran and its affiliated militia, the Badr Brigade, was trained and armed by Iran's Revolutionary Guard. The militia fought alongside the Iranians in their eight-year war against Iraq in the 1980s.

Al-Hakim's Sunni Arab critics, in fact, charge that he is more Iranian than Iraqi.

"Al-Hakim wants Iran to rule Iraq," Saleh al-Mutlaq, a senior Sunni Arab politician, told Al-Jazeera television interview that aired Sunday.

Al-Hakim, who spoke to Bush for more than an hour at the White House Monday, became leader of the SCIRI when his brother and party founder Ayatollah Mohammed Baqir al-Hakim was killed in a bombing in August 2003. Since then, he has risen from political obscurity into the leader of parliament's largest bloc.

"Bush today met a powerful leader," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of parliament's largest Sunni Arab bloc and a critic of the government. "Al-Hakim was expected to assure Bush that he is not a tool in Iran's hands, but that he can take a message back to the Iranians from him."

While al-Hakim's ties to Iran inspire suspicion among Sunni Iraqis, they apparently enhanced his prestige with the U.S. — especially as the Bush administration searches for an exit strategy from its 44-month-old military involvement in Iraq.

A report by a bipartisan commission due out Wednesday is expected to offer a set of military and political options for Iraq including an effort to enlist Iran's help in curbing the violence.

Bush refuses to speak directly to Iran, a U.S. adversary for almost 30 years. That prompted al-Hakim to consider volunteering as an intermediary between Washington and Tehran, according to key advisers to the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who talked with al-Hakim before his Washington visit.

"He went to Washington with a green light from the Iranians to take back a message from Bush to them on Iraq," said a senior aide to al-Hakim, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

Hassan al-Sneid, a lawmaker and al-Maliki confidante, said Iraqi President Jalal Talabani was told during a visit to Tehran last week that the Iranians had no objections to a dialogue with the Americans over Iraq.

Iranian influence in Iraq worries the United States and its Arab Sunni allies in the region, like Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt. Shiite and Sunni Arab politicians privately complain that their non-Arab neighbor supports Shiite and even some Sunni armed groups in a bid to achieve what analysts call "controlled chaos."

The aim, they said, was to keep the United States bogged down in Iraq and distracted from taking strong action against Iran over its nuclear program.

Al-Hakim has championed giving Iraq's Shiite-dominated security forces the lead role in the fight against Sunni insurgents and al-Qaida in Iraq militants.

Iraqi government advisers, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said al-Hakim had planned to raise the issue with Bush.

Sunni Arabs fear al-Hakim will persuade the Americans to give the security forces a free hand to crush the once-dominant Sunni community. They also fear he will persuade Washington to tone down its demands that the Shiite militias to be disbanded.

Al-Maliki has been reluctant to rein in the militias. Sunnis fear that pressure from Washington to curb the militias will ease after the U.S. military relinquishes the lead on the battlefield to the Iraqis.

Officially, al-Hakim's Badr militia has been disbanded and turned into a political group, but few in Iraq believe it.

Instead, the Badr militia is widely believed to be the source of the top leadership in Iraq's police and army forces. The militia is also suspected of operating death squads targeting Sunni foes and senior members of Saddam's former Baath party.

Bush Meets With Iraq's Shiite Leader (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, December 5, 2006

President Bush told an Iraqi power broker on Monday that the United States was not satisfied with the progress of efforts to stop the sharp escalation of violence in Iraq.

Bush met at the White House with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, the Shiite leader of the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament.

Al-Hakim said that he "vehemently" opposes any regional or international effort to solve Iraq's problems that goes around the unity government in Baghdad.

"Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraq's problems," al-Hakim said.

The president said he spoke with al-Hakim for more than an hour and said they had a "very constructive conversation."

"I assured him that the U.S. supports his work and the work of the prime minister to unify the country," Bush said, referring to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

DOJ_NMG_0102370

"Part of unifying Iraq is for the elected leaders and society leaders to reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy," Bush said.

"We talked about the need to give the government Iraq more capability as soon as possible so the elected government of Iraq can do that which the Iraqi people want to secure their country from extremists and murderers," Bush said. "I told his eminence that I was proud of the courage of the Iraqi people. I told him that we're not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq. And that we want to continue to work with the sovereign government of Iraq."

Al-Hakim, after what he called a "very clear" meeting earlier with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, told reporters in Arabic that "we have asked for the American forces to stay in Iraq" to enable Iraqi security to deal with terrorists.

Monday's developments came amid an atmosphere of rising expectations about a new U.S. policy in Iraq and an acknowledgment by Bush's national security adviser that Bush accepts that a new approach is warranted.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley said Sunday that while Bush recognizes something different needs to be done, the president won't use the recommendations due this week from the Iraq Study Group as political cover for bringing troops home.

"We have not failed in Iraq," Hadley said as he made the talk show rounds Sunday. "We will fail in Iraq if we pull out our troops before we're in a position to help the Iraqis succeed."

He added: "The president understands that we need to have a way forward in Iraq that is more successful."

But, with the leak of another insider's secret memo, the second in a week, the administration found itself on the defensive.

The latest showed that Donald H. Rumsfeld called for a "major adjustment" in U.S. tactics on Nov. 6 — the day before an election that cost Republicans the Congress and Rumsfeld his job as defense secretary.

Hadley played down the memo as a laundry list of ideas rather than a call for a new course of action.

He said that Bush — just before a pivotal election — was not portraying a different sense of the war to the public than his own defense secretary was giving him in private.

The president "has said publicly what Rumsfeld said, that things are not proceeding well enough or fast enough in Iraq," Hadley said.

Democrats did not buy that.

"The Rumsfeld memo makes it quite clear that one of the greatest concerns is the political fallout from changing course here in the United States," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "The bottom line is there is no one, including the former secretary, who thought the policy the president continues to pursue makes any sense."

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., said the Rumsfeld memo was an example of how the administration has been "mischaracterizing and misstating this war." He said the Iraq conflict had devolved into a civil war. "There's two factions fighting for supremacy inside Iraq and our troops are caught in between," Murtha said on NBC's "Today" show. As incoming chairman of the House Defense Appropriations subcommittee, Murtha said he would put pressure on the administration to redeploy U.S. troops there.

Bush has nominated Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld. His confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee is on Tuesday.

As pressure builds for a new strategy, the report from the Iraq Study Group increasingly is viewed as perhaps clearing the way for a U.S. exit strategy in Iraq. Hadley, though, said the review will be just one factor the White House considers.

After a meeting last week in Jordan, Bush expressed confidence that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government can lead the country toward peace with support from the United States.

Yet Hadley found himself defending his own memo that called that very point into question.

Bush Presses Shi'ite Leader On Violence (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

President Bush yesterday bluntly told the leader of Iraq's largest Shi'ite party that the United States is not satisfied with efforts by Iraqi political leaders to stop sectarian violence, which has spiraled out of control in recent months.

The Oval Office meeting came on a day when the White House announced that the president will meet Thursday with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, his closest ally in the Iraq war. That meeting will come just a day after Mr. Bush receives recommendations from a bipartisan commission charged with coming up with solutions to the nearly four-year-long war in Iraq.

After his hourlong meeting yesterday with Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who heads the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament and is a leading opponent of anti-U.S. Shi'ite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the president said political leaders must step up to quell dissent among opposing factions.

"I told him that we're not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq, and that we want to continue to work with the sovereign government of Iraq," Mr. Bush said. "Part of unifying Iraq is for the elected leaders and society leaders to reject the extremists that are trying to stop the advance of this young democracy."

But Mr. al-Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, said he "vehemently" opposes any regional or international effort to solve Iraq's problems that goes around the unity government in Baghdad.

"We cannot bypass the political process. Iraq should be in a position to solve Iraqi problems," he said. "Therefore, we believe that the Iraqi issue should be solved by the Iraqis with the help of friends everywhere. But we reject any attempts to have a regional or international role in solving the Iraqi issue."

Yesterday's meeting, which followed the president's meeting last week in Amman, Jordan, with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, begins a new effort by the Bush administration to create a dialogue with Iraqi political leaders. Mr. Bush is scheduled to meet next month with Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, who is a Sunni, and one senior administration official said top U.S. officials will meet soon with other moderate Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish leaders.

Still, the escalating sectarian violence in Iraq has prompted some U.S. critics to step up their calls for immediate withdrawal. "There's two factions fighting for supremacy inside Iraq, and our troops are caught in between," Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, said Sunday.

Mr. al-Hakim said Iraq can solve its own problems but told reporters after a morning meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that "we have asked for the American forces to stay in Iraq" in an effort to help Iraqi security forces contend with terrorists.

"We will work very hard and seek all forms of cooperation at the international level and the regional level in order to defeat terrorism that it is trying to use Iraq as a base in order to sabotage the future of that nation," Mr. al-Hakim said.

The White House yesterday did not rule out a possible meeting with Sheik al-Sadr. "I don't know if al-Sadr would also be willing to entertain the option. It's a very interesting question; we'll go back and muse on it in a few minutes," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

The outreach to all political leaders in Iraq, Mr. Snow said, is designed to give the president the chance "to talk to significant leaders and make the case that it's important for people to build together across sectarian lines, to take the measures necessary for national reconciliation."

Mr. al-Hakim defended the U.S. role in Iraq, and said Americans are unaware of the advances taking place in Iraq.

"The Iraqi situation has been subjected to a great deal of defamation, and the true picture is not being presented in order to show a dark side of what's happening in Iraq," he said.

Speaking at the United States Institute of Peace after meeting with Mr. Bush, Mr. al-Hakim endorsed proposals to create federal regions in Iraq, saying that concerns about such plans "are exaggerated."

"Federalism definitely will not divide Iraq," said Mr. al-Hakim. He said that religious -- not secular -- authorities were the only ones that could hold the country together.

"We should not resort to dealing with issues that may weaken the religious authorities, otherwise Iraq may be subjected to catastrophic storms that no power in the world could calm or control [or] return Iraq to its senses," he said.

In a Fox News interview last night, Mr. Bush told Brit Hume he was pleased by the Shi'ite leader's expressions of commitment to a unity government in Iraq.

"There is a lot of talk about Shia dominance to the exclusion of other folks in Iraq. I didn't hear that at all -- quite the contrary," Mr. Bush said. "I listened to a man who understands that the way forward is for there to be a government of and by and for the people."

Referring to his previous meeting with Mr. al-Maliki, Mr. Bush said both the prime minister and Mr. al-Hakim "understand that murderers must be stopped, that you can't have a society, a constitutional government presiding over a society in which murderers are allowed to run free."

US 'not Satisfied' With Pace Of Iraqi Progress (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

President George W. Bush told a powerful Iraqi Shia cleric on Monday that he was not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq as they discussed how the US could accelerate assistance to the Baghdad government.

Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (Sciri), a key partner in the coalition government, said talks focused on arms and training for the Iraqi army and the transfer of military authority from the US commander to the Iraqi government.

Speaking later at the US Institute of Peace (USIP), Mr Hakim criticised US forces for not cracking down hard enough on Sunni insurgents.

Decisive strikes were needed, Mr Hakim said. Otherwise, he warned, Shia spiritual leaders might lose their capacity to contain Shia anger and Iraq would be plunged into civil war and "catastrophic storms that no power in the world could calm or control".

USIP is assisting the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which is due to release its recommendations for new strategies in Iraq on Wednesday. A gradual redeployment of US combat troops by early 2008 is expected to form the core proposal. But there was no suggestion by Mr Bush or Mr Hakim of adopting such a timeline.

"I told His Eminence that I was proud of the courage of the Iraqi people. I told him that we're not satisfied with the pace of progress in Iraq," Mr Bush said.

Although White House officials portrayed the meeting as part of a normal process of consultation with Iraqi politicians, Mr Hakim's visit to the White House fuelled the perception of an administration desperately seeking a new direction.

Asked whether Iraqis were worse off now than under Saddam Hussein – as asserted by Kofi Annan, UN secretary-general, in a BBC interview – the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, replied: "You will have to ask the Iraqi people."

Mr Hakim vies with Moqtada al-Sadr, a radical cleric and militia leader, for the mantle of Iraq's most powerful Shia politician. Their family feud is generational. Both their militias have been accused of involvement in sectarian violence against the Sunni Arab minority – a charge Mr Hakim denies.

Mr Hakim also maintains close ties to Iran, where he lived in exile after 1980 and went on to lead the Badr brigade, an Iranian-trained and funded militia that fought on the side of Iran against Iraq in their 1980-88 war.

Mr Bush and Mr Hakim have rejected a proposal by Mr Annan, which is expected to be echoed by the Iraq Study Group, for direct US engagement with Iran and Syria. Mr Hakim said Iraq would deal with its neighbours.

Mr Hakim's support for the coalition government is crucial to its survival, although his relations with Nouri al-Maliki, prime min-ister, are difficult and he may be angling for US support for one of his allies to replace him.

Judith Yaphe, an analyst at Washington's National Defence University, said: "We may be trying to play on long-standing animosity between Sadr and the Hakims. He could be an ally but it's a very dangerous game to play and usually we don't play these games very well."

More deaths in Baghdad prompted Zalmay Khalilzad, the US ambassador, and General George Casey, the US commander, to issue a joint plea to Iraqis not to be "drawn down the road of senseless brutality" in tit-for-tat sectarian killings.

Sins Of The Father (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

It is not the fault of Jenna or Barbara Bush that their father, the president, has gotten us into a war that he doesn't know how to get us out of. And, although you can blame parents for almost anything, George W. and Laura Bush are no longer responsible for the behavior of their twin daughters, who are in their mid-20s. Presidents, like the rest of us, don't get to choose their relatives. Remember Billy Carter?

Anyway, Jenna and Barbara are far from George W. Bush's biggest familial problem. The law of averages has given him at least one ne'er-do-well brother -- Neil. The biggest familial thorn in the president's side is probably his father, always ready (or so it seems) to send out a Brent Scowcroft or a James Baker with some patronizing and excruciatingly public advice for the young pup.

As for the twins, we actually know next to nothing about them. George and Laura Bush made the wise decision to keep them out of the limelight, and -- with surprisingly little slippage -- they have managed to enforce this policy on the press, on the Republican propaganda machine and on the girls themselves. Good for them.

From what little has leaked out, it seems that Jenna and Barbara are party girls who like to drink and dance until the wee hours with aristocrats and frat boys. Jenna is interning for UNICEF in Latin America (not actually teaching kids, as originally reported, but involved somehow in education). The twins recently took a trip to Argentina. Their first night there, partying in Buenos Aires, Barbara lost her purse to a thief.

So it would appear that George W. Bush's daughters are not Amy Carter or Chelsea Clinton or Karenna Gore. So what? Are you surprised?

Nevertheless, there is a war on. It's a war that has killed 3,000 Americans, most of them around Jenna and Barbara's age or younger. It has killed hundreds of thousands of Iraqis of all ages. And even more Americans and Iraqis have been injured, lost limbs, suffered terrible pain. President Bush can be quite eloquent in talking about the sacrifices of American soldiers and -- he always adds -- their families. In the Reagan style that has become almost mandatory, he uses anecdotes. He talks of Marine 2nd

Lt. Frederick Pokorney Jr. "His wife, Carolyn, received a folded flag. His two-year-old daughter, Taylor, knelt beside her mother at the casket to say a final goodbye."

Bush says truly, about the American dead, "They did not yearn to be heroes. They yearned to see mom and dad again and to hold their sweethearts and to watch their sons and daughters grow. They wanted the daily miracle of freedom in America, yet they gave all that up and gave life itself for the sake of others."

Living your life according to your own values is a challenge for everyone, and it must be a special challenge if you happen to be the president. No one thinks that the president should have to give up a child to prove that his family is as serious about freedom as these other families he praises. But it would be reassuring to see a little struggle here -- some sign that the Bush family truly believes that American soldiers are dying for our freedom, and that it's worth it.

Who knows? Maybe they have had huge arguments about this. Maybe George and Laura wanted the girls to join the Red Cross, or the Peace Corps, or do something that would at least take them off the party circuit for a couple of years. And perhaps the girls said no. But I doubt this scenario, don't you?

The opposite approach to this question is taken by Jim Webb, the incoming senator from Virginia. Webb seems to believe that because he served in Vietnam, anyone who could have but didn't should shut up. That includes people who opposed that war -- that is, who got it right -- as well as those who supported it. Webb's son is serving in Iraq, and -- in a gesture that would throw Dr. Freud for a loop -- Webb wears a pair of the son's combat boots. At a White House reception for new members of Congress, Webb avoided the receiving line and then, when Bush came up and asked him how his son was doing, he basically told the president to flake off. Webb's self-righteousness can be obnoxious. But at least he is being morally serious.

At first it seemed a brilliant strategy -- repellent, but brilliant -- to isolate most Americans from the cost of the war in Iraq. It's starting to seem a lot less so. As the deaths and injuries mount, more and more people are touched by the war -- and become understandably resentful of those who are not. Bush, in his speeches, is eloquent about what no one doubts -- the sacrifice -- but banal about what most people have come to doubt: the purpose.

But no amount of eloquence can overcome the bald contrast between that rhetoric and how his own family lives. His daughters are over 21, and he can't control them, but that doesn't let them off the hook. They are now independent moral actors, and their situation requires that they either publicly oppose their father's war or do something to support it. Is it unfair to expect Jenna and Barbara to shape their lives around their father's folly? Of course it's unfair. If this is war, then unfairness comes with the territory.

Iraq Panel Likened To Vietnam 'Wise Men' (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which has received concentrated press coverage this fall as it prepares to report to President Bush tomorrow, was the idea of a Republican lawmaker looking for fresh ideas on the war.

For some, it brings memories of Vietnam in 1967 and 1968, when President Johnson turned to a group of "wise men," mostly Democrats, for advice on how to win that long war. But while Mr. Johnson actively sought their counsel, the White House and Pentagon are not overly enthusiastic about an outside group of former politicians and Cabinet members suggesting war policy, according to senior officials.

While the Iraq Study Group was in the homestretch of a 10-month project to write a report, the Bush administration in September kicked off its own top-to-bottom reviews on many fronts. The office of the secretary of defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department and the National Security Council are all weighing options. The ideas range from A to Z: pull out all troops now or add more troops to quell restive Baghdad and Anbar province.

Mr. Bush already has received some options from Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, and from outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Mr. Rumsfeld provided a list of 21 possible actions in a Nov. 6 memo to the president.

"Let's see if the [Iraq Study Group] comes up with anything better than this," a Pentagon official said of Mr. Rumsfeld's ideas. Mr. Rumsfeld proposed innovative ideas on the possible redeployment of forces inside Iraq and denying construction projects to violent communities.

By the time the White House begins studying the group's report, the president will also have scores of ideas from his own advisers.

The study group's main recommendations are thought to be a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops but with no predetermined timeline, and Washington engagement with Iran and Syria.

Rep. Frank R. Wolf, Virginia Republican, pushed the study group idea after a September 2005 visit to Iraq. The deteriorating security situation indicated to him the administration needed a fresh look. He proposed a panel of outside experts and sold the idea to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Mr. Rumsfeld. Mr. Wolf then sponsored a $1 million appropriation to fund the study.

Mr. Wolf, other members of Congress and the U.S. Institute of Peace collectively selected the co-chairman -- former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, Indiana Democrat. Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton then selected the other eight members.

Some have referred to the study panel's cast of "formers" as nine wise men, plus one woman. It includes four members of Congress; two secretaries of state; one attorney general; one Supreme Court justice, one secretary of defense; and an investment banker and Washington power broker.

The group began work in March. By November, it had listened to more than 250 current and former government officials, military personnel and national security thinkers. It interviewed Mr. Bush twice.

The recommendations will be available online at 11 a.m. tomorrow on the sites of four organizations tied to the group: the U.S. Institute of Peace (www.usip.org); the Baker Institute for Public Policy at Rice University (www.bakerinstitute.org); the Center for Strategic and International Studies (www.csis.org); and the Center for the Study of the Presidency (www.thepresidency.org).

Also at 11 a.m., the group will formally release its report in a press conference on Capitol Hill. Members of the panel, including Mr. Baker and Mr. Hamilton, will appear Thursday before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Unlike the September 11 commission, the Iraq Study Group has no statutory mandate. Its recommendations are not binding on Mr. Bush. But Democrats who want the president to change course in Iraq and bring troops home are expected to embrace any recommendation, no matter how imprecise, to cut troop levels in the near future.

The study group is somewhat unique.

"It's the old throwback to the 'wise men,' " said Richard Shultz, director of International Security Studies Program at Tufts University's Fletcher School. "Johnson did the same thing."

Mr. Johnson, his Vietnam War policy in shambles, summoned some of the most experienced minds in the Democratic Party to come to the White House on a number of occasions in 1967 and 1968 to advise the president. The list included Dean Acheson, President Truman's secretary of state; Judge Abe Fortas; and retired Gen. Omar Bradley, one of the top U.S. commanders in World War II.

Unlike the Iraq Study Group, however, Mr. Johnson's "wise men" did not constitute a formal group, with staff and a congressional budget.

"The extent of [the Iraq Study Group] is unique, but it's the same principle: The 'wise men,' " Mr. Shultz said.

Three weeks after the "wise men" came for a Nov. 2, 1967, meeting, Robert McNamara resigned as Mr. Johnson's defense secretary in a break over war policy.

Iraq Report Confronts Bush Resolve (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON

With the White House facing a pivotal week for Iraq policy, the big question is not so much what the bipartisan Iraq Study Group will say when it releases its report Wednesday, but how President Bush will respond.

In the final two years of his tenure and well aware that Iraq more than anything will define his place in history, Mr. Bush is facing intense pressure to make extensive adjustments to save a project that most experts conclude is rapidly failing.

At the same time, recent insistence by the president that his policies will yet succeed suggest that Bush will resist recommendations that do not mesh with his vision for Iraq.

"This president doesn't like to backtrack - but then sometimes he does," says Jon Alterman, Middle East program director at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "He sees his legacy as showing resolve, and that is going to influence any decisions [on Iraq] as much as the enormous pressure he is under to change course."

For example: the study group is expected to recommend a significant drawdown of the 144,000 US troops in Iraq over the coming year, even if Iraqi forces are not up to replacing them. That proposal "simply has no realism to it," Bush said last week. But another anticipated proposal, for substantially increased training of Iraqi security forces, is more likely to receive a presidential nod.

Much has been revealed in recent days suggesting the congressionally commissioned Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, will recommend a direction that's neither "stay the course" nor "cut and run." Recommendations are expected to include measures for using future US troop levels as leverage to pressure the Iraqi government to make hard political decisions - on disbanding militias, for example, or accommodating Sunnis.

At the same time, the Baker commission is expected to favor intensifying and broadening regional diplomatic efforts to help pull Iraq back from the brink of full-blown civil war. That recommendation is expected to include opening dialogue with objectionable but influential neighbors in the region, especially Iran and Syria.

The administration has been dropping hints that a major adjustment is forthcoming in US Iraq policy. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, said Sunday that the president would unveil a "new way forward" in coming weeks that will include "significant changes."

But Bush is also acting to put the public on notice that any changes will be what he determines is best, based on the full panoply of recommendations he is receiving. Four policy outlines beyond Baker report

Bush and various aides have repeated recently that the Baker commission's report is just one of a number that the president will be receiving over the coming days on how to proceed in Iraq.

In addition to studies anticipated from the Pentagon and the National Security Council, Bush has also received recently at least two detailed memos - from Mr. Hadley and outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld - offering analysis and recommendations that emphasize the need for deep policy changes to alter Iraq's downward spiral.

Those two memos in particular have shifted the political ground for Bush as he awaits what was already expected to be a week of pressure for change with the release of the Iraq Study Group's recommendations.

"The flow of calls to reconsider Iraq policy means the context is very different - and more intense," says Mr. Alterman, a former State Department policy planning staff member in the president's first term. "After the Hadley and Rumsfeld memos, this would be the third call in a week saying: 'You really have to consider alternatives' - and to a president who has made clear he doesn't want to consider alternatives."

Given the high profile the Iraq Study Group has achieved, the White House won't be able to brush it off. At the same time, it will not want it to appear that the president is hanging on its every word, former presidential advisers say.

"We can anticipate that the [Baker] report will offer such a number of nuanced statements that it will permit reading into it what you want to see," says Geoffrey Kemp, an expert in security issues at the Nixon Center in Washington who was on the national security staff of the Reagan White House. "It will be difficult for the president to dismiss it, but ... neither will [Bush] want to look as if he is waiting, hat in hand, for its recommendations." Analyst: Bush will take his time to respond

Given those dual pressures, Mr. Kemp says he expects the White House to "take some time to digest what the study group has to say," and then to incorporate those aspects it agrees with into its new policy.

"I think [Bush] will use Baker-Hamilton to bolster his case where he can," Kemp says.

For example, Kemp says he now sees as practically written in stone a significant drawdown of US troops over the coming year.

But some analysts expect Bush to announce in the coming weeks an actual increase in US troops patrolling the Iraqi capital. If that happens, the president can be expected to announce such a decision as a short-term necessity for achieving the long-term goal of "withdrawing US troops and putting the Iraqis in control of their destiny," Kemp says.

White House political calculations will play a role in how it responds, others say.

"Remember this is not a nonpartisan commission, it is bipartisan," Alterman says. "So it will be looking at political outcomes as much as at outcomes on the grounds in Iraq."

Bush May Face Iraq Change Recommendation (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, December 5, 2006

It would take a major policy shift for the Bush administration to expand its sporadic dialogue with two old foes, Iran and Syria, as the Iraq study commission is expected to recommend.

The bipartisan panel appears convinced that reaching out to Iran and Syria could help stabilize neighboring Iraq, and improve chances for easing overall Middle East tensions by boosting the prospects for an Arab-Israeli settlement.

The White House has said it would consider talking to Iran and Syria if the Iraq Study Group makes that recommendation. Administration officials have also dropped hints that they might be willing to hold talks with Iran restricted to curbing violence in Iraq.

Yet the administration's overall tone has been one of skepticism about reaching accommodation with Tehran and Damascus. It has long accused both countries of stirring up trouble in the region, and it confronts both of them on issues besides Iraq.

With the Iraq report due for release Wednesday, administration officials continue to accuse Iran and Syria of arming and otherwise supporting insurgents in Iraq, Lebanon and elsewhere. They insist there is nothing to be gained by rewarding Iran and Syria with high-profile discourse with American diplomats.

DOJ_NMG_0102376

"If diplomatic engagement serves a broader strategy in moving Iran, that is something we will consider," said David Satterfield, top State Department adviser on Iraq, in a recent AP Television News interview.

But he added, "What is critical is actions on the part of the Iranian government. The only actions we have seen from Tehran have been negative ones."

Satterfield expressed similar doubts about Syria, saying, "We don't believe engagement will serve a useful purpose in the absence of substantive changes by the Syrian government."

On Sunday, Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., said on "Face the Nation" on CBS, "Asking Iran and Syria to help us succeed in Iraq is about like your local fire department asking a couple of arsonists to help put out the fire."

By contrast, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said on CNN's "Late Edition" that he supported a multinational Mideast conference including Iran and Syria, "because nothing will hold unless you begin to resolve those differences."

The Bush administration's differences with Iran include a demand that Tehran suspend development of nuclear weapons — a goal Iran denies it is pursuing — before the U.S. will join European-led talks that offer Iran economic inducements to halt its nuclear program.

The U.S. also wants Iran to cease its support for Hezbollah militia in Lebanon and other groups designated as terrorist by the State Department.

Iran and the United States have not had formal relations since fundamentalist revolutionaries seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran in 1979 and held Americans captive for 444 days. Successive U.S. administrations have harbored hopes that a more moderate leadership would emerge in Iran.

Relations have soured since the Sept. 11 attacks and President Bush's inclusion of Iran in an "axis of evil" with North Korea and Saddam Hussein's Iraq. They have only worsened since hardline President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad took office last year, with confrontations over his calls for Israel's destruction and Tehran's nuclear efforts.

Richard Perle, a former U.S. official who is a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, said last week that if the Iraq panel called for talks with Iran and Bush took the advice, "It will be seen throughout the region as an indication of American weakness."

"The Iranians are fundamentally on the other side on Iraq and nothing we can say or do will change that," Perle said in an interview.

On the other hand, Robert Gates, Bush's choice to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld as secretary of defense, told the Council on Foreign Relations in 2004, "Direct dialogue with Tehran on specific areas of mutual concern should be pursued."

Over the years, while keeping their distance from Tehran, succeeding U.S. administrations have worked with Syria to promote peace with Israel.

But relations between Washington and Damascus have remained cool, largely because Syria views the U.S. as pro-Israel and Syria supports Islamic extremist groups.

Tensions worsened after the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq, with the Bush administration charging that Syria was letting insurgents cross its border into Iraq to fight coalition troops.

Bush has focused on curtailing Syria's domination of Lebanon. And State Department spokesman Tom Casey called last week for an end to "its well-known support for Palestinian rejectionist groups as well as other terrorist organizations," which include the leaders of Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

The U.S. withdrew its ambassador to Syria in February 2005 after the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri in Beirut. A U.N. investigation has implicated top Syrian officials, but President Bashar Assad has denied Syrian involvement.

Cut And Walk (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

In the 1990s, we became more aware of the importance not only of I.Q. to success but also of “E.Q.” — “emotional intelligence quotient.” Authors like Daniel Goleman explained E.Q. in part as an ability to assess, adjust to and influence the emotions of others.

These days, as we grope for a new policy in Iraq, we desperately need that kind of emotional intelligence, particularly toward overseas nationalism. Insensitivity to nationalism may be the biggest foreign policy mistake the U.S. and Europe alike have made in the last half-century — from Vietnam to Suez, Mexico to Algeria — and we’ve been repeating it in Iraq.

One of the essential paradoxes is that even well-meaning efforts to stabilize Iraq with our military presence inflame Iraqi nationalism and bolster nationalist extremists. Inadvertently, because we’re not sensitive enough to how our actions are perceived in the Iraqi cauldron, we end up empowering extremists who destabilize the country.

Exhibit A is the shadowy man who has won a reputation as perhaps the single most brutal mass murderer there, Abu Deraa. He is a Shiite who in the late Saddam years was apparently just a petty forger, according to Terrorism Monitor, a publication of the Jamestown Foundation.

Abu Deraa won renown as a "patriot" who attacked U.S. armored vehicles. Then he diversified into criminal kidnapping, which generated cash to make him a player and finance his band of gangsters.

The whispers about Abu Deraa and his torture of the Sunnis he captures — he specializes in using electric drills on their skulls — have won him increasingly mythic status. Some of the biggest and boldest attacks in Iraq are attributed to him, and he brings creativity and economies of scale to his murder enterprise. An Australian news account described how he once drove a fleet of ambulances into a Sunni neighborhood and used loudspeakers to call on young men to donate blood to help fellow Sunnis injured by Shiites. Dozens of young men came forward — and were executed.

Abu Deraa told Time magazine, in an interview through an intermediary, that his fight is against "occupiers, their supporters" and Sunni insurgents, and he painted himself as a pious Muslim driven by a "sense of holy duty" to attack American forces. Those arguments resonate among some Shiites, who see him as a hero and protect him, even as he helps tear his country apart.

At bottom, Abu Deraa is a psychopathic thug who terrorizes fellow Iraqis. But he has been able to use his attacks on American forces to win political cover to foment civil war.

So as we Americans plan our own strategy for Iraq, let's show more emotional intelligence. The Iraqi Study Group is right about needing to consult with neighbors like Syria and Iran, but that doesn't resolve another central problem in Iraq: Our open-ended military presence, perceived by Iraqis as a grab for Iraqi oil and bases, ends up legitimizing extremists like Abu Deraa and aggravating civil war.

Our military presence risks expanding the civil war in another way. As we side more openly with the Shiite government in its struggle against Sunni insurgents, Saudi Arabia — already nervous about the rise of Shiites — is hinting that it may help the Sunnis defend themselves. We could end up with a war in which Iran and Iraqi Shiites battle against Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Iraqi Sunni Arabs. (That's when gas prices reach $5 a gallon.)

So let's raise our E.Q. and take account of Iraqi emotions and nationalist sensitivities, particularly alarm about American bases on Iraqi soil. For starters, we can (as Don Rumsfeld noted in his leaked memo) quickly give back up to 50 of our 55 military bases in Iraq.

We should also state clearly that we will not keep any permanent military bases in Iraq. That's not going to persuade the extremist insurgents, but polls suggest that such an announcement would reduce the support that extremists get from ordinary Iraqis. That's a simple step that would save American and Iraqi lives.

The same logic argues for a timetable for withdrawal from Iraq, ending by November 2007. Granted, there is a real risk that the bloodbath will worsen significantly when we leave. But Iraqis themselves say overwhelmingly in polls that our presence is inflaming the violence rather than reducing it, and a timetable would be a useful signal that we really are going to pull out and that Iraqi factions need to conciliate and address their own problems.

We needn't cut and run. But let's post a schedule, and then cut and walk. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Iraq Study Group Findings Due Wednesday (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, December 5, 2006

The Iraq Study Group's long-awaited report on how the U.S. should overhaul its effort in Iraq will be released online on Wednesday, with members of the panel expected to testify on Capitol Hill the following day.

The recommendations will be posted to the Web sites of four organizations that have been involved in the effort: the U.S. Institute of Peace (http://www.usip.org); the Baker Institute for Public Policy at Rice University (http://www.bakerinstitute.org); the Center for Strategic and International Studies (http://www.csis.org); and the Center for the Study of the Presidency (http://www.thepresidency.org).

The report will be posted at 11 a.m. EST, just as the commission begins a news conference on Capitol Hill formally releasing its work. The panel is headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana.

In a letter Monday, Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Carl Levin, D-Mich., asked Baker and Hamilton and other members of the group to testify Thursday before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The group's study is seen as the first major bipartisan effort to rethink military and political options in Iraq, where increasing violence has raised questions about the viability of the Iraqi government and U.S. policy.

The group is expected to recommend gradually phasing out the mission of U.S. troops in Iraq from combat to training and supporting Iraqi units, with a goal of pulling back American combat troops by early 2008.

On Oct. 5, Warner said he thought the Iraq war was "drifting sideways" without a commitment from the Iraqi government to disarm militias. He said he wanted Baker's group to testify on its findings as soon as possible following the Nov. 7 elections, so that Congress could use its advice to forge its own bipartisan consensus.

"The ultimate power rests in the power of the people," Warner said in an interview with The Associated Press last week. The public, he added, will "watch very carefully as to how the Congress and the president hopefully work together, achieve a consensus."

While On Panel, Iraq Study Group Members Made Political Donations (HILL)

By Bob Cusack

The Hill, December 5, 2006

A few members of the Iraq Study Group have made political contributions since they joined the bipartisan committee, with one panelist giving to a leading House Democrat who has embraced a quick withdrawal of U.S. troops.

The contributions could be fodder for critics who disapprove of the group's final recommendations, even though the panel consists of five Democrats and five Republicans.

Two months after the Iraq Study Group was launched, Leon Panetta contributed $500 to Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), the most outspoken House Democrat on the redeployment of troops in Iraq. Panetta is a former Democratic congressman who served as President Clinton's chief of staff.

Other group members opened their wallets for politicians this fall, but most steered clear of endorsing candidates so publicly.

The bipartisan group, which is scheduled to release its highly anticipated recommendations on the Iraq war tomorrow, is expected to lobby Congress and the Bush administration to implement its proposals in the coming months.

Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.) played a leading role in the formation of the study group. On July 31, one of its members, Vernon Jordan, a former adviser to Clinton, contributed $500 to Wolf's 2006 opponent, Judy Feder (D). Wolf won, attracting 57 percent of the vote.

Leaked information about the study group's forthcoming recommendations has triggered criticism from some conservatives, who have mocked the idea of talking to Iran and Syria about resolving the Iraq conflict.

Fred Barnes, executive editor of the right-wing Weekly Standard magazine, has panned the study group for what he sees as a retreat mentality. Barnes and other conservatives believe Democrats and the national media will champion the recommendations.

The bipartisan 9/11 commission also came under fire from conservatives, though the GOP-led Congress did pass many of its recommendations. After commission members complained about the input that Congress ignored, GOP lawmakers returned fire, suggesting the panel leaned to the left.

Democrats have vowed to implement all of the 9/11 panel's proposals, though they may lack the votes to do so.

Six of the 10 members on the 9/11 commission made campaign contributions after they joined the panel. The 9/11 members agreed that they should not physically participate in partisan activities, but did not put any limitations on political giving.

It is unclear whether the ISG came to a similar agreement. A spokesman for the group did not comment for this article.

Of the 10 commission members, Jordan was the most generous to political war chests in the 2006 cycle, giving more than $36,000 in contributions, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com. He gave to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.), and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), among many others.

Yet political giving on the Iraq Study Group is not confined to Democrats. James Baker, co-chairman of the committee and chief of staff to former President George H.W. Bush, contributed $15,000 to the National Republican Senatorial Committee in April. The study group was launched on March 15.

Federal records indicated that former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.), the other co-chairman, did not make any political contributions during the 2006 cycle.

Former Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.), another study group member, gave campaign cash to Rep. Barbara Cubin (R-Wyo.) and Sens. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.), and Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) after joining the group.

At press time, Simpson told The Hill, "I give to people. What's new?" He added any article on the political giving of the ISG is "bt" and amounts to "extraneous crap."

He strongly defended the commission's work, noting each of the panelists signed on to every sentence in the forthcoming ISG report.

DOJ_NMG_0102379

The Iraq Study Group is supported by four expert working groups and a panel of senior retired military officers. Most of the members of these subgroups did not make political contributions since being appointed as SIG analysts.

The study group says that "it will make a forward-looking, independent assessment of the current and prospective situation on the ground in Iraq."

Baker, Panetta and Jordan did not comment by press time.

An Earmark With An Impact (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

One never knows what some lawmaker will insert into a spending bill without public scrutiny: a remote bridge, or maybe a bike path. Then there is the Iraq Study Group, better known as the Baker-Hamilton commission.

In the last year, lawmakers of both parties have criticized earmarks as fostering waste and corruption. But few are complaining about the Iraq Study Group, which will release its much-anticipated report on Wednesday.

Representative Frank R. Wolf, Republican of Virginia, created the commission single-handedly last year when he inserted a $1 million earmark into a supplemental spending bill for the war.

"The fact is that there were members of Congress who would have opposed it," Mr. Wolf said. "Should I have allowed that to stop me from doing what was in the best interest of the country?"

There Is Much More At Stake For America Than Iraq (FT)

By Zbigniew Brzezinski

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

This is the week in which a painful truth finally came calling on power in the Oval Office of the White House. The president, though still mouthing his self-reassuring slogans to the public, has on his desk two documents, each telling him in effect that "mission accomplished" has turned into mission bust.

Superficially, the two documents could not be more different. Donald Rumsfeld's memo on the conduct of the military operations in Iraq, submitted just prior to his sudden dismissal, is a very brief and highly personal summary of the various tactical adjustments that might be considered in the light of the setbacks in fighting the Iraqi insurgency. It conveys anxiety but offers no strategic alternative.

The long-awaited Baker-Hamilton Study Group report assessing broader US policy options in Iraq is a lengthy compromise statement reflecting a typical, middle-of-the-road consensus among an elite Washington "focus group", composed of esteemed individuals not handicapped by much historical or geopolitical familiarity with the region's problems.

Arguing for conditional military redeployment from Iraq, it offers sound advice on the desirability of wider diplomatic initiatives to engage Iraq's neighbours in a collective search for regional stability, including the belated need to tackle seriously the lingering Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The real importance of both documents is in what they do not say explicitly but implicitly convey: that the war has been a disaster; that the US must find a way to disengage by handing over the mess it created to the Iraqi leaders that the US itself had elevated to power; and that eventually the US may have to leave while blaming those same leaders for the US failure to cope. That notion is implicit even in some of Mr Rumsfeld's options and it is inherent in the 16-months deadline set by the Baker-Hamilton group for eventual US military disengagement.

Neither document faces squarely two basic and troubling realities: that since in Iraq (except for Kurdistan) real power is not in the hands of the Iraqi politicians resident in the US-protected Green Zone in Baghdad, any political solution must engage the Shia theocracy, with its militias; and that the longer the American occupation continues, the already declining US influence in the Middle East will give way to regional extremism and instability, especially if continuing indecision over the basic strategic choices in Iraq continue to be matched by US unwillingness to address the negative regional consequences of Israel's prolonged and increasingly repressive occupation of the Palestinians.

The combination of the two has already elevated Iran's geopolitical power in the region. Hence the need of the moment is not for tactical tinkering or long consensus reports. Can one imagine Charles de Gaulle in the late 1950s waiting weeks for a long study by French public figures on how to end the Algerian war that was damaging France's national unity and international reputation? Leadership derived from a sense of history requires sometimes the cutting of Gordian knots, not tying oneself up in knots.

The president, and America's political leadership, must recognise that the US role in the world is being gravely undermined by the policies launched more than three years ago. The destructive war in Iraq, the hypocritical indifference to the human dimensions of the stalemate in Israeli- Palestinian relations, the lack of diplomatic initiative in dealing with Iran and the frequent use of Islamophobic rhetoric are setting in motion forces that threaten to push America out of the Middle East, with dire consequences for itself and its friends in Egypt, Israel, Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

America needs a strategic change of course, and it has to be undertaken on a broad front. It must accept the fact that real leadership in Iraq should be based on a coalition of the Shia clergy commanding the loyalty of Shia militias and of the autonomous Kurds and that the sooner a date is set for US departure, the sooner the authentic Iraqi leaders will be able to enlist Iraq's neighbours in a wider regional effort to promote a more stable Iraq. It must also engage its allies in a joint definition of the basic parameters of an Israeli-Palestinian settlement, for the two parties to the conflict will never do so on their own. Last but not least, the US must be ready to pursue multilateral and bilateral talks with Iran, including regional security issues.

In brief, the immediate dilemma is Iraq but the larger stake is the future of the Middle East.

Blurring Political Lines In The Military Debate (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — No military expert was more forthright in opposing the Iraq war than Anthony C. Zinni.

General Zinni, a retired marine who once served as the top American military officer in the Middle East, contended that the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's Iraq was vastly overstated and that invading Iraq would be a burdensome distraction from the struggle against Al Qaeda.

These days General Zinni is delivering another provocative message: that leaving Iraq quickly would strengthen Iranian influence throughout the Middle East, create a sanctuary for terrorist groups, encourage even more sectarian strife in Iraq and risk turmoil in an oil-rich region.

"This is not Vietnam or Somalia or those places where you can walk away," General Zinni said in a recent interview. (He served in both countries.) "If we just pull out, we will find ourselves back in short order."

Instead, he says, the United States should leave open the door for a temporary increase in American troops, an argument he included in a broader plan prepared for the World Security Institute, a research organization, and made public on Monday. "It may be necessary to surge them for a short term," he said.

General Zinni noted that his position was similar to that of Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, a staunch supporter of the decision to invade. "I do believe more troops are required on the ground," the general said. "I believe what Senator McCain says."

The Iraq debate roiling Washington cuts across partisan divides and has led to some odd bedfellows. For example, the troop reduction and pullback options suggested by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in a memo written just before he resigned reflect some convergence between him and Democratic lawmakers who have criticized the war.

But for all the twists and turns, there is an underlying logic to the policy alignments.

Even before the Iraq war, Mr. Rumsfeld opposed sending large numbers of troops to Iraq, arguing that a large and lengthy presence would put the United States in the position of doing things that the Iraqis should be doing for themselves. He outlined his view shortly before the war in a speech in New York called "Beyond Nation Building," and it was reflected in his criticism of Gen. Eric Shinseki, the Army chief of staff at the time, who cautioned that hundreds of thousands of troops would be needed in postwar Iraq.

In offering new options for shrinking the American military footprint in Iraq, Mr. Rumsfeld, in his memo to the White House, was also giving expression to old policy predilections. His option to begin modest troop reductions to put pressure on the Iraqi government is very similar to the amendment sponsored by Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat and incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, though with one notable difference: the secretary has resisted the idea of a firm timeline.

So close is the parallel between some of Mr. Rumsfeld's favored options and the Democratic agenda that Senator John Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat and former presidential candidate, has all but claimed credit for them. "Look, everything in the Rumsfeld memo is a summary of things that I and others laid out three years ago," Senator Kerry said Sunday on CNN. "This is rather extraordinary."

As for General Zinni, he forcefully opposed the invasion of Iraq, in part because he thought it would undermine stability in the Middle East and because he was worried that holding a post-Hussein Iraq together would be a monumental enterprise. But now that the United States is in Iraq, he opposes a quick withdrawal for the same reasons.

The barrel-chested officer has a well-earned reputation for blunt talk and a tortured relationship with the Bush administration after a rocky stint in which he served as a special envoy to the Middle East. In his new paper on "The Future for Iraq," he argues that there is no easy fix. "We have missed too many opportunities," he writes, "and have created too much irreparable damage via the mistakes that were made, for that to be possible."

Having acknowledged that, he suggests economic, political, security and administrative steps to try to turn the situation around. His program calls for a new bipartisan steering group to ensure that American policies toward Iraq are efficiently carried out, job-creation programs for Iraqis, integration of Iraq's militias into government-supervised national guard units and encouragement for the Iraqi Army to promote civil affairs.

On American troop levels, General Zinni wrote that the United States has had too few forces to carry out effectively what the administration has called a "clear, hold and build" strategy, which, he explains, "requires holding and staying in an area long enough for the building process to be effective." While the American military is stretched thin, he writes, it could "with difficulty, support a short-term increase in force if the increase would provide the security momentum to jump-start other programs."

As difficult as it is to stabilize Iraq, General Zinni insists that the alternatives are worse.

Swiftly redeploying forces from Baghdad to safer areas in Iraq or Kuwait, for example, would leave the United States unable to influence events in the capital and the volatile heartland, he said.

Extracting American forces altogether, he said, is unrealistic in the short term. Iraq under the sway of extremists, he asserted, could encourage instability in the Persian Gulf. The stakes are so high, he said, that if the fighting in Iraq expands into a major civil war the United States may need to consider intervening to try to quell the fighting instead of leaving.

"We made a mess in the worst possible place we could have made a mess," he said in the interview. "We took an Iran that was contained, and now its influence is stretched through Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and into Palestinian territories.

"You can't be in the region for security reasons and not deal with the biggest security problem that you created in effect. I don't see how you walk away from this one." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

When Iraq Went Wrong (NYT)

By Tim Pritchard

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

London

OF the many tasks that faced the Iraq Study Group, which is to release its report tomorrow, perhaps the most vexing was pinpointing the exact moment when everything in Iraq started to go wrong. How did scenes of joyful Iraqis pulling down Saddam Hussein's statue so quickly turn into images of car bombings, grieving mothers and burning helicopters?

Some of those who appeared before the panel argued that it had been a mistake to disband the Iraqi Army after the military victory. Others said there had not been enough troops on the ground to secure and stabilize Iraq. The problem with such analyses is their tendency to treat the invasion and the post-invasion period as separate entities.

That is, the invasion is generally portrayed as well planned and executed, while the post-invasion strategy is characterized as poorly thought out and undermanned. The idea is that hidden somewhere in the weeks and months following the arrival of American forces in Baghdad lies a magic moment when Iraq somehow began to descend into chaos.

In fact, the short fight to get to Baghdad and the long one in which coalition forces have been engaged ever since have much in common. All the information about the nature of the trouble to come was apparent from the very first days of the war. If lessons learned then had been incorporated into military and political thinking, it would have injected a much needed dose of realism at an early stage.

Those lessons were best synthesized in a little-known but bloody battle, fought in an obscure part of Iraq on Day 4 of the war. It was a battle that America nearly lost.

It was dawn on March 23, 2003, when marines from Task Force Tarawa approached the town of Nasiriya, in southern Iraq. They had been given a routine task: taking two key bridges to open up a route to Baghdad. Nasiriya was a predominantly Shiite town that had rebelled against Saddam Hussein during the Persian Gulf war. It was assumed that as soon as the Americans rolled into town, the city's defenders would lay down their weapons and, as one Marine commander told me, "put flowers in our gun barrels, hold up their babies for us to kiss and give us the keys to the city."

But when Task Force Tarawa's lead units reached the outskirts they came across the burnt-out remnants of several vehicles of the Army's 507th Maintenance Company. A captain in the 507th told wide-eyed Marine commanders how his convoy had taken a wrong turn at night, driven into Nasiriya and been attacked by Iraqi fighters. Several soldiers were still missing in the city, including a young private, Jessica Lynch.

It was the fate of the missing Jessica Lynch that attracted America's attention in the days following. But it's what happened to the marines of Task Force Tarawa that is most instructive about the true nature of the Iraq war.

As Marine units moved into the city, they were attacked by large numbers of Iraqi fighters. To their surprise, few of the Iraqi combatants seemed to be wearing military uniforms. Many were dressed in the loose-fitting black clothing worn by Shiite

Muslims, and much of the gunfire came from dwellings flying black flags denoting them as Shiite homes. And yet the Shiites were supposed to be on the Americans' side.

What's more, as the marines were drawn into a raging battle in the city center, more and more people came out of ordinary homes to take up arms. One group of young American troops, who became separated from the rest of their unit and were forced to commandeer a house in the middle of the city, found themselves under attack for several hours from what appeared to be armed civilians. They had been expecting to fight Iraqi soldiers. Instead they found themselves shooting at old men, women, even children.

Of course, there were fanatical Sunni Saddam Fedayeen troops, as well as some desperate foreign jihadis, who fought that day. But untold hundreds of those who picked up weapons were simply civilians intent on defending homes against foreign invaders. The potent and complex mix of insurgency — Sunni and Shiite militants, foreign fighters and civilians — that causes such chaos in Iraq today was already apparent during the battle of Nasiriya.

Intelligence about the terrain was also sorely lacking. Marine tanks spearheading the maneuver took a route that led to a marsh where they sank, mired uselessly in thick mud, while the battle raged. It's more than just a metaphor for coalition forces getting bogged down, post-invasion, in towns like Falluja and Samarra. It was the product of a rush to arms without adequate intelligence or planning.

At one stage, in a "friendly fire" incident, Air Force planes fired at marines on the ground, killing up to 10. Radio communications repeatedly failed. Units lost contact with each other. Faced with an increasingly determined enemy, Marine commanders thought they might just lose the battle. This showed another truth, obscured during the march to Baghdad, but that has become strikingly apparent since: there is a limit to what armor and technology can do against a people with faith and who fight because they feel their country has been violated.

There were other incidents in Nasiriya, minor at the time, that foreshadowed events that would become an international embarrassment. At one point, a Marine commander came across a gruesome scene: young marines, standing over a pile of Iraqi corpses, taking photos of each other, thumbs up and grinning inanely to camera. It took only a year for the first photos of American soldiers grinning over the bodies of abused Iraqi prisoners to appear.

BUT what was most striking at Nasiriya in those very early days of the war was the refusal of freedom-deprived Iraqis to come forward and support coalition forces. At best, the civilians stood by and watched the American war machine thunder into town. At worst, they ran to arms stashes, grabbed AK-47s and took to the streets. Four days into the invasion, and already, instead of coming together, Iraqis were falling back into their faiths and tribes and killing coalition forces and each other.

Eighteen marines died in Nasiriya that March day, in what turned out to be the bloodiest phase of the invasion. Four days later the city was finally declared secure. Two weeks after that, American forces triumphantly entered Baghdad and helped topple Saddam Hussein's statue. Everyone lauded the speed and efficiency with which United States forces had fought their way to Baghdad. The trauma of Nasiriya was forgotten.

And that was a shame. If the details of what happened at Nasiriya had been gathered, recognized and analyzed more soberly early on, instead of trampled on in a rush of triumphalism, coalition forces might have learned useful lessons for the reconstruction of Iraq: the limits of military power, the importance of a proper understanding of the complexity of a place and its people, the perils of underestimating an enemy. Instead, of course, President Bush stood on the deck of the aircraft carrier Abraham Lincoln and made his hubristic speech announcing the end of combat operations under a banner announcing "Mission Accomplished."

The battle of Nasiriya taught that there was, contrary to first appearances, no simple route to Baghdad. It should also serve to remind those in Washington that there will be no simple route out of it. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Warner Wants Dems In War Debate (CLE)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

The Columbus Ledger-Enquirer, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - A leading Senate Republican on defense issues, Sen. John Warner, will call on President Bush to solicit privately the opinions of Democrats before forging a new strategy on Iraq.

Warner in an opening statement Tuesday to Robert Gates' confirmation hearing as defense secretary will say there is a "moral obligation" for the president to seek out the views of Democrats.

A copy of the Virginia senators prepared remarks were obtained late Monday by The Associated Press.

Gates is being considered to take over the Pentagon as Bush is rethinking his policy in Iraq and awaits the recommendations of an independent bipartisan panel. Bush also launched an internal assessment of U.S. options and says he will consider both studies before making any decisions.

"After the President has had the opportunity to review these important reports, I respectfully recommend that he privately consult with the bipartisan leadership of the new Congress before making his final decisions," Warner said.

Warner later adds: "To me, this fulfills the moral obligation that our government has to the brave men and women of the armed forces and their families, who have sacrificed so very, very much in this fight for freedom," Warner said.

While several Republicans, including Warner, have urged a bipartisan approach in crafting a new Iraq policy, Warner's statement is the strongest indication yet that he and perhaps other key Republicans will challenge Bush when it comes to the war.

Warner is stepping down as chairman of the Armed Services Committee when Democrats take charge next year but is expected to remain a key player on the Iraq debate.

Warner and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will take over the panel next year, vowed to generate a bipartisan resolution or legislation that would address the situation in Iraq.

On Oct. 5, Warner returned from a trip to Iraq to declare the war was "drifting sideways." If the situation did not improve within the next three months, the U.S. must reconsider its options, he said.

"Regrettably, the levels of violence have continued to escalate, and the ability of Prime Minister (Nouri al-Maliki) and his government to exercise fully the reins of sovereignty remains an enormous challenge," Warner said in the prepared statement.

Rumsfeld Memo Developed Over Weeks (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, December 5, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's secret memo to President Bush offering new approaches in Iraq was developed over a period of weeks, according to a newly declassified cover letter.

The letter, obtained by The Associated Press on Monday, also said that Rumsfeld had instructed Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander for U.S. forces in the Middle East, to assemble his own group "some time ago" to consider new approaches in Iraq — "since war plans of this type" are the responsibility of Abizaid's command.

There has been no public disclosure of recommendations from the Abizaid group.

The letter, addressed to Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Stephen Hadley, the president's national security adviser, was transmitted with the memo and dated Nov. 6, two days before Rumsfeld resigned.

The cover letter was declassified Monday by Rumsfeld.

The options paper remains classified secret, although its contents were published in full by the New York Times on Sunday and authenticated by Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff.

Some in Congress have questioned the timing of Rumsfeld's memo outlining "illustrative new course of action" in Iraq, suggesting that it came to light as a way of defending Rumsfeld's reputation as he was about to leave office.

The Rumsfeld cover letter makes clear that he had been working on the options paper for some weeks.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said Monday she viewed the memo as inconsistent with Rumsfeld's recent congressional testimony, and she said he should have shared these suggestions with Congress many months ago.

"The memo by Secretary Rumsfeld and the leaking of it very much reminded me of a strategy of trying to leave office saying that you actually had a lot of good plans that were different than your public utterances," Collins said.

In the options paper, Rumsfeld declared, "In my view it is time for a major adjustment" in Iraq. He had previously stated publicly the current policy is not working well enough or fast enough, but he had not called for major change.

Rumsfeld did not recommend any particular new course of action but enumerated about 20 possible alternative courses, including to begin modest withdrawals of U.S. forces "so Iraqis know they have to pull up their socks, step up and take responsibility for their country."

Other options included an accelerated drawdown of U.S. military bases in Iraq; having U.S. forces provide security only for those provinces or cities that openly request U.S. help; and positioning substantially more U.S. troops near the Iranian and Syrian borders to reduce infiltration of foreign fighters.

In the cover letter accompanying the secret memo, Rumsfeld wrote that he and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, had mentioned to Bush "a number of weeks ago" that they were considering alternative approaches for Iraq.

"It is clear that the current path in Iraq is not working well enough or fast enough. Change is needed," Rumsfeld wrote.

The defense secretary said he had given his options paper to Pace to use as a "discussion piece" with the chiefs of the military services. He said Pace and the chiefs have been discussing various options on their own.

U.S. Military Shifts Troops In Iraq Into Advisory Roles (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Edward Wong

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 2 — American commanders in Iraq are already shifting thousands of combat troops into advisory positions with Iraqi Army and police units, especially in the capital, in their latest attempt to bring sectarian violence under control.

Changes in troop assignments over just the past three weeks included moving about 1,000 American soldiers in Baghdad from traditional combat roles to serve as trainers and advisers to Iraqi units, senior American officers said in interviews here. Commanders say they believe that a major influx of American advisers can add spine and muscle to Iraqi units that will help them to move into the lead in improving security.

The troops have been reassigned by commanders, who have not sought additional combat troops to replace them. While the troops have not been through the special program for trainers set up by the military, they are working in their areas of expertise, commanders said.

American generals in Iraq have made the reassignments in recent weeks even though President Bush and his senior national security advisers have not yet made a formal decision about whether to expand the American contingent sent to Iraq specifically to serve on military training teams.

Before the transfers began, between 4,000 and 5,000 troops had been assigned to about 400 training teams.

Increasing the number of American trainers for the Iraqi military and the police is among the recommendations expected on Wednesday from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which Mr. Bush has said he wishes to review before announcing a future course in Iraq.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, told Congress last month that he envisioned doubling the number of American trainers, but senior military officers now say they are drawing up plans that would at least triple the number of troops assigned to training.

Maj. Gen. Joseph F. Fil Jr., the commander of the First Cavalry Division, which assumed control of Baghdad in the middle of November, pulled troops from his own force for those assignments without requesting replacements to make up for those joining Iraqi units, officers here said.

Similarly, Maj. Gen. Benjamin R. Mixon, commander of the 25th Infantry Division, based in Tikrit in north-central Iraq, said he was planning to add 2,000 trainers to Iraqi units in his area by transferring troops from his combat ranks. General Mixon, who discussed his plan on Friday during a visit by General Abizaid to Tikrit, said he, too, believed he could increase the number of American trainers without asking for more American troops.

Before any expansions, the average number of troops serving on one of the teams was 11 members at the battalion level, 11 at the brigade level and 15 at the division level, said Brig. Gen. Dana J. H. Pittard, who oversees the Americans training the Iraqi Army, elite police units and border guards.

"We're going to double, triple, quadruple the size of the transition teams," General Pittard said on a recent visit to the main training base for the Iraqi Army, in a windswept area called Kirkush near the Iranian border.

At the training base, a 15-member team working with the top commanders of the Fifth Iraqi Army Division recently bolstered their numbers with a platoon from a combat unit of the 82nd Airborne Division. If security improves, American commanders might transfer more people from combat units to the training mission, said Col. David Puster, the leader of the division-level team. "They'll have to come from resources in the country," the colonel said. "As you stand up the teams, you stand down the combat units."

The goal is to create platoon-size teams of 20 to 30 advisers for each Iraqi battalion. The larger teams would also have communications specialists capable of such tasks as calling in airstrikes and medical evacuations, Pentagon officials say. American officers in Iraq say expanding the teams could also allow trainers to work more intimately with Iraqi soldiers, down to the company level.

The teams would also be able to watch more closely for sectarian biases and human rights abuses.

At the same time, though, commanders acknowledge that the plan of moving American forces from direct combat roles to training and advising carries risks, especially as some Bush administration officials and military officers say the Baghdad security operation already is short by four Iraqi brigades, or approximately 5,000 Iraqi troops.

"Our plan is shaping up over the next three or four months where we will reposition troops within Iraq, perhaps to increase the numbers in Baghdad as needed," said one senior military officer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was discussing future planning.

Asked whether stabilizing Baghdad would require pulling American forces from other contested areas to fill the deficit in forces — in particular whether American troops could be spared from the Sunni base of Anbar Province — the senior officer said only, "We will try and keep our head above water in Anbar."

But General Abizaid said that any current shortage in combat troop numbers for the Baghdad security mission should be filled by Iraqi forces.

"The Baghdad security situation requires more Iraqi troops," General Abizaid said in an interview. "And that's the direction we are heading right now."

Senior officers here said that the Iraqi Army, however imperfect, was better suited for quelling sectarian violence than Iraq's national and local police, and that it was more respected by the Iraqi populace.

"The Iraqi Army has the opportunity to be the single institution that can elevate the narrative beyond regional, local, religious interests," said Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, the senior commander of the training program. "And in most cases they are succeeding in doing so, in other words becoming that institution of national unity."

Commanders say that national police units — which have been infiltrated by sectarian militias — are being pulled out of the fight unit by unit for retraining and, in some cases, the assignment of new commanders, with Iraqi Army units taking over their duties in the interim.

The risks to American troops of working as trainers away from the security of larger American units were underscored early last month, when a staff sergeant and two team leaders — a lieutenant colonel and his replacement — were killed in a single attack in Baghdad.

Another risk is that operations carried out with Iraqi security forces in the lead may be less effective and result in more casualties among Iraqi security forces and civilians than with the better-trained American troops. Thus, American units will step back from the frontlines, but would remain on standby to respond should Iraqi units get in trouble.

There is also some concern that pushing Iraqi units to the front may result in atrocities by corrupt or sectarian Iraqi units.

Commanders said they were drawing up a set of "red lines" that, if crossed by Iraqi forces, would require American troops to return to the fight in those areas. Officers declined to provide many details, but said that, for example, kidnappings or killings by units in Iraqi security uniforms would be countered by immediate American action.

4 U.S. Troops Killed In Helicopter Crash (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 4 — Four American troops were killed when a military helicopter broke down while flying over a lake in Anbar Province in western Iraq and made an emergency landing on the shore, American military officials said Monday.

The military said the craft, Marine Corps CH-46 Sea Knight troop transport helicopter with 16 people and equipment on board, was flying over Lake Qadisiya, near Haditha, on Sunday when it began to experience mechanical difficulties. The pilots brought the twin-rotor helicopter down in a controlled maneuver and guided it to the water's edge, according to Lt. Col. Josslyn L. Aberle, a military spokeswoman in Baghdad.

The mechanical failures were not caused by an enemy attack, officials said; they did not give further details.

In the minutes after the accident, 13 of the people on board were accounted for, including one marine whose body was recovered from the water. The bodies of the three other victims were recovered in the lake on Monday during an intensive search that included air, amphibious and diving teams, officials said.

Noting that the investigation was continuing, military officials declined to explain how the victims ended up in the water.

A number of military helicopters have crashed in Iraq, usually because of mechanical failure or enemy attack. One of the most deadly incidents for American troops since the invasion was the crash of a Marine helicopter near the Jordanian border in Anbar Province in January 2005, which killed 31.

Last week, an American F-16 jet on a combat mission crashed west of Baghdad. Though the pilot's body has not been recovered, the military has listed him as dead.

Elsewhere, Shiite gunmen planted explosives in a Sunni Arab mosque in the northern Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriya on Sunday afternoon and shattered its blue dome, Sunni officials said on Monday. The building, called the Nidaa Allah Mosque, was empty during the attack, and the explosion caused no casualties, according to a local cleric, Said Ahmed Mohammad.

For several months, Shiite death squads have been waging a bloody campaign of violence and intimidation in Hurriya to drive Sunni Arabs from the neighborhood, Sunni officials say. The Nidaa Allah Mosque was one of four Sunni mosques in Hurriya that came under assault during a wave of reprisal attacks by Shiite gunmen following a series of car bombings on Nov. 23 that killed more than 200 people in Sadr City.

According to Mr. Mohammad, the mosque's imam and his family abandoned the mosque on Nov. 25 and it has sat empty since then. In a photograph of the sandstone-colored mosque taken on Sunday and distributed by the American military, the dome was broken like an egg shell and pocked with holes from the bullets of automatic gunfire.

In Falluja, two civilians were killed and two wounded when a gun battle erupted on Monday between Sunni Arab insurgents and an American military patrol in the Nazal district of the city, a local police official said.

A bomb exploded in the southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora on Monday, killing a child and wounding two civilians, an Interior Ministry official said, and at least 52 dumped bodies were found around the capital. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Emergency Helicopter Landing Kills 4 U.S. Troops (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 4 -- Four American troops were killed over the weekend when their helicopter made an emergency landing in a lake in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said on Monday.

Their deaths bring to 14 the number of U.S. troops killed across Iraq so far this month. Over the weekend, eight of those deaths occurred in western Iraq's Anbar province, a base for Sunni Arab insurgent groups and the deadliest area of the country for U.S. troops.

"There's always been a tough fight going on in Anbar province, and it continues to be so," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman.

In recent months, U.S. troops have stepped up efforts to quell reprisal killings between Sunnis and Shiites and tamp down insurgent activity. On Monday morning, they killed two suspected insurgents and captured six in a raid in northern Baghdad, according to a military statement. They also destroyed a vehicle packed with explosives in that operation.

The CH-46 helicopter that went down in Lake Qadisiyah on Sunday had 16 troops on board. One Marine was recovered from the water but could not be resuscitated. The bodies of three service members -- one each from the Marines, the Army and the Air Force -- were found in a subsequent search, the military said.

"We have recovered all of our comrades," Marine Lt. Col. Bryan Salas said in an e-mailed statement. "Our thoughts and prayers are with the families of the deceased."

The mayor of Haditha, Ibraheem al-Bayati, and Iraqi army Lt. Hussein Muslih said the helicopter had been shot down by insurgents with machine guns as it was taking off from the town, located near the Euphrates River.

A group that calls itself the Islamic State of Iraq posted a sign on a nearby mosque in Haditha announcing that the helicopter had 30 passengers on board and had been downed, according to a resident who read the sign.

The U.S. military strongly denied that machine-gun fire brought down the helicopter, saying that the aircraft experienced mechanical difficulties.

"The guys who own the helicopter say it is under investigation and that there is no evidence that it is the result of enemy action," Garver said.

The military is still investigating the crash in Anbar last week of an F-16 fighter jet that killed a U.S. Air Force major. Enemy fire was not suspected.

The first days of December have also been deadly for Iraqi civilians.

On Sunday, a 5-year-old girl was shot during an attack on coalition forces and Iraqi national police in the al-Doura district of Baghdad, according to the U.S. military. The girl was taken to a military hospital in the Green Zone, which houses the Iraqi government and U.S. and British embassies. She later died from her injuries, the military said.

In Baqubah, a group of men opened fire on four employees of Diyala province's agricultural office as they drove to work Monday morning. The driver and three of the employees died, police said. Gunmen also shot and killed a taxi driver in central Baqubah, police said.

In Baghdad, a news editor at an Iraqi radio station was shot and killed on his way to work, the Associated Press reported. Nabil Ibrahim al-Dulaim, a Sunni, was married with two young daughters, the news agency said. His death brings to 93 the number of journalists killed in Iraq since the war began, according to the Paris-based group Reporters Without Borders.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. on Monday condemned the recent car bombings and sectarian killings. Their statement was partially a response to a triple car bombing that struck a food market in the majority Shiite neighborhood of Sadriyah on Saturday, killing more than 60 people.

"The true enemies of all Iraqis are the murderers who carry out these senseless and cowardly attacks, regardless of sect, tribe or ethnicity," they said. "They are terrified of progress in this country and are determined to sow sectarian discord for their own selfish agenda."

Census Counts 100,000 Contractors In Iraq (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

There are about 100,000 government contractors operating in Iraq, not counting subcontractors, a total that is approaching the size of the U.S. military force there, according to the military's first census of the growing population of civilians operating in the battlefield.

The survey finding, which includes Americans, Iraqis and third-party nationals hired by companies operating under U.S. government contracts, is significantly higher and wider in scope than the Pentagon's only previous estimate, which said there were 25,000 security contractors in the country.

It is also 10 times the estimated number of contractors that deployed during the Persian Gulf War in 1991, reflecting the Pentagon's growing post-Cold War reliance on contractors for such jobs as providing security, interrogating prisoners, cooking meals, fixing equipment and constructing bases that were once reserved for soldiers.

Official numbers are difficult to find, said Deborah D. Avant, author of the 2005 book "The Market for Force: The Consequences of Privatizing Security," but an estimated 9,200 contractors deployed during the Gulf War, a far shorter conflict without reconstruction projects. "This is the largest deployment of U.S. contractors in a military operation," said Avant, an associate professor at George Washington University.

In addition to about 140,000 U.S. troops, Iraq is now filled with a hodgepodge of contractors. DynCorp International has about 1,500 employees in Iraq, including about 700 helping train the police force. Blackwater USA has more than 1,000 employees in the country, most of them providing private security. Kellogg, Brown and Root, one of the largest contractors in Iraq, said it does not delineate its workforce by country but that it has more than 50,000 employees and subcontractors working in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait. MPRI, a unit of L-3 Communications, has about 500 employees working on 12 contracts, including providing mentors to the Iraqi Defense Ministry for strategic planning, budgeting and establishing its public affairs office. Titan, another L-3 division, has 6,500 linguists in the country.

The Pentagon's latest estimate "further demonstrates the need for Congress to finally engage in responsible, serious and aggressive oversight over the questionable and growing U.S. practice of private military contracting," said Rep. Janice D. Schakowsky (D-Ill.), who has been critical of the military's reliance on contractors.

About 650 contractors have died in Iraq since 2003, according to Labor Department statistics.

Central Command, which conducted the census, said a breakdown by nationality or job description was not immediately available because the project is still in its early stages. "This is the first time we have initiated a census of this robustness," Lt. Col. Julie Wittkoff, chief of the contracting branch at Central Command, said in an interview. Those figures do not include subcontractors, which could substantially grow the figure.

In June, government agencies were asked to provide data about contractors working for them in Iraq, including their nationality, a description of their work and locations where they were working. The information was provided by more than a dozen entities within the Pentagon and a dozen outside agencies, including the departments of State and Interior, Wittkoff said. The count increased about 15 percent from about 87,000 since Central Command began keeping a tally this summer, she said, though the increase may reflect ongoing data collection efforts. The census will be updated quarterly, Wittkoff said.

Three years into the war, the headcount represents one of the Pentagon's most concrete efforts so far toward addressing the complexities and questions raised by the large numbers of civilians who have flooded into Iraq to work. With few industry standards, the military and contractors have sometimes lacked coordination, resulting in friendly fire incidents, according to a Government Accountability Office report last year.

"It takes a great deal of vigilance on the part of the military commander to ensure contractor compliance," said William L. Nash, a retired Army general and a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. "If you're trying to win hearts and minds and the contractor is driving 90 miles per hour through the streets and running over kids, that's not helping the image of the American army. The Iraqis aren't going to distinguish between a contractor and a soldier."

The census gives military commanders insight into the contractors operating in their region and the type of work they are doing, Wittkoff said. "It helps the combatant commanders have a better idea of . . . food and medical requirements they may need to provide to support the contractors," she said.

Journalists Acquitted In Iraq WMD Case (AP)

By Jan M. Olsen

AP, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102388

Three Danish journalists who published classified intelligence reports on Iraq's former weapons program were acquitted Monday on charges of endangering national security.

The Copenhagen City Court ruled that Niels Lunde, chief editor of the Berlingske Tidende newspaper, and reporters Michael Bjerre and Jesper Larsen acted in the public interest when they published a series of articles in 2004 citing leaked Danish intelligence reports.

The articles said there was no evidence Iraq had weapons of mass destruction at the time of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, one of the key reasons cited by the U.S. and Britain for going to war.

A former intelligence officer previously has been sentenced to four months in prison for leaking the documents in the case, which was viewed in Denmark as a landmark test of media freedom.

Lunde called the verdict "a great victory for the open society." Prosecutor Michael Joergensen said he had not yet decided whether to appeal.

Joergensen had recommended that each of the defendants be given a four-month prison term — the same sentence that former intelligence officer Frank Grevil received after he was convicted last year of leaking the documents to the reporters.

Judge Peter Lind Larsen said the "considerable public interest" in the information outweighed the government's concerns that its intelligence-gathering operations were jeopardized.

Press freedom advocates welcomed the decision, which was met with applause in the packed court room.

"In Denmark, we have today thoroughly underlined that journalists, media have an extensive freedom of expression," said Mogens Blicher Bjerregaard, head of the Danish Union of Journalists.

Troops Needed To Fight Taliban (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, December 5, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — The outgoing U.S. commander in Afghanistan warned that the fight against the Taliban is in danger of being undermined by a shortage of NATO troops and by restrictions that keep some alliance forces out of combat.

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry said in an interview that NATO countries need to contribute more troops and that some of them must drop “caveats” that prevent their forces from fighting freely.

The restrictions risk driving a wedge in the NATO alliance between forces that fight and those that don't, Eikenberry said.

“Could you have an alliance in which you have one group that is always going into the toughest places and fighting and taking casualties, and you have a second group that is in a different category?” Eikenberry said over the weekend. “Over the next several years, that is something that could be a challenge if it is not addressed.”

The United States and other countries have been pushing for the removal of caveats as they try to send troops to fight the raging insurgency in southern and eastern Afghanistan. At a summit last week in the Latvian capital, Riga, the NATO countries operating in Afghanistan agreed to come to each other's aid in an emergency, ignoring any caveats. The NATO commander in Afghanistan defines what constitutes an emergency.

Eikenberry's comments indicate caveats remain a worry as NATO has assumed a larger role in Afghanistan. The United States this year handed over military responsibility for all of Afghanistan to a 32,000-strong NATO force, which previously had operated in the country's relatively secure north and western regions. Eikenberry said the transition to NATO command had gone smoothly. Afghanistan is the alliance's first deployment outside Europe.

Eikenberry is worried about the caveats and about NATO's troop strength, which is at 90% of the level NATO says is required. “The objective has got to be to get to the 100% level,” he said.

The caveats require NATO to put more troops in the field to compensate for the countries that are prevented by their governments from joining in combat.

The full list of caveats is secret to prevent Taliban militants from exploiting NATO weaknesses.

Restrictions are sometimes imposed by governments wary about casualties. German forces in Afghanistan, for instance, have been ordered to avoid combat and rarely venture outside their outposts for long patrols, according to an August report by the Congressional Research Service. Other limitations result from lack of equipment or training.

Romanian forces that share a base with U.S. troops in Qalat, the capital of southern Afghanistan's restive Zabul province, don't have vehicles that can handle the region's rugged terrain. Lengthier patrols are carried out by U.S. troops in Humvees.

“Commanders on the ground are best served if all their forces do not have caveats that place operational constraints on them,” Eikenberry said. “Any caveats that would restrict combat forces from being able to maneuver or to be deployed anywhere within Afghanistan for any kind of combat operation … are the ones of greatest concern.”

DOJ_NMG_0102389

Close to wrapping up an 18-month tour as U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Eikenberry also said Afghanistan's broken-down infrastructure — particularly its roads — needed more repair than the United States and its allies realized after ousting the Taliban regime in late 2001.

Pentagon Resists Pleas For Help In Afghan Opium Fight (LAT)

By Josh Meyer,

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

The DEA wants the military to take a larger role in stopping the drug trade, which experts say finances the insurgency.

— The Pentagon, engaged in a difficult fight to defeat a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, has resisted entreaties from U.S. anti-narcotics officials to play an aggressive role in the faltering campaign to curb the country's opium trade.

Military units in Afghanistan largely overlook drug bazaars, rebuff some requests to take U.S. drug agents on raids and do little to counter the organized crime syndicates shipping the drug to Europe, Asia and, increasingly, the United States, according to officials and documents.

While the Pentagon and the Drug Enforcement Administration, or the DEA, have been at odds, poppy cultivation has exploded, increasing by more than half this year. Afghanistan supplies about 92% of the world's opium, and traffickers reap an estimated $2.3 billion in annual profits.

"It is surprising to me that we have allowed things to get to the point that they have," said Robert B. Charles, a former top State Department counter-narcotics official. "It we do not act aggressively against the narcotics threat now, all gains made to date will be washed out to sea."

The bumper crop of opium poppies, much of it from Taliban strongholds in southern Afghanistan, finances the insurgency the U.S. is trying to dismantle.

The DEA's advocates in Congress argue that the Pentagon could undermine the insurgency by combating the drugs that help finance it. Military officials say they can spare no resources from the task of fighting the Taliban and its allies.

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has said that Afghanistan's flourishing opium trade is a law enforcement problem, not a military one. It would be "mission creep" if the 21,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan were to turn their attention to opium, and it would also set a precedent for future combat operations, military officials say.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Afghanistan's police forces and British troops in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization peacekeeping operation have the primary responsibility for fighting the Afghan drug problem.

Military officials also fear that cracking down on opium traffickers could alienate the Afghan people and warlords who profit from the trade. An estimated one-eighth of the population is involved in poppy cultivation, and the opium trade is one-third of the country's economy.

The Pentagon has cooperated some with the DEA, but its resistance to doing more has drawn criticism from prominent congressmen, including Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the International Relations Committee.

Hyde and other lawmakers say the Bush administration is making a crucial mistake in not directing U.S. forces to collaborate with the DEA to take down those supplying the Taliban with cash, high-tech weapons and trucks.

"If we don't change the policy soon, and fight both drugs and terrorism simultaneously, Afghanistan may well fall into a failed narcotics state status," Hyde said in a statement.

Hyde has urged the White House and the Pentagon to look to Colombia as a model. Anti-narcotics agents there work closely with the military to target terrorism and drug trafficking.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai and other officials have asked for more help from the Pentagon, especially stronger support for the DEA.

"We are disappointed that there isn't more and closer cooperation between these two," said M. Ashraf Haidari, Afghanistan's Washington liaison to U.S. military and law enforcement agencies. "We have been saying this since 2003."

Haidari said the DEA and Afghan authorities needed "maximum military support both from ground and air." He complained that there was little coordination between the U.S. and international anti-drug efforts in Afghanistan.

The DEA has about 10 agents in Kabul, the Afghan capital, and rotates small teams of agents and intelligence analysts into the country, two at a time. The teams train and work with Afghan narcotics police, but also do their own investigations.

But DEA agents can't move about the mountainous terrain without helicopters and, in many cases, can't penetrate well-protected drug operations without backup from troops.

Several dozen kingpins have emerged in the Afghan drug trade who are allied with the Taliban and Al Qaeda, current and former U.S. and Afghan officials said. In the last year, the drug bosses have become more brazen, richer and powerful.

U.S. and Afghan officials say the major traffickers and their hundreds of criminal associates prey on poor Afghan poppy farmers, openly run huge opium bazaars and labs that turn opium into heroin, and truck vast quantities of drugs into neighboring countries. They often return with night-vision goggles, land mines, sniper rifles and other high-tech weapons to use against U.S. and NATO forces.

Antonio Maria Costa, head of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, said in a recent interview that the location of major drug operations were "well-known to us and to the authorities." He said he recently watched a video of a heavily armed drug convoy of about 20 vehicles crossing into Iran.

"When you see narcotics trafficking that has the connotation of military operations, I am afraid we can only cope with them with military muscle," he said.

U.S. efforts have largely focused on small drug arrests and the State Department's program to eradicate poppy fields.

Publicly, DEA officials praise the Pentagon for its help and say coordination has improved. But two senior congressional aides said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy had been quietly campaigning for more Pentagon assistance.

"Behind closed doors she has been very adamant about how we need this stuff over there," a DEA official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Without the helicopters, we can't move. We're sure not going to go out in caravans with a couple of pistols."

Tandy testified in June that although DEA agents had developed leads in Afghanistan, the agency had "no operational infrastructure, assets or support to conduct operations" in Helmand province, where as much as half of Afghan heroin is grown and processed.

The Pentagon has promised as many as eight MI-17 helicopters for Afghan authorities to use in collaboration with U.S. military and law enforcement officials. But only two have arrived and are being used solely for training, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said. DEA officials cannot say when helicopters will be available for drug operations, he said.

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Todd Vician said that in the last two years U.S. troops had worked to support DEA efforts to combat the drug trade in Afghanistan "in the form of intelligence, planning, transportation of interdiction forces, medical evacuation and close air support if needed."

He also said Rumsfeld had authorized federal authorities, including DEA agents, to go on military operations in areas of known or suspected drug activity.

But in many cases the Pentagon has balked at drug interdiction efforts even when it had the resources, said a former senior U.S. anti-drug official, who declined to give details of what he said were classified operations.

"There were [drug] convoys where military people looked the other way, and situations where DEA sought [Pentagon] intelligence and it wasn't given to them," the former official said.

"DEA would identify a lab to go hit or a storage facility and [the Pentagon] would find a reason to ground the helicopters," the former official added. "They would say we don't want you to create a disturbance in an area where we're trying to chase down terrorists and the Taliban."

A recent congressional report said the DEA asked the Pentagon for airlifts on 26 occasions in 2005, and was denied in all but three cases. The Pentagon said it had done better in 2006, supporting 12 of 14 DEA requests for air support.

Several current and former DEA officials said the Pentagon efforts were mostly administrative and not related to raids and other enforcement efforts.

Hyde and Rep. Mark Steven Kirk (R-Ill.), a former naval intelligence officer, told Rumsfeld in an Oct. 12 letter that they wanted the Pentagon to allow DEA agents to ride along on more military missions in Afghanistan and to call them in when soldiers found a large drug stash or operation.

Eight days later, Rumsfeld wrote that he had asked one of his undersecretaries, Eric S. Edelman, "to look into this matter."

"We will get back to you as soon as possible," Rumsfeld wrote.

Hyde's aides say the congressman hasn't heard back.

NTSB Faults Pentagon In '04 Afghan Crash (USAT)

By Alan Levin And Matt Kelley,

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Poor Defense Department oversight of private companies that fly military missions in war zones was partially responsible for a 2004 crash that killed six people in Afghanistan, federal accident investigators said Monday.

The National Transportation Safety Board recommended that the Defense Department coordinate with the Federal Aviation Administration to better monitor the charter flights increasingly being used to carry small numbers of troops and cargo in Iraq and Afghanistan.

An NTSB statement said the agency is “concerned that the unique risks presented by operations in remote overseas locations have not been adequately addressed for civilian contractors that provide air transportation services to the U.S. military.”

DOJ_NMG_0102391

The flight was operated by Presidential Airways of Melbourne, Fla., a part of the same company as Blackwater USA, a private security firm assisting private companies and the military in war zones.

Pilots on the CASA 212 twin-turboprop were flying over a remote mountainous region of Afghanistan on Nov. 27, 2004, when they entered a tight canyon ringed by peaks as high as 16,580 feet. They tried to climb over the mountains, but crashed at 14,650 feet, the NTSB said.

The pilots had not used oxygen, as is required when flying over 10,000 feet for prolonged periods, the NTSB said. Lack of oxygen at high altitudes can interfere with pilots' mental skills. The NTSB also noted the company's failure to require crews to fly specific routes and follow safety regulations.

For example, the military requires planes it charters to be equipped with a device that allows people on the ground to follow the flight's route. But the NTSB said it found no evidence that the military had tried to enforce the rule.

Without the device, searchers had difficulty locating the wreckage. Searchers did not find it for nearly 24 hours. The search was also slowed because the company did not discover that the plane was missing until nearly six hours after the crash.

Lt. Col. Todd Vician, a Defense Department spokesman, said the Pentagon will review the recommendations.

Mark Corallo, a spokesman for Blackwater, said that the NTSB report “fails to understand the realities of operations in a war zone.”

The crash killed Lt. Col. Michael McMahon, 41; Chief Warrant Officer Travis W. Grogan, 31; Spc. Harley D. Miller, 21; pilot Noel English, 37; co-pilot Loren Hammer, 35; and mechanic Melvin Rowe, 43.

A Precarious Shelter In Afghanistan (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

KABUL -- The room was carpeted and cozy, warm from the wood stove and filled with the chatter of children. But the tales their mothers and older sisters told recently, speaking hesitantly even in the safety of a guarded private shelter, were bone-chilling.

Sahara, an angelic-looking young woman, said she was forcibly married at 11, widowed at 12 and kept as a virtual slave by her in-laws for the next eight years. Unable to endure more beatings, she slipped away early one morning, walked for two days and nights and finally ventured into a police station to ask for help.

Gulshan, a mother of three with a permanently worried look, said she was falsely accused of murdering her husband after he had an affair with her sister. She was sentenced to five years in jail, and her husband's brothers vowed to kill her upon her release. Under the law, they may also take custody of her small children, who are hidden with her at the shelter.

"They said I killed my husband, but I am very sad he died, even though he had a bad friendship with my sister," Gulshan said. "I need him, because of the children. Now I am alone in life, and in this society a woman alone is less than nothing."

Until recently, most of the 20 women at the shelter would probably have been either dead or in prison, hunted down by male relatives seeking revenge or hit with criminal charges for actions that would not be illegal in the West, such as eloping with a boyfriend or fleeing an abusive husband. Some might have committed suicide by burning themselves, as hundreds of desperate Afghan girls and women have done in the past several years.

Afghan society still considers such women "bad" and deserving of punishment. According to the country's conservative Muslim and tribal traditions, arranged marriages are both a cultural cornerstone and a business contract, sometimes with two sisters marrying two brothers. Wives are expected to endure beatings, unfaithfulness or years of separation in obedient silence.

But Afghanistan is also officially a democracy now, with a ministry of women's affairs, human rights organizations and constitutional protections against abuse. In the years since the overthrow of the Taliban in 2001, a network of civic groups has begun promoting women's legal rights and opening shelters.

Still, despite increasing cooperation from police and referrals from the women's ministry, the shelters remain controversial and in permanent danger of attack by angry husbands and fathers. Some Afghans view groups that advocate women's emancipation as the real danger to society and blame foreign influence for provoking the widely reported phenomenon of self-immolation by unhappy brides or daughters-in-law.

"In our society, it is still unacceptable for a woman to leave home or go to court to solve her problems," said Mari Akrami, who directs the Afghan Women's Skills Development Center. She recently made a documentary film about a girl named Mujahida, who was betrothed to a man at age 4 and later murdered by her family for running away from him.

"Now some people call me a bad woman, too," Akrami said with a rueful laugh.

Women's activists said Afghan courts still tend to side with men in cases of domestic abuse or marital conflict and are often swayed by influential families rather than the law. Two years ago, Akrami's group was given custody of a 10-year-old girl whose family had been arrested for selling her as a bride four years earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0102392

"In court she told how she had been made to wear a white dress and a lot of people were invited to a feast. She had no idea it was her wedding," Akrami said. A senior justice official, under heavy pressure from the girl's family, wrote Akrami a letter asking that the girl be sent back to her husband. "He said I must respect Afghan culture and customs," she said.

Today, that official is no longer in his post, and the government of President Hamid Karzai has made several changes in the justice system. Last summer, Karzai appointed an Afghan American to head the Supreme Court, a former university teacher who is widely viewed as a modern thinker, sympathetic to women's rights.

In a recent interview, the new chief justice, Abdul Salam Azimi, said Afghan civil laws and Islamic principles both provide ample protection for women, including the right to divorce for a variety of reasons. But he acknowledged that conservative culture is often more powerful, especially in rural areas, and that there are heavy social and psychological barriers to women seeking legal help.

"If a woman comes to court, we will protect her under the law," said Azimi, 70, who dresses in tailored business suits. "The problem is that many cases never reach us at all. A lady in a house may be suffering a lot, but she is too ashamed to go and complain. There is strong pressure from families, and often there is pressure from the women themselves."

Advocacy groups have tried to educate the public about women's rights, with limited success. In the town of Charikar, 30 miles north of Kabul, a community meeting was held recently to discuss the problem of domestic violence. The women in the audience were eager and attentive, but the male officials on the panel seemed impatient and uncomfortable.

One official gave a long, rambling speech in which he said it was important to protect women but then criticized Western countries as immoral and defended Afghan culture as "the least violent toward women in the world."

In a small room nearby, a free knitting and literacy class for women was underway. None of the participants had ever been to school or learned a skill, and several said it had been difficult to get permission to attend from male family members.

"Some women are stopped by their brothers, their fathers, even their uncles," said Rahima, 35, a mother of six. "I visit those families, and I tell them I am a good woman, I go straight to class and back home with my face covered. My honor is safe, and I am learning something useful for myself, and it can be useful to their wives and daughters, too."

Advocates say that what little legal protection Afghan women have is effectively available only in Kabul, the capital, and several other large cities. But even there, they said, courts rarely grant divorces to women and usually award custody of minor children to fathers.

In Kabul, a German-based group called Medica Mondiale provides attorneys for girls or women charged with such offenses as fleeing their husbands or having sex outside of marriage. Lawyers there said they try to mediate informally with family members, who often level such accusations against their own daughters or wives.

For example, they said, two families could be persuaded to let an eloping son and daughter marry instead of going to prison, or a girl who rejects an arranged marriage could return the gifts and money the man's family has given her, often the real cause of dispute.

"If a girl of 16 has been promised to an old man in marriage and she is unhappy about it, the law says she cannot be forced, but she may be unable to express her feelings to the family. We can express them for her," said Aziza Khowa, a lawyer with the group. "If the families are open-minded, they may understand quickly. If they are very strict, we may have to visit them and talk about it many times."

Since Medica Mondiale began offering legal aid to Afghan women in 2003, it has helped solve 750 cases through the court system or informal mediation.

The most formidable obstacle to change, advocates said, is the power of gossip and shame. An Afghan woman's reputation can be destroyed for life if she simply decides to insist on her right to choose, whether that means rejecting an unattractive groom or refusing to endure daily beatings by a drunken husband.

"The rule of rumor is a terrible thing, and it can cause great tragedy," said Angeles Martinez, the Medica Mondiale director here. "In Afghanistan, women have no identity as individuals, only in relation to their families."

In more than 90 percent of cases in which Afghan women or girls have attempted suicide by burning, Martinez said, "the cause is pure, constant domestic violence. At some point you turn it against others, or against yourself."

Losing The Good War (NYT)

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Afghanistan was supposed to be the good war — and the war America was winning. But because of the Bush administration's inattention and mismanagement, even the good war is going wrong.

The latest grim news is that after years of effort — and more than $1 billion spent — Afghanistan's American-trained police force is unable to perform even routine law enforcement work. According to an article in yesterday's Times, investigators for the Pentagon and the State Department found that the training program's managers did not even know how many police officers were serving, while thousands of trucks and other American-purchased police equipment have simply disappeared.

The failure to provide local security — or even a semblance of impartial justice — helps explain why so many Afghans have lost confidence in the pro-Western government of President Hamid Karzai, and why a growing number are again turning to the Taliban for protection. The failure to stand up an effective police force also helps explain why opium cultivation rose by nearly 60 percent this year.

Creating even the most basic government institutions was always going to be difficult in a country as poor as Afghanistan. According to one expert, 70 percent or more of the recruits in the police training program are illiterate — not surprising in a country with a male literacy rate of only 43 percent. But the State Department and Pentagon compounded these problems, handing off the bulk of the police training work to an expensive private contractor and then failing to vigilantly monitor the program. We have seen that time and again in Iraq, where experts say the police training is at least as flawed.

There are many culprits for Afghanistan's many problems. Mr. Karzai needs to do a lot more to curb the corruption that is rife among his political appointees. President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan needs to do a lot more to stanch the torrent of Taliban fighters crossing his border into Afghanistan. NATO members need to send more troops to Afghanistan — with far fewer restrictions on how they fight.

As for fixing the police training program, there is little hope of that without also reforming the Afghan Ministry of Interior, which oversees the police, and is mired in both incompetence and corruption. Washington has sent some advisers to help clean up the ministry, but the effort is moving far too slowly. And the United States and its allies need to send a lot more police advisers to walk the beat with the newly graduated recruits, who get just a few months of classroom training. That is standard practice for training effective police forces, but it has not been tried in Afghanistan.

Mr. Bush's decision to rush off to invade Iraq meant that Afghanistan would be shortchanged when it came to resources and to policy makers' priority lists. The cost of that inattention can be seen in the failing Afghan police force. It can also be seen in the Taliban's growing strength, the mounting death toll of Afghan civilians and NATO troops, and the unraveling of the Karzai government. So much for winning the good war.

U.S. Army Battling To Save Equipment (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

ANNISTON, Ala. -- Field upon field of more than 1,000 battered M1 tanks, howitzers and other armored vehicles sit amid weeds here at the 15,000-acre Anniston Army Depot -- the idle, hulking formations symbolic of an Army that is wearing out faster than it is being rebuilt.

The Army and Marine Corps have sunk more than 40 percent of their ground combat equipment into the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to government data. An estimated $17 billion-plus worth of military equipment is destroyed or worn out each year, blasted by bombs, ground down by desert sand and used up to nine times the rate in times of peace. The gear is piling up at depots such as Anniston, waiting to be repaired.

The depletion of major equipment such as tanks, Bradley Fighting Vehicles, and especially helicopters and armored Humvees has left many military units in the United States without adequate training gear, officials say. Partly as a result of the shortages, many U.S. units are rated "unready" to deploy, officials say, raising alarm in Congress and concern among military leaders at a time when Iraq strategy is under review by the White House and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, is lobbying hard for more money to repair what he calls the "holes" in his force, saying current war funding is inadequate to make the Army "well." Asked in a congressional hearing this past summer whether he was comfortable with the readiness levels of non-deployed Army units, Schoomaker replied: "No."

Lt. Col. Mike Johnson, a senior Army planner, said: "Before, if a unit was less than C-1," or fully ready, "someone would get fired." Now, he said, that is accepted as combat-zone rotations are sapping all units of gear and manpower. "It's a cost of continuous operations. You can't be ready all the time," he said.

Across the military, scarce equipment is being shifted from unit to unit for training. For example, a brigade of 3,800 soldiers from the 3rd Infantry Division that will deploy to Iraq next month has been passing around a single training set of 44 Humvees, none of which has the added armor of the Humvees they will drive in Iraq.

The military's ground forces are only beginning the vast and costly job of replacing, repairing and upgrading combat equipment -- work that will cost an estimated $17 billion to $19 billion annually for several more years, regardless of any shift in Iraq strategy. The Army alone has 280,000 major pieces of equipment in combat zones that will eventually have to be fixed or replaced. Before the war, the Army spent $2.5 billion to $3 billion a year on wear and tear.

At Anniston, the sprawling lots of tanks and other armored vehicles are just the start of a huge backlog in broken-down gear.

"There's stuff, stuff everywhere," Joan Gustafson, a depot official, said as she wheeled her brown Chevrolet van through a landscape of rolling hills lined with armadas of mobile guns.

"There's another field of M1s," she said, motioning toward a swath of M1A1 Abrams tanks next to the winding road. "We're just waiting for someone to tell us what to do with them."

The Army's five depots carry out the highest level of maintenance for Army gear ranging from rifles and other small arms to tanks, helicopters and missile systems. Since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, the Army has left behind hundreds of thousands of pieces of equipment in Iraq and has relied heavily on field maintenance facilities in Kuwait.

But as the war has continued, Army leaders have recognized that they cannot afford to wait for a drawdown of troops before they begin overhauling equipment -- some of it 20 years old -- that is being used at extraordinary rates. Helicopters are flying two or three times their planned usage rates. Tank crews are driving more than 4,000 miles a year -- five times the normal rate. Truck fleets that convoy supplies down Iraq's bomb-laden roads are running at six times the planned mileage, according to Army data.

Equipment shipped back from Iraq is stacking up at all the Army depots: More than 530 M1 tanks, 220 M88 wreckers and 160 M113 armored personnel carriers are sitting at Anniston. The Red River Army Depot in Texas has 700 Bradley Fighting Vehicles and 450 heavy and medium-weight trucks, while more than 1,000 Humvees are awaiting repair at the Letterkenny Army Depot in Pennsylvania.

Despite the work piling up, the Army's depots have been operating at about half their capacity because of a lack of funding for repairs. In the spring, a funding gap caused Anniston and other depots to lose about a month's worth of work, said Brig. Gen. Robert Radin, deputy chief of staff for operations at the Army Materiel Command at Fort Belvoir.

"Last year we spent as much time trying to find available money as managing our program," he said. "We don't want to go into the next rotation . . . with equipment that's at the far end of its expected life."

Responding to urgent requests from the Army and Marine Corps, Congress approved an extra $23.8 billion in October to replace worn-out equipment in fiscal 2007. With the money, the Army plans to double the workload at its depots, which will repair and upgrade 130,000 pieces in 2007, up from 63,000 last year. This will include a quadrupling of the number of tanks, Bradleys and other tracked vehicles overhauled, from 1,000 to 4,000.

At Anniston, which will handle 1,800 combat vehicles in fiscal 2007, a cavernous 250,000-square-foot repair shop is humming as damaged tanks are rolled in one by one and disassembled with the help of giant cranes. Removing an M1 tank's turret alone takes a day and a half, and the entire overhaul requires 54 days and costs about $1 million, said Ted A. Law, the depot's vehicle manager.

Earnest Linn, 58, a heavy-mobile-equipment mechanic who as of January will have worked at Anniston for 30 years, said that "it's never been like this" since the end of the Vietnam War.

In October, Anniston became the official repair facility for the Army's newest armored vehicle, the Stryker. Repairs for those vehicles will soar from eight in fiscal 2006 to 75 this fiscal year -- including 58 that received some level of battle damage, said Gregory McMath, program manager for Stryker repair.

"This one hit a triple-stacked land mine," he said, peering up into the underbelly of a Stryker ripped open by the blast. Some of the Strykers are coming in with 40,000 miles on their odometers, he said.

Workers at Anniston take pride in patching, rebuilding and testing the broken-down gear and returning it to like-new condition. Often, they must innovate by taking parts from wrecked vehicles if new parts do not exist or have not been ordered in time.

"The supply system can't keep up with us," said Rodney Brodeur, division chief for turbine engines, speaking over the clang and whir of his workshop. It is projected that in 2007, Anniston will rebuild 1,400 turbine engines for M1 tanks, compared with 800 this year.

Fine sand and heavy use erode the blades on the tank engine rotors, eventually leading the blades to snap off and stall the engines. Such erosion, which is invisible to the Army's field mechanics, can lead to catastrophic failure without timely maintenance.

"If your Cadillac stops by the side of the road, that's an inconvenience," Brodeur said. "If the tank quits in the middle of the fight, that's a hard target."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Disputes 'whistle-blower' (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, December 5, 2006

In an unusual departure from the polite "no comment" that the Securities and Exchange Commission generally offers in response to criticism, four SEC officials are expected to blast a self-proclaimed "whistle-blower" before a Senate subcommittee hearing today.

The four officials, including Linda Chatman Thomsen, the SEC's director of enforcement, are scheduled to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee to answer allegations that a high-profile investigation of John Mack, the CEO of Morgan Stanley, was abandoned last year because of political pressure.

Gary Aguirre, a former SEC investigator, made those allegations at a congressional hearing in June. Aguirre said he was fired because he didn't want to abandon an investigation into whether Mack broke inside-trading rules by sharing market-sensitive information with a hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management.

He testified that he wanted to subpoena Mack in order to ask him about various suspicious trades, but his superiors wouldn't let him issue the subpoena.

In June, the SEC said political pressure didn't play a role in the decision not to bring Mack in for questioning. Last week the SEC closed the investigation. Today, Thomsen and others are expected to offer blunt testimony about Aguirre and his work habits at the SEC.

Aguirre was fired in September 2005, just days before the expiration of his one-year probationary period at the commission. Once an employee passes the one-year mark at the SEC, it's almost impossible for him or her to be fired.

According to the testimony of Thomsen and three other former supervisors of Aguirre, advance copies of which USA TODAY obtained from a source close to the committee, Aguirre was an unhappy employee who did not respond well to authority.

He "demonstrated his own dissatisfaction with his employment by twice leaving the office abruptly during the workday after disagreeing with other attorneys," Thomsen will say.

Aguirre, who is in his 60s, also requested, and received, official time to pursue an unsuccessful age-discrimination case against the SEC "for failing to hire him on 22 prior applications."

Mark Kreitman, who heads the SEC divisional unit where Aguirre worked, will testify that Aguirre refused to reason with his superiors about the Mack subpoena.

"Frighteningly, it appeared that Mr. Aguirre was pursuing a personal agenda bordering on a vendetta, instead of a calmly reasoned, fair-minded pursuit of the evidence," an advance copy of his testimony says.

"Toward the end of his tenure, Mr. Aguirre's behavior became increasingly unprofessional, irresponsible and erratic. He threw what can only be reasonably described as tantrums, storming up and down the halls in a furious crouch, and abruptly left the office without leave on a number of occasions," Kreitman will say.

A spokesman for Aguirre did not return calls for comment.

2nd Official Dissented Over Pequot Inquiry (NYT)

By Walt Bogdanich

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Congressional investigators have found that a second official at the Securities and Exchange Commission expressed serious concerns about how the agency was conducting its inquiry into a prominent hedge fund, Pequot Capital Management.

The official, Eric Ribelin, an investigator at the commission, asked to be removed from the Pequot inquiry because of his serious misgivings about decisions being made on the case by senior S.E.C. officials, according to a government official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to discuss the matter.

Mr. Ribelin believed that the inquiry "was not handled right," Senator Arlen Specter, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said in an interview. The investigator's criticism echoes some of the complaints lodged this year by the former S.E.C. lawyer who ran the investigation, Gary J. Aguirre.

"Something smells rotten here," Mr. Ribelin wrote in an e-mail message to an S.E.C. supervisor last year.

He is among those expected to testify today before Senator Specter's committee, which, together with the Senate Finance Committee, has been examining allegations by Mr. Aguirre that the agency prematurely halted its Pequot investigation because of outside political pressure.

Mr. Aguirre, who led the hedge fund investigation until he was fired last year, has told members of Congress that senior S.E.C. officials blocked him from taking testimony from John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive and friend of Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg.

S.E.C. officials said they turned down Mr. Aguirre's request at that time because he had not made a strong enough case for taking Mr. Mack's testimony, records show. The S.E.C. took Mr. Mack's testimony about a year later, and formally closed the Pequot investigation last week without taking any enforcement action. Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack have repeatedly denied any improper conduct.

Mr. Ribelin did not return a message left at his office yesterday.

An S.E.C. spokesman, John J. Nester, declined to comment, saying, "We'll just let our testimony speak for itself."

Senator Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, said he was interested in finding out why S.E.C. officials, who had previously written favorable evaluations of Mr. Aguirre's work, suddenly wrote a critical evaluation that covered the same time period.

"The supplemental evaluation was highly unusual," Senator Specter said.

Government officials said the S.E.C. supervisors never discussed the evaluation with Mr. Aguirre and then placed it in his employment file after he was fired on Sept. 1, 2005.

Just days before his firing, Mr. Aguirre was awarded a two-step merit pay increase.

According to a government official, Mr. Aguirre's direct supervisor, Robert Hanson, an S.E.C. branch chief, said the supplemental evaluation was written at the suggestion of Paul R. Berger, a former associate director of enforcement. Mr. Berger declined to discuss the evaluation yesterday, saying he could not comment on personnel matters.

Senate investigators have also been looking at circumstances surrounding Mr. Berger's decision to take a job at the law firm of Debevoise & Plimpton this year.

Debevoise was hired by Morgan Stanley's board to vet Mr. Mack before he was named to head the company in June 2005. As part of that vetting process, Mary Jo White, the former New York federal prosecutor now at Debevoise, did contact the S.E.C.'s director of enforcement, Linda Thomsen, about Mr. Mack, but the firm says it never suggested to anyone at the commission that the investigation be stopped.

Mr. Aguirre has told Congress that after a compliance officer at Morgan Stanley called the S.E.C. in June of 2005, inquiring whether Mr. Mack might face an enforcement action, Mr. Aguirre's Pequot investigation was essentially shut down.

Mr. Aguirre said that before answering the compliance officer, he consulted with his two superiors, Mr. Hanson and Mark Kreitman, an assistant director of enforcement. According to Mr. Aguirre, Mr. Kreitman favored telling Morgan Stanley that Mr. Mack was indeed a target, but first he informed his boss, Mr. Berger, by speakerphone.

With Mr. Aguirre listening in, Mr. Berger overruled Mr. Kreitman, saying in effect that the S.E.C. would most likely not file charges against Mr. Mack, and that nothing should be said to Morgan Stanley, Mr. Aguirre said.

Mr. Berger said yesterday that he had told Morgan Stanley "that it was premature to say whether or not Mr. Mack had any exposure."

Several months later, Mr. Berger said, an S.E.C. colleague who was interviewing at Debevoise offered to mention that Mr. Berger might have an interest in working there, too. Mr. Berger agreed.

In a statement yesterday, Debevoise's presiding partner, Martin Frederic Evans, said, "Sometime in September 2005, well after our work for the Morgan Stanley board had concluded, we were told that Mr. Berger might have an interest in talking to Debevoise, but the firm did not contact Mr. Berger, nor did the firm hear from him till January 2006."

Mr. Evans said that neither Mr. Mack nor the S.E.C. investigation were mentioned in the firm's employment discussions with Mr. Berger.

Once that contact began, Mr. Berger said yesterday, "I recused myself from any matter with which the firm was involved, including the Pequot investigation."

Mr. Aguirre has already provided Senate investigators with lengthy statements and dozens of contemporaneous e-mail exchanges he had with S.E.C. supervisors. He is also expected to testify at the hearing today, along with senior S.E.C. officials, including Ms. Thomsen and Mr. Berger.

The committee is also expected to question the agency's inspector general, Walter J. Stachnik, who initially concluded that the S.E.C. had done nothing wrong. But after the disclosure that Mr. Stachnik's office had not interviewed Mr. Aguirre before rendering its judgment, the inspector general reopened his investigation.

"These folks are going to be under oath, and I'm going to try to get to the bottom of it," Senator Specter said.

The senator said he would call for legislation requiring hedge funds to register with the S.E.C. if they manage pension fund investments or money from small investors.

Before the S.E.C. decided this year not to file any enforcement action against Pequot, the agency had been investigating a number of profitable trades by the hedge fund in advance of mergers or other market-moving news.

Mr. Aguirre began investigating Pequot soon after he started at the agency in September 2004.

“When you are inquiring into areas like this, it’s very delicate and people are very reluctant to talk,” Senator Specter said. “These investigations are not easy and not totally predictable.”

The S.E.C. is also under review by the Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress. Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, asked for the review in September because he was growing concerned, he said, about whether the S.E.C. was “faithfully adhering to its mission.”

The G.A.O. will also examine how well the commission monitors self-regulatory organizations — like the New York Stock Exchange and NASD — that refer cases to the commission for possible enforcement actions. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Jefferies Settles Probe Of Lavish Gifts, But Fidelity Isn't Clear Of U.S. Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Susanne Craig And Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Brokerage firm Jefferies Group Inc. has agreed to pay more than $10 million to settle allegations that a former star trader doled out gifts and entertainment, including expensive wine and private-jet flights, to Fidelity Investments to win mutual-fund trading business.

The National Association of Securities Dealers, which spearheaded the investigation, imposed a $5.5 million penalty on Jefferies, and the Securities and Exchange Commission ordered Jefferies to return nearly $4.8 million of trading gains. The firm, which settled charges without admitting or denying guilt, has been ordered to hire a monitor to review travel, entertainment and gift policies.

WSJ reporter Suzanne Craig reports on the SEC and NASD fining brokerage firm Jefferies Group $5.5 million for splurging on improper gifts and excessive entertainment2 to Fidelity Investments.

Former Jefferies trader Kevin Quinn, whom Jefferies armed with a big expense account to lure Fidelity business, was fined $468,000, and Scott Jones, a Jefferies board member who was Mr. Quinn's immediate supervisor, was fined $50,000. Both agreed to other penalties to settle the charges.

Mr. Quinn, who through his attorney declined to comment, has been permanently barred from working at a registered securities firm. A spokesman for Jefferies said the New York firm has enhanced its internal controls and was happy the matter is behind the firm. Mr. Jones, through a Jefferies spokesman, declined to comment.

Notable in yesterday's announcement was that the SEC, which has jurisdiction over Fidelity, took no action against the mutual-fund company. Mutual funds are supposed to send their stock trades to whichever firm offers them -- and their customers -- the best price and service, and such decisions aren't supposed to be based on gifts a fund manager may have received from a broker.

However, according to people familiar with the inquiry, the SEC has had difficulty trying to prove that investors were financially harmed because Fidelity traders accepted the gifts and entertainment. "It's very hard to do, very hard to prove...that the gifts are in any way impairing price," said Howard Schiffman, a securities lawyer and former SEC enforcement lawyer in Washington.

Complicating the picture is Fidelity's reputation for using its market muscle to squeeze brokers' profits and lower its funds' trading costs. Fidelity's trading costs, once in line with those of other money managers, have fallen in recent years to half the industry average, according to a study by Abel/Noser Corp., which tracks such expenses. That saved hundreds of millions of dollars for investors. As a result, it could be hard to show that the company could have done better with costs had it gone elsewhere.

Fidelity has had an investor-friendly image and a reputation for ethical conduct and has been rocked by the probe. The company has disciplined more than 20 employees on the trading desk, including firing some people, Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley said. Scott DeSano, the once-powerful head of equity trading, was reassigned and the company also has a new policy on gifts.

The mutual-fund company, also known as FMR Corp., continues to fight allegations that customers were harmed. "We continue to believe it's not possible to demonstrate that financial harm occurred to any Fidelity fund or client as a result of these excessive gifts or entertainment," Ms. Crowley said.

Fidelity isn't out of the woods yet. The SEC is continuing to investigate the company, according to people familiar with the investigation. These people said the SEC may be trying two other strategies, including bringing civil charges against the company for violating disclosure laws, which require fund companies to disclose conflicts of interest to customers. Those familiar with the case said the SEC also is looking at whether it can bring a charge based on Fidelity traders receiving compensation above what Fidelity paid them.

The charges bring to a close a painful, albeit colorful, chapter in Jefferies' corporate history. In 2002, the company hired Mr. Quinn, agreeing to pay him $4 million a year. The firm armed the trader with a $1.5 million expense account that Mr. Quinn used to curry favor with a select group of Fidelity traders.

He spared little expense, doling out gifts valued at more than $600,000 and entertainment that totaled more than $1 million, regulators estimated. The NASD bars gifts valued at more than $100 and allows "ordinary and usual business entertainment" so long as it is "neither so frequent nor so extensive as to raise any question of propriety."

Mr. Quinn bought tickets to concerts and tennis matches at Wimbledon and the U.S. Open, often making available a private plane so traders could travel in style to the events, regulators said. In 2004, Jefferies paid more than $125,000 for a weekend trip to the Super Bowl that featured parties hosted by Maxim and Playboy magazines. Regulators said the brokerage firm also bought traders numerous bottles of wines, including six bottles of 1998 Opus One for a total of more than $2,600, regulators found.

On one weekend jaunt featured in a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal, Jefferies paid about $75,000 for traders to attend a Miami bachelor party for a Fidelity trader that featured dwarf tossing. A friend of the bridegroom to be, not a Wall Street firm, paid for the dwarf to attend the weekend festivities, according to people familiar with the matter. As the probe unfolded, some traders said they reimbursed Jefferies for some of the gifts. Still, regulators said any money paid to Jefferies didn't come close to covering the amount that was spent.

The case led the NASD to overhaul its gift and entertainment rules. Regulators don't plan to tinker with the gift-giving rule but want firms to set dollar limits, or establish comprehensive guidelines for expenses that are subject to regulatory review. These changes are being considered by the SEC.

The NASD still may bring a handful of gift and entertainment cases, but the bulk of its review was completed with an 11-page report issued yesterday. The report found that while most firms have failed to keep records on things like which clients and staff attended events, abuse was limited and doesn't warrant further action. It encouraged firms to review their systems. "We saw problems but it was mostly record-keeping and nothing approaching the Jefferies excess," said James Shorris, the NASD's head of enforcement.

Jefferies To Pay $9.7 Million To Settle Fidelity Gift Case (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, December 5, 2006

In a case that could taint the pristine image of mutual fund giant Fidelity Investments, federal regulators settled civil charges with a stock brokerage firm for lavishing more than $1.6 million in fine wines, golf junkets, sports tickets and other goodies on a handful of Fidelity traders. The gifts, regulators contend, were designed to get Fidelity to shift more of its stock-trading business to the firm.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the National Association of Securities Dealers announced Monday that Jefferies & Co. agreed to pay $5.5 million in fines and $4.2 million in disgorgement to settle the case.

Regulators say Jefferies obliterated the NASD's $100 limit on the amount of gifts and expense-related entertainment that can be provided to a customer each year.

According to the settlement, Jefferies made only $4.3 million in commissions off the Boston-based family of mutual funds in 2001. In order to grow its Fidelity business, the company hired Kevin Quinn in September 2002, paying him $4 million a year and an annual expense account of $1.5 million.

Quinn moved quickly, organizing a $215,000 golf junket to Las Vegas and Cabo San Lucas, Mexico, that fall for two Fidelity traders and their supervisor. For the next two years, the big-ticket spending continued. Quinn arranged for five Fidelity traders and their supervisor, Scott DeSano, to fly from Boston to various spots across the USA and in the Caribbean.

One of the Fidelity traders must have been a tennis fan, because Quinn provided $90,000 worth of tickets to Wimbledon from 2002 to 2004, and $17,000 in U.S. Open tickets during those same years.

Other traders received tickets to Broadway shows, and one received tickets to the 2004 Super Bowl in Houston.

While Quinn was lavishing perks on five traders and their boss, Jefferies' business with Fidelity grew more than tenfold: In the second quarter of 2002, Jefferies executed trades in 25 million shares of major companies on behalf of Fidelity; two years later, that number swelled to 277 million.

Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley said the company had disciplined 14 individuals in the matter some two years ago, after an internal investigation. Several were terminated. “We don't tolerate this type of conduct,” she said. The SEC's investigation of Fidelity continues, she added.

Jefferies & Co. Settles Claims Of Illegal Gifts (WP/AP)

By Marcy Gordon

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

The New York brokerage firm Jefferies & Co. is paying $9.7 million to settle regulators' charges that it illegally lavished nearly $2 million in golf trips, entertainment and other gifts on Fidelity mutual fund traders in exchange for their business.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the NASD, the brokerage industry's self-policing organization, announced the settlements yesterday. Two Jefferies executives were also sanctioned.

Under the settlement with the SEC, Jefferies was censured and agreed to pay $4.2 million in restitution plus interest. It also agreed to hire an independent consultant to review the firm's compliance procedures. In the deal with NASD, Jefferies will pay a $5.5 million civil fine over the alleged violations that occurred between September 2002 and October 2004.

Jefferies neither admitted nor denied wrongdoing.

It was the first case brought in a two-year investigation by the SEC and the NASD into whether about two dozen brokerage firms illegally provided golf outings, Super Bowl tickets and other gifts to traders at mutual fund advisers to get them to bring their business to the firms. The practice is said to be widespread in the brokerage industry.

NASD rules prohibit such gifts worth more than $100. Additionally, mutual fund advisers are required to disclose potential conflicts of interest.

Fidelity Investments, the Boston-based fund giant, has said it could face action from the SEC in an investigation into whether its traders sent company business to brokerage firms that offered gifts and gratuities, rather than to firms offering the best deals on trades. More than a dozen Fidelity employees have been disciplined in connection with the investigation and at least five traders have left the firm.

Jefferies' director of equities, Scott Jones, accused by the regulators of failing to adequately supervise Kevin Quinn, a former trader and senior vice president, agreed to pay a $50,000 civil fine and was barred for three months from working as a supervisor for any brokerage firm.

The firm hired Quinn in May 2002 to expand its business with the Fidelity funds, giving him a $1.5 million annual travel and entertainment budget, the regulators said.

Quinn allegedly showered the fund traders with expensive golf outings, flew them on private jets to such locations as Bermuda and Puerto Rico, put them up at swank hotels and gave them golf merchandise and tickets to major sporting events -- including the Super Bowl and the Wimbledon tennis tournament.

Quinn agreed to pay a $468,000 civil fine; he was barred from working for any brokerage firm.

Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley declined to comment on the Jefferies settlements.

Bruce Baird, an attorney for Jefferies, said the firm "cooperated completely" with the regulators' investigation. "Jefferies is glad to have all this behind it," he said.

SEC In Crackdown On Wall St Lavish Gifts (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York And Rebecca Knight In Boston

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

US regulators moved on Monday to crack down on brokers who lavish gifts on mutual fund traders as they slapped $9.7m in penalties on Jefferies & Co, the New York securities firm, for currying favour with Fidelity traders.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the industry regulator NASD said Jefferies, a middle-sized investment bank, hired Kevin Quinn as an executive vice-president in 2002 and gave him a $1.5m annual travel and entertainment budget to boost their institutional business.

He used the money to court five Fidelity traders, paying for private flights to Turks and Caicos, Bermuda and Puerto Rico, as well as vintage wines, golf outings, and trips to Wimbledon and the US Open tennis tournament.

He also paid $75,000 towards a lavish Miami bachelor party for a Fidelity trader. “Investors deserve and the integrity of the market requires that traders select brokers based on the quality of their trade execution and not the lavishness of their gifts,” said Walter Ricciardi, the SEC’s deputy enforcement director.

The regulators said the case was part of a broader effort to tighten policies that have let brokers funnel thousands of dollars in gifts and entertainment to institutional traders.

The NASD, which unearthed the problem, also issued a report urging firms to track entertainment and gifts more closely.

“We looked at 40 different firms that did institutional business and there was an industry- wide failure to track entertainment and gifts,” said James Schorris, head of enforcement at the NASD.

DOJ_NMG_0102400

The firms routinely violated the NASD's gift policy at the time, which limited gifts to $100. "We didn't see any other firm that sank to the level of Jefferies but there is a lot of room for improvement," Mr Schorris said.

Mr Quinn, who lost his job in October 2004 after his spending habits came to light, has been ordered to pay $468,000 in SEC penalties and barred from the securities industry for life, his lawyer said.

His supervisor Scott Jones was fined $50,000 and suspended from serving as a supervisor for three months. Since the scandal broke, Jefferies has instituted a "no gifts" policy for its employees.

"Jefferies has revamped its procedures and it is going to make sure nothing like this ever happens again," said the firm's outside counsel Bruce Baird.

"Jeffries chose to settle, rather than to litigate," said Anne Crowley, a Fidelity spokeswoman. "This settlement is one where we played no role and had no say, this is not a settlement with Fidelity."

She said that Fidelity had conducted its own investigation and taken strong disciplinary action against those employees found to have violated company policies.

Agreement Elusive On Accounting Rule Change (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Regulators continue to revise an accounting rule criticized by business groups as overly expensive, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said yesterday, but an agreement remains days away.

Officials at the SEC and the board that oversees the audit industry have been meeting and exchanging documents about the measure, which requires accountants to review corporate financial controls, for the better part of two weeks. The rule is the single most expensive part of the Sarbanes-Oxley law, corporate accountability legislation passed in 2002 that is designed to prevent fraud after collapses at Enron and WorldCom.

Trade groups and lawmakers have attacked the provision and called for regulators to scrap the burdensome approach. At the same time, consumer advocates warn that establishing different standards for thousands of small and mid-size businesses would effectively gut the measure and make financial reports less reliable for investors.

The trick is to make complying with the rule less expensive, particularly for smaller companies with fewer resources. Coming to agreement on the mechanics, including forcing accountants to rely on the judgment of corporate managers, and to focus on the most important issues in the financial statements, has been a difficult task. The debate broke into public view two weeks ago after a memo from Cox was leaked to the press.

At a public meeting yesterday, Cox said he was "confident" a pact could be reached soon that would both "improve the reliability of public company financial statements and better protect investors." The SEC is to meet Dec. 13 to issue a new proposal. Mark Olson, chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, said last week that his panel would meet to issue its own guidance sometime before Christmas.

Separately, the SEC's five commissioners unanimously approved the accounting board's $136.4 million budget, an increase of about 4 percent over 2006. Olson said the budget would allow him to hire more inspectors and enforcement officials to police the work of more than 1,600 firms that are registered with the board.

SEC officials are to testify today at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on how the agency enforces insider trading rules against hedge funds. Among the witnesses will be a former SEC lawyer who claims he was fired for seeking to depose a top investment banker. The agency has argued his allegations lack merit.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Feds Charge Alzheimer's Researcher (AP)

By Rita Beamish, The Associated Press

AP, December 5, 2006

(AP) — In a rare federal prosecution, a leading government Alzheimer's researcher was charged Monday with a criminal conflict of interest for performing lucrative private drug company work that overlapped his official duties.

Prosecutors alleged Dr. Trey Sunderland of the National Institutes of Health received $285,000 in improper consulting fees and travel expenses from Pfizer, Inc., for work on early indicators of Alzheimer's at the same time he also oversaw similar NIH business with the drugmaker.

The private consulting "directly related" to his government job, and Sunderland failed to obtain the proper approvals from his supervisors or disclose the work to NIH, according to papers filed in U.S. District Court in Baltimore.

DOJ_NMG_0102401

The felony charge carries a maximum sentence of one year in prison and a $100,000 fine. Prosecutors filed the charge as a criminal information, instead of indictment, signaling the possibility of a plea deal.

Sunderland did not return a call to his office Monday seeking comment. His attorney, Robert Muse, declined comment.

The prosecution is believed to be the first such case against a federal scientist since the early 1990s.

It stemmed from a two-year ethics controversy at NIH that prompted the nation's premier medical agency to issue new rules on consulting and end such relationships that enrich its scientists.

Scientists recently told NIH that the new rules are so strict that many are considering leaving the agency.

NIH had identified at least 44 government researchers who improperly made money moonlighting for biotechnology and drug companies. Most were given written or verbal reprimands or were permitted to retire.

But Sunderland drew the attention of federal prosecutors and the ire of Congress when House investigators revealed his private financial deal and the fact that he transferred hundreds of tubes of valuable NIH tissue samples to Pfizer around the time of his consulting work.

Sunderland, 55, who heads a geriatric psychiatry branch at NIH's National Institute of Mental Health in Bethesda, Md., is to appear Friday for arraignment.

Sunderland refused to testify before Congress last June, citing his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee which launched the probe called Monday for Sunderland's dismissal. Otherwise, Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich., said in a statement, "We can only conclude that no one is being held accountable, the system is broken and the public trust has been violated."

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., complained Sunderland had been kept on even after Department of Health and Human Services agencies found wrongdoing in their own internal investigations.

"Will a criminal conviction for conflict of interest be enough to get someone fired from NIH?" he asked.

Prosecutors alleged in Monday's court filing that during his five-year private deal with Pfizer, Sunderland "did participate personally and substantially as a government employee and officer ... in a particular matter in which, to the defendant's knowledge, he had a financial interest."

The conflict began in 1998 when Sunderland was making arrangements for NIH to work with Pfizer on an Alzheimer's project. At the same time, he began negotiations to be a paid consultant on the same project, prosecutors allege. Government scientists are not allowed to take money for their official collaborations with private companies.

NIH spokesman John Burklow declined comment.

Ned Feder, a former NIH scientist now with the non-profit watchdog group Project on Government Oversight, said "in this and similar cases NIH authorities have made it habit of covering up or minimizing wrongdoing. They are still hiding the details of other scientists' conflicts of interest over the past 10 years."

Experts said the last prosecution of a senior NIH scientist was that of Prem Sarin, who was convicted in 1992 of embezzling a drug company payment to NIH that was intended to help with AIDS research.

My Boss Stole My Identity! (FORTUNE)

By Stephanie Mehta, Fortune senior writer

Fortune, December 5, 2006

I.D. theft in the workplace is becoming more common, but workers are still forced to trust their employers with sensitive information, says Fortune's Stephanie Mehta.

Anyone who works in an office - or watches "The Office" - knows how torturous cubicle life can be: unflattering fluorescent lights, insecure supervisors and clueless co-workers can all take their toll. Now, it seems, there's a new indignity: bosses who steal their employees' identities.

Terrence D. Chalk, a well-known White Plains, N.Y., entrepreneur, may have done just that. The Justice Department says Chalk, CEO of a computer services company called CompuLinx, applied for loans and credit cards using the names of employees or clients, falsely claiming they were officers of his firm.

Charges include conspiracy and credit card fraud, and if he's convicted, he faces up to 165 years in prison. Chalk, who was quoted frequently in computer industry trade publications and served on local charity boards, has made other enemies too.

4 scams: How to avoid them

Once his case became public, assorted associates came out of the woodwork, claiming the entrepreneur owed them money. And a former business partner told the local paper that Chalk used his deceased father's personal information to get a loan. Chalk's lawyer didn't return calls.

ID-stealing bosses are the exception, but they are out there, says Linda Foley, executive director of the Identity Theft Resource Center, a leading nonprofit that provides information and support for fraud victims.

DOJ_NMG_0102402

In fact, Foley started the center in 1999 after her boss used information on Foley's tax forms to apply for credit cards and a cell phone. And earlier this year a judge in upstate New York sentenced a computer entrepreneur to seven years in jail for tax fraud and stealing the IDs of employees and friends.

"It is very hard when an employer or co-worker does this to you, because you somehow feel you are safe in the workplace," says Foley.

Yet the office is fertile territory for a would-be identity thief: Workers constantly leave personal information lying around on their desks or office fax machines. People place wallets and bags - containing Social Security cards, checks and other information thieves use to commit fraud - in the same place every day, making them easy pickings.

But even if you're extra cautious in the workplace, you're still no match for a boss who wants to steal your identity. After all, there's one institution you really can't hide a Social Security number from: your employer.

Feds Win Milberg Discovery Battle (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, December 5, 2006

L.A. federal prosecutors have won a behind-the-scenes discovery fight in the undying probe of plaintiffs firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman.

In a sealed ruling issued the day before Thanksgiving, U.S. District Judge A. Howard Matz ordered the production of reams of discovery that prosecutors had sought from various plaintiffs firms, according to lawyers familiar with the case.

Attorneys for Milberg -- which was indicted in May, as were two of its name partners, on charges of paying kickbacks to clients -- had argued that the material was covered by work-product privilege.

The documents relate largely to payment agreements with other firms for John Torkelsen, a former expert witness for the plaintiff goliath, said the attorneys.

Torkelsen has been the subject of intense interest as the prosecutors continue efforts to indict Milberg's former star partner William Lerach, who now heads the top plaintiff shop Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins.

The May indictment of Milberg accused that firm of giving fees to outside lawyers who in turn paid lead plaintiffs in class actions, constituting illegal kickbacks.

But the ongoing investigation looks beyond those charges at other transactions. Aside from the Torkelsen payments, prosecutors have spent years looking at referral fees Milberg allegedly paid to other lawyers -- and possibly stockbrokers -- in exchange for bringing them lead plaintiffs.

STOCK SUSPECTS

The stockbroker probes involve a group from Florida and brokers at the New York investment firm First Albany, said attorneys with knowledge of the case. A spokeswoman for First Albany didn't return calls.

Lawyers said the prosecutors are interested in whether Milberg paid brokers for referring investors to serve as lead plaintiffs in shareholder suits.

While such payments were made explicitly illegal by a 1995 federal law, it's not clear whether they were allowed in earlier years. That legal gray area, the lawyers said, muddles whether brokers could be forced to cooperate.

Last year, a Long Island, N.Y., broker -- and former Milberg partner -- Paul Tullman, pleaded guilty to tax charges and -- according to the Wall Street Journal -- is cooperating in the L.A. case.

SQUEEZING TORKELSEN

Torkelsen became central to the investigation some time after it was launched in 1999 by a former firm client who -- in trying to dodge a long prison sentence for insurance fraud -- told prosecutors he got kickbacks while serving as a persuasive expert witness who helped set the value of many Milberg class actions.

After leaving the expert business, Torkelsen started an investment fund -- largely with cash from plaintiffs lawyers -- that led to his downfall: He pleaded guilty last year to bilking the Small Business Administration of about $5 million invested in his fund. Torkelsen's ex-wife, Pamela, is cooperating with prosecutors, testifying in the Milberg case while her ex-husband resists pressure to flip, said lawyers familiar with the probe. Torkelsen is serving a prison sentence of more than five years.

L.A. federal prosecutors moved Torkelsen to a downtown Los Angeles detention center months ago to get a handwriting sample and have kept him there.

Lawyers familiar with the case -- speaking on condition of anonymity due to the confidential nature of the proceedings -- said Matz's discovery order could provide detailed information on pay arrangements among Milberg, the expert and various plaintiffs firms. That could lead to more pressure on Torkelsen: the threat of another criminal indictment.

Torkelsen's attorneys with the L.A. federal public defender's office didn't return calls by press time, nor did lawyers for the two indicted Milberg partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman.

DOJ_NMG_0102403

And Bryan Daly, a partner at Beck, De Corso, Daly, Kreindler & Harris in Los Angeles who represents the firm, said he couldn't comment on discovery issues. So did Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the L.A. U.S. Attorney's Office.

13 MONTHS TO GO

While the investigation continues, defense lawyers for the firm, its partners and two Southern California lawyers indicted last year for alleged involvement with referral fees are preparing for trial.

At a hearing last week, U.S. District Judge John Walter chose Jan. 8, 2008, to start the Milberg trial. And while speculation is still rampant about whether Lerach and lead Milberg partner Melvyn Weiss will face charges, Daly, the L.A.-based Milberg lawyer, said his focus now has to be on the pending case. "The trial schedule is something we're going to work very hard to meet," he said.

U.S. Navy Submariner Pleads Guilty To Trying To Transmit Classified Data (FINDLAW/AP)

By Sonja Barisic, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 5, 2006

(AP) - NORFOLK, Virginia-A sailor accused of stealing a U.S.Navy laptop and peddling its classified contents to an undisclosed foreign government pleaded guilty to espionage, desertion and other charges.

If convicted, Petty Officer 3rd Class Ariel J. Weinmann, 22, of Salem, Oregon, could face a sentence of life in prison without parole, a dishonorable discharge from the Navy and forfeiture of all pay.

Under the plea agreement Monday, Weinmann pleaded guilty to one count each of espionage, desertion, failing to properly safeguard and store classified information, electronically copying classified information, communicating classified information to a person not entitled to receive it, and stealing and destroying a government computer.

Weinmann pleaded guilty to trying to transmit classified information related to national defense to a representative of a foreign government on Oct. 19, 2005, while he was in or near Vienna, Austria.

He pleaded not guilty to two additional espionage counts, one accusing him of giving classified information to an agent of a foreign government in March 2005 in Bahrain and another accusing him of trying to deliver confidential information on March 19, 2006, in Mexico City.

Weinmann told the judge that he deserted the Navy in July 2005 because the service did not meet his expectations.

"I had a very idealized view, basically what amounted to a World War II Navy," Weinmann told the judge.

Court adjourned Monday with the judge yet to accept the plea. Attorneys need to iron out details in the agreement regarding Weinmann's cooperation with investigators after trial.

Weinmann, a fire control technician, had been stationed on the Connecticut-based submarine USS Albuquerque.

He said he did not report for duty aboard his submarine on July 3, 2005. He moved to Austria and never planned to come back to the United States, but changed his mind and was arrested in March at Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport.

Weinmann told the judge he believed his actions could hurt national security.

"I believe if it fell into the wrong hand, sir, the information could be detrimental to the United States," Weinmann said.

He said he made copies of classified material on a laptop computer, which he took with him to Austria. He said that he printed one document and copied other information onto CDs and that he had unclassified, classified and secret information sitting on a table in his apartment in Austria.

The military has not said what it believes Weinmann might have sought in exchange for the information.

Weinmann's most recent duty station was at the Submarine Support Squadron, based in Norfolk.

Former U.S. Attorney Who Prosecuted Rickey Peete Speaks To Eyewitness News (WOTY)

WPTY-TV, December 5, 2006

A former U.S. Attorney talks to Eyewitness News about corruption charges against a Memphis City Council Member.

On Thursday, November 30, 2006, city council members Rickey Peete and Edmund Ford were charged for taking a bribes in exchange for their votes on a zoning issue. It is the same crime Rickey Peete was convicted of in 1989. Hickman Ewing was the U.S. Attorney who prosecuted the case.

The year was 1989. Hickman Ewing was the U.S. Attorney for West Tennessee. One day he received a call from his friend, a real estate developer. Ewing said, “In this case they called, and they said this guy's trying to shake us down.”

It was the beginning of Ewing's case against city councilman Rickey Peete. He said, “They would go down and talk to each councilman and try to lobby them to vote for them, and Rickey basically says I’m the one that can get this through, I can get this through for you, and I need money now and money later.

Ewing said the developers said no, and called him. They agreed to help Ewing get evidence that Rickey Peete was looking for a bribe. Ewing said, "The third partner, Hank Hill, called Rickey and said, 'Hey look, I know what you told my other partner, I'm a little different situation, we may be interested in this, so come on down.' Of course he's wearing a recorder at city hall."

Ewing said the two agreed to meet later that day at a restaurant to exchange the money. "Literally, Rickey says 'hand it under the table', and the guy hands him a sack full of bills under the table. The FBI is sitting at the next table watching," said Ewing. "He was two payments behind on his Mercedes, like $350, he goes and pays one that afternoon and says I'll give you the next payment whatever the date was of the vote. He says I'll give you that money then, that's pretty good evidence."

Ewing said Rickey Peete was by no means the first public official he went after during his time in the federal building. He said, "We probably prosecuted 100 public officials before 1989."

But hearing that Rickey Peete is now accused of the exact same crime was a different story, "It's sad, especially if it happens again, in somewhat the same way."

Ewing said he is glad the U.S. Attorney's office is continuing it's crusade against public corruption. He said, "I think prosecuting one public official is worth a lot more than prosecuting ten bank robbers. Who's more dangerous to society, one crack dealer who's 19 years-old who's got a habit, or the public official? I'd say the public official."

We tried to contact both Rickey Peete and his lawyer on Monday, December 04, 2006 for a comment on this story. Neither of them returned my calls.

On Friday, December 1, 2006, Rickey Peete resigned his position as chairman of the Center City Commission Board of Directors, but he is still a voting board member. On Tuesday, December 5, 2006, some city council members say they will call for Peete and Edmund Ford to resign from the council.

Not Guilty Plea In Hollywood Wiretapping (MH)

The Miami Herald, December 5, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A former phone company employee pleaded not guilty Monday to charges of lying to FBI agents and a federal grand injury investigating wiretapping allegations against Hollywood private investigator Anthony Pellicano.

Joann Wiggan is to stand trial Jan. 9 in U.S. District Court.

Wiggan, 52, is charged with lying to investigators, grand jurors and during a previous trial about her contact with former co-worker Ray Turner. If convicted, she faces a maximum of 15 years in prison.

Prosecutors say Wiggan was one of three SBC employees who supplied Turner with information from confidential phone company databases he used to help Pellicano illegally tap the phones of several Hollywood figures.

Turner and Pellicano have pleaded not guilty to charges in a separate indictment.

Wiggan was acquitted in September of four perjury charges but jurors deadlocked on a fifth. During the trial, she said her conversations with Turner had nothing to do with accessing private phone records for Pellicano.

Prosecutors countered by showing jurors pages of phone calls - more than 1,000 - from Wiggan between 1998 and 2002 that they say prove she lied about her contact with Turner.

In the new indictment, prosecutors allege Wiggan and Turner called each other at least 35 times during a time when Wiggan claimed they hadn't spoken.

Prosecutors also allege Wiggan denied retrieving voice mail messages from an account they say she accessed on "hundreds of occasions" between 1998 and 2004. Jurors deadlocked on that charge during her trial.

Prosecutors contend Pellicano illegally wiretapped the phones of such people as actors Sylvester Stallone and Keith Carradine and bribed police officers to run the names of more than 60 people, including comedians Garry Shandling and Kevin Nealon, through government databases. According to court documents, the information gathered was used to get dirt for threats, blackmail and in some cases to secure a tactical advantage in litigation.

Fourteen people have been charged in the case, with six pleading guilty to various crimes. Pellicano has pleaded not guilty to racketeering and wiretapping and is set for trial in August.

Alleged Mafia Underboss Is Freed On Bail (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 5, 2006

He faces charges of extortion and illegal gaming

SALEM -- Reputed New England Mafia underboss Carmen "The Big Cheese" DiNunzio looked uncomfortable yesterday as he shuffled into court in leg irons. He didn't speak, as his lawyer entered not guilty pleas on his behalf to charges of illegal gambling and extortion.

DOJ_NMG_0102405

"He's unused to the attention he's getting," said Boston lawyer Anthony M. Cardinale, who represents DiNunzio, 49, of East Boston. The man described by law enforcement officials as a low-key underworld leader was freed on bail after posting $20,000 cash.

"It's not the strongest of cases, but anything in superior court is always serious," said Cardinale, who has previously represented a who's who of mobsters, including former New England mob boss Francis "Cadillac Frank" Salemme and former underboss Gennaro "Jerry" Angiulo.

Cardinale said the indictment returned by an Essex County grand jury on Friday alleges crimes that occurred in 2001 and was brought just as the statute of limitations was about to expire.

"I think it's to our benefit that they waited this long" to bring the case, Cardinale said.

DiNunzio is charged with extortion, maintaining or organizing an illegal gaming operation, and conspiracy in maintaining or organizing a gaming operation.

According to law enforcement officials, DiNunzio rose to be second in command of all New England mobsters about 2002, after winning the favor of New England godfather Luigi "Baby Shanks" Manocchio of Providence.

Cardinale said his client vehemently denies allegations that he is the number two man in the New England mob and controls all Mafia activities in the Boston area.

First Assistant Essex District Attorney John T. Dawley said he was seeking a high cash bail for DiNunzio because "this case involves violence."

"It also involves witnesses who remain on the street," Dawley said.

He added that DiNunzio has a 1993 federal conviction for extortion.

In that case, DiNunzio admitted shaking down a Las Vegas gambler for $27,000 and was sentenced to four years in prison.

The indictment alleges that DiNunzio conspired to run an illegal gambling operation between September and December 2001 with four men, Joseph Settipane, Thomas Verona, James Candelino, and Gregory Costa.

All four men were bookmakers, according to law enforcement officials.

Settipane died after the Massachusetts State Police Special Service Section launched the 2001 probe, using wiretaps and hidden bugs to secretly record conversations.

Verona, Candelino, and Costa were indicted in December 2002 on illegal gambling charges in allegedly running a sports betting operation.

At the time, an Essex prosecutor described the trio as midlevel agents in a gambling network tied to organized crime. All three were convicted and sentenced to probation.

In March, Varone was among 24 men indicted on state gaming charges, according to a spokesman for Essex District Attorney Jonathan W. Blodgett. That case is still pending.

The investigation that led to DiNunzio's indictment also led to the indictment last February of reputed mob soldier William Angelesco on gambling and conspiracy charges.

DiNunzio, who owns the Fresh Cheese shop in the North End and Carmen's Kitchen restaurant in East Boston, declined to comment before leaving in a silver Isuzu.

Ansonia Man Competent For Murder-for-hire Trial (NHREG)

By Phil Helsel, Register Staff

New Haven Register, December 5, 2006

-ANSONIA — The local man who police say conspired with his mother in a low-rent "murder for hire" scheme was ruled competent to stand trial and entered not guilty pleas Monday.

Nicholas Scott Taylor, 20, is charged, along with his mother, Kathryn Smith, 48, of conspiring in a plot to kill Smith's boyfriend for what they believed would result in a $100,000 insurance policy payout earlier this year.

Monday, a judge ruled that Scott is competent to stand trial and the case was continued until Jan. 9.

Taylor, of Nichols Street, and his mother allegedly offered an undercover FBI informant a used stereo and up to $150 cash to kill Smith's longtime boyfriend, according to an arrest warrant affidavit. The offer was just $50 and a used stereo, and possibly another $100 after they cashed in some methadone, to carry out the killing, police said.

Smith and Taylor are each being held in lieu of $250,000 bail and are charged with one count each of conspiracy to commit murder, criminal attempt to commit murder and inciting injury to persons. Smith already has pleaded innocent to the charges.

According to police, Smith and Taylor tried to hire an acquaintance of theirs to carry out the murder, but he went to Shelton police instead.

Ansonia police and the FBI then began an undercover investigation that led to the pair's arrest Aug. 29.

Taylor allegedly told undercover officers during an arranged meeting that his mother's boyfriend was "getting really annoying to us."

He allegedly provided the undercover officer the man's work schedule, including days off, and said "the area around the ferry" would be a good place to discard a weapon.

Both allegedly told the agent they would not feel guilty if the plan were carried out, according to the affidavit.

Phil Helsel can be reached at 876-3028 or at phelsel@nhregister.com .

Woman Charged In '78 Slaying (SEATIMES)

By Steve Miletich And Jim Brunner, Seattle Times staff reporters

Seattle Times, December 5, 2006

Prosecutors charged a Pierce County woman Monday with first-degree murder in the 1978 killing of an auto mechanic who allegedly was lured to his death as part of a contract killing.

Karen L. Martin, 51, was arrested Friday by a FBI/local law-enforcement task force investigating old unsolved homicides. Her name surfaced as investigators combed past cases related to organized crime and Seattle strip clubs.

In court documents filed with the murder charge, King County Detective Scott Tompkins said Martin told him in July that her then-husband informed her they would be paid $10,000 to kill the victim, Leroy Grant, 36.

Martin said her husband was involved with prostitution and organized crime, Tompkins wrote in the charging documents. Her husband was in prison at the time.

On Jan. 22, 1978, Martin lured Grant to a site in Maple Valley on the premise that she wanted him to restore a Corvette for her, and then she killed him, according to the documents. His body was found four days later, shot at close range in the head and chest with a .22-caliber pistol.

A year after the killing, Martin and her attorney went to federal prosecutors, saying she had information on contract killings linked to a Seattle-based crime organization.

She was offered immunity from federal prosecution before she acknowledged she killed Grant, according to the charging papers. Grant was killed because he had obtained money "he was not supposed to have gotten," Martin allegedly told prosecutors.

Federal prosecutors didn't inform King County prosecutors about Martin's admissions, and Grant's slaying went unsolved.

The immunity offer was never formally executed and is not binding on state prosecutors, according to Tompkins' court filing.

When Tompkins contacted Martin in July, she at first denied killing Grant, the filing said. But Tompkins suggested investigators had found her DNA at the scene, and then she "confessed to committing the murder."

Martin provided details of the crime, including that she used a .22-caliber revolver and took Grant's wallet to make it look like a robbery, Tompkins wrote.

Martin's arrest was the third in the past year by the task force, which was formed after the 2003 "Strippergate" scandal in Seattle. The scandal involved the alleged funneling of illegal contributions to three Seattle City Council members by associates of Frank Colacurcio Sr. and his son, Frank Colacurcio Jr., the operator of Rick's strip club on Lake City Way Northeast.

In the wake of that scandal, investigators decided to focus on the Colacurcios' business operations, as well as old homicides possibly related to the strip-club industry.

When Martin approached federal prosecutors in 1979, she did so out of fear that her husband was trying to blame her for the killing, according to court documents. She sought immunity in exchange for the information.

At the time prosecutors were investigating Colacurcio Sr. and later convicted him of tax evasion.

Colacurcio Sr. has not been implicated in Grant's killing or in connection with the other two arrests, made in two separate 1975 killings at a Seattle-area strip club and at a Yakima restaurant. Colacurcio Jr. was in his teens at the time.

Martin is being held on $500,000 bail and is scheduled to enter a plea Dec. 14.

Producer Gets Short Sentence In TV Scam (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

After bilking millions from scores of investors, Joseph Medawar gets a term of a year and a day.

In a ruling that surprised attorneys and outraged investors, a federal judge Monday sentenced onetime Hollywood producer Joseph Medawar to a year and a day in prison for swindling scores of people out of millions of dollars to develop a bogus television show about the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

DOJ_NMG_0102407

Minutes after Medawar apologized to the people he defrauded, U.S. District Judge Manuel L. Real sentenced the 45-year-old con man to a prison term far shorter than the 33 months his attorney had requested, or the 57 months sought by the government. Medawar also was sentenced to nine months' home detention after his prison sentence ends and 3,000 hours of community service, and he was ordered to pay at least $2.6 million in restitution.

Showing no emotion, Medawar left the courtroom without comment. He was ordered to surrender Jan. 22 to begin his prison term. His attorney, Jeffrey Rutherford, later issued a prepared statement.

"Joseph Medawar accepts his sentence," the statement read. "He is extremely remorseful and repentant. He is sorry for the harm that he has caused and he accepts full responsibility for his conduct. He thanks his family and friends for their support. He vows to repay each of the victim-investors. He also vows to continue to help the government in its investigation of others."

Acknowledging disappointment, Assistant U.S. Atty. Christine Ewell told reporters outside court that authorities would review Real's sentence to see if there are any grounds for appeal.

Ewell also was apologetic when questioned by many investors about whether and when they might get reimbursed.

"We're doing our best. We're sorry," she told one woman. "Our goal is to get as much as we can back to you."

Real, 82, has been a lightning rod for criticism, with a reputation for a peremptory and even cantankerous temperament on the bench. Most recently, he was the subject of a congressional subcommittee hearing considering possible impeachment over his decision to seize a bankruptcy case from another judge.

After the sentence, investor Manuel Lozano did not hide his disappointment.

"I was looking for justice," he said. "I was expecting more."

In May, about three years after he first began promoting his idea for a Homeland Security series, Medawar admitted to authorities that the show was a financial scam and pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit mail fraud and income tax evasion.

By then, according to the FBI, the IRS and the U.S. attorney's office, Medawar and others had defrauded at least 70 investors — many from local churches — out of millions of dollars.

The money poured into his company, Steeple Productions, was spent on luxury cars, shopping sprees, jewelry, posh dinners and $40,000-a-month rent on a Beverly Hills mansion for the show's purported lead actress, Alison Heruth-Waterbury.

Heruth-Waterbury previously pleaded guilty in the case and was sentenced to five years' probation and 2,500 hours of community service and ordered to pay restitution. Jeffrey Rosenberg, former chief financial officer of Medawar's company, was sentenced to 10 months in federal prison for lying to agents about the fraud.

Medawar also persuaded two prominent Orange County Republicans, U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher and former congressman and current Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox, as well as House Homeland Security Committee staffers, to provide advice on how to make the show more realistic.

Medawar also was accused of using money laundered through the scheme to pay Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach) $23,000 for an option on a 30-year-old screenplay by Rohrabacher. The congressman has said he thought Medawar's proposed TV show would bring positive attention to the nation's homeland security efforts and denied that he provided Medawar any special attention in return for the producer's purchasing Rohrabacher's script or contributing to his political campaign.

In May, when Medawar pleaded guilty, Rohrabacher said he would return the screenplay option payment.

At Monday's hearing, the courtroom was packed with Medawar's relatives and victims.

Carmen Wood, 71, of Southgate, who invested $10,000 from her family trust, talked about how she blindly put her faith in Medawar and his idea the day she met him at a Whittier church, and how disappointed she was that someone would misuse Christianity to target innocent people for financial gain.

"I am asking that justice be served here for me and these people here who lost money," she said, later turning to look straight at Medawar and saying. "May God be your judge."

Lozano, who lost $120,000, told the story of another investor who could not be in court Tuesday. The man, suffering from lung cancer, had scraped up $1,000 to give Medawar, banking on the hope that once the production company went public, as promised, it would bring the payday he needed for a special medical procedure that could have saved his life. "His illness got the best of him," Lozano said of the man, who died "waiting for the money."

Minutes before Real's ruling, prosecutor Ewell urged the judge to sentence Medawar to no less than the nearly six years recommended by the government. She also dismissed the arguments of Medawar's family and friends that he is a good man who has always been generous to them.

"It's simple to be generous," Ewell scoffed, "when you are using other people's money."

Producer Gets 1-year Prison Sentence In Phony TV Series Scheme (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, December 5, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A man was sentenced to a year in prison Monday for bilking investors out of millions of dollars by fraudulently claiming to be producing a government-backed television show about the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

The sentence given to Joseph Medawar, 44, by a federal judge was a fraction of what prosecutors had sought.

U.S. District Judge Manuel Real said he wanted Medawar free after a year to earn $3.46 million in restitution to investors, many of whom Medawar met in church. The judge also sentenced Medawar to 3,000 hours of community service.

Medawar pleaded guilty in May to tax evasion and conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud, admitting fleecing about 50 people of millions of dollars.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Christine Ewell said outside court that she had sought a 57-month sentence and was disappointed by the judge's leniency.

Prosecutors said Medawar's lies included telling investors that President Bush endorsed the series and that the real Department of Homeland Security approved use of its name and seal for the TV show.

As part of the scheme, federal prosecutors said, he falsely claimed 26 episodes of "DHS" were in post-production and that the company had distribution deals with 137 overseas markets. Investigators found only one episode had been shot, and only after Medawar became aware of the federal probe.

One would-be investor, Manuel Lozano, told the judge Monday that Medawar left many "individuals financially crushed by the side of the road." Lozano said he had been fooled into investing $120,000 in the series - money that included life insurance he collected when his wife died.

Lozano also expressed disappointment outside the court, saying "justice and the legal system don't necessarily coexist."

Jeffrey Rosenberg, 58, a financial officer who failed to report the scheme, was sentenced to five years probation and 2,000 hours of community service in September. He also was ordered to pay $1.5 million in restitution to the victims of the investment scam.

Alison Heruth, who claimed to be the lead actress in "DHS," also pleaded guilty in the case and was given probation.

Murder Convict In FEMA Fraud Trial (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), December 4, 2006

Governor Reiss Sr. committed murder as a teenager, spent part of his adulthood on the run after an escape from prison and then became a preacher.

Now in his 50s, the Mobile native finds himself once again in trouble with the law.

Reiss, 54, will go on trial later this month on charges that he defrauded the federal government following Hurricane Katrina, the first such case to go to trial in Mobile's federal court. Jury selection is slated for today.

It marks yet another bizarre turn in a life filled with twists that has taken Reiss from Mobile County to prison to Louisiana to prison again.

Reiss' colorful history notwithstanding, defense attorney Willie Huntley said his client is innocent of the current allegations. He attributed the fraud charges to confusion on the part of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which he contends filed his application under the wrong category.

"All he did was make a call and say, 'I need some help' just like thousands of people along the Gulf Coast," Huntley said in a recent interview.

Reiss pleaded not guilty last week to the latest charges, the third set of allegations brought in the case. Prosecutors accuse him of filing fraudulent claims with FEMA for housing assistance totaling more than $12,000.

A guilty plea hearing had been set for August, but Reiss said he wanted a trial. Then a federal grand jury added more charges in September. The trial was supposed to be held in October, but a judge postponed it until this month because a key prosecution witness was unavailable at the time.

A week before jury selection, the grand jury came back with more charges.

If the trial goes off as scheduled on Dec. 18, it will not be the first time Reiss will have sweated out the deliberations of 12 jurors. Records from the Alabama Department of Corrections show that Reiss was sentenced in January 1970 for second-degree murder in the shooting death of a teenager at a Prichard club the previous year.

He served four years in prison before escaping from Draper Correctional Institution in September 1974, said corrections spokesman Brian Corbett.

DOJ_NMG_0102409

"I didn't stay because I was wrongly accused, and the only way I could prove that was to live it," Reiss said in an interview last week.

Louisiana authorities arrested Reiss 10 years later, Corbett said. According to a news account at the time, Reiss had become a minister and asked for permission to preach to inmates at the Louisiana State Police barracks in Baton Rouge.

Louisiana officials conducted a routine background check and discovered that Reiss had two arrests on his record -- the murder charge and a second one for assault with intent to murder, according to the 1984 newspaper article. The story said police inquired further and discovered Reiss had escaped from the Alabama prison.

Mike Edmonson, a Louisiana state trooper, said at the time that authorities called up Reiss and told him his request to preach had been granted. When he arrived, police arrested him and took him to the East Baton Rouge Parish jail.

"The guy was extremely surprised. It was a shock to him, but he knew what he'd done in the past, so I don't think he was completely surprised," the newspaper quoted Edmonson as saying.

Reiss said that it was not the first time he had been arrested. He said he was arrested in Louisiana 1976, and three other times on the escape charge, but that Louisiana refused to turn him over to Alabama authorities out of concern over the validity of the murder conviction.

Corbett said records indicate Reiss returned to Alabama in 1991, seven years after the 1984 arrest in Louisiana. He said the Alabama Board of Pardons and Paroles granted Reiss a parole in 1991. Reiss said he came back voluntarily.

Reiss was 17 when the original crime for which he was convicted took place. According to a newspaper account, Reiss shot Ronnie Hays to death during a dance inside a teen club on Whistler Avenue.

Reiss testified that he and some friends had been drinking and were angered when they were told to leave. He said he went to his grandmother's house, got a shotgun and shells and returned to fire several shots through the window.

Hays, a standout high school athlete, was killed and 12 others were wounded.

Defense lawyers argued at trial that Hays could have been killed by his own father, who had fired a pistol during the confusion, according to the newspaper article.

Charges involves FEMA

Reiss said he became a born-again Christian in 1978, and later became a minister. He said he founded three different churches, retiring as a full-time preacher in 2001 because of high blood pressure.

Now, he is one of thousands of people across the country who authorities contend took advantage of FEMA's decision to hand out cash on little more than the word of the applicants following the Aug. 29, 2005, hurricane. More than a dozen people have been charged in southwest Alabama.

The latest indictment charges Reiss with making false claims against the government, making a false statement and two counts each of theft of public money, wire fraud and aggravated identity theft.

Authorities allege that Reiss lived in New Orleans at one time but was living in Mobile when the storm struck. According to the indictment, Reiss applied for assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Sept. 30, 2005, listing his name and someone else's, and using a New Orleans address where he did not live at the time of the hurricane.

Reiss allegedly obtained two payments from FEMA in 2005: $2,358 on Oct. 4 and $10,500 on Nov. 22.

Huntley said Reiss applied over the phone for aid to replace furniture, clothing and a vehicle that were destroyed when floodwaters ravaged New Orleans. Reiss said he did not use the first check to replace those belongings, as FEMA requires, but instead spent it on other things -- including helping a church member. He said he did not know about FEMA's restrictions on the aid at the time.

Reiss said the second check came as a surprise. "They sent me money that I didn't ask for. It was supposed to go to my ex-wife."

Reiss said he did not apply under his ex-wife's name, as the indictment alleges, but listed her as an occupant of the house that was damaged. He and his lawyer contend it was a mix-up that the check came to him. Huntley said Reiss, his ex-wife and son -- all of whom share the same last name -- all applied for aid.

"I believe that's what caused the complications and confusion," Huntley said.

Reiss said he deposited the money in his credit union but said he never spent it. He said he was trying to get it to his ex-wife but was not supposed to have contact with her as a result of the divorce.

The indictment accuses Reiss of falsely stating in his application that he lived in New Orleans when he actually lived in Mobile. Huntley said his client has an Alabama driver's license and had gotten a job in Mobile and moved in with relatives in the Port City several months before Katrina because his New Orleans home was about to be foreclosed on. But he continued to travel back and forth between both cities, Huntley said.

Even if Mobile was his primary residence, Huntley said, Reiss still would be eligible for FEMA assistance related to his personal property.

Under a preliminary calculation by the U.S. Probation Office, Reiss would have an incarceration range of six to 12 months and be eligible for probation. But Huntley said prosecutors have indicated to him that they plan to hold Reiss' prior criminal record against him if he's convicted -- a move the defense lawyer said he would fight on grounds that it happened too long ago to be relevant.

"Hopefully, we won't even have to get to this issue because, hopefully, a jury will find him not guilty ," he said.

Man Arrested, Tied To Assaults Near Howard (WP)

By Robert E. Pierre

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

A teenager from Temple Hills has been arrested in connection with eight recent sexual assaults near Howard University, D.C. police said yesterday.

Women were groped in the incidents, and in two cases, the assailant brandished a knife, police said. No one was injured in the assaults, which took place late last month. During the past week, police blanketed the area where the assaults occurred with plainclothes and uniformed officers.

Yesterday, police announced the arrest of Avon Marquell Pittman, 17, of the 4700 block of Temple Hill Road. On Saturday afternoon, plainclothes officers noticed Pittman following a woman in the 200 block of T Street NW and pounced, discovering a kitchen knife and taking him into custody, police said. He was later let go, and police said the woman he had been following was so startled that she left before they could question her.

Police arrested Pittman early yesterday, after authorities developed additional leads. He was charged as an adult with assault with intent to commit first-degree sexual assault while armed. The charge applies to just one of the cases.

But "the community can feel confident" that the crimes are solved, police Cmdr. Larry McCoy declared at a news conference.

Police had offered a $10,000 reward in the case, and McCoy said it was unclear whether it would be paid. But he said tips helped police solve the cases quickly. Witnesses helped police come up with a composite drawing that was passed out to residents.

Police said the victims ranged in age from 16 to 49, though most were in their teens and 20s. Most of the crimes took place near Fifth and U streets NW, near one another and during daylight hours. Police did not offer a motive but said Pittman had friends and family in the neighborhood.

D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1), who represents the area, said residents have been concerned about being groped as they walked down the street. He praised the police effort, which he said included having female officers pose as private citizens.

"This shows what can happen when the police really focus their energy and make determined efforts," he said. "This is a real relief to get this guy off the street."

For Second Time, Kaine Delays Execution Of Va. Triple Killer (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine yesterday delayed for the second time the execution of triple killer Percy L. Walton, a move that keeps the capital murder case at the center of a growing national debate over the execution of the mentally ill.

In June, Kaine delayed Walton's scheduled execution until Friday to allow for an independent evaluation of his mental condition and competence. Based on that evaluation, Kaine (D) said yesterday that Walton's execution would be delayed 18 more months, until June 10, 2008.

"I am compelled to conclude that Walton is severely mentally impaired and meets the Supreme Court's definition of mental incompetence," Kaine said in a statement. "At the same time, it is within the realm of possibility -- though unlikely -- that Walton's mental impairment is not permanent. Accordingly, a commutation of his sentence is not appropriate at this time."

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1986 that the execution of the mentally ill violates the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court said death-row inmates must be able to comprehend that they are about to be executed and why. But the high court left it up to states to define who is sane or insane.

Walton's case is one of several pending around the country that have frequently been cited as important tests of the limits of the Supreme Court's ruling in Ford v. Wainwright.

Attorneys for Walton, 28, contend that Walton is mentally ill and mentally retarded and that his condition has further deteriorated since he has been on death row. His attorneys at trial never requested a competency hearing. A competency hearing was held three years ago as part of his appeals, and experts disagreed about his mental state.

DOJ_NMG_0102411

In a rare move, less than two hours before his scheduled execution in June, Kaine asked three mental health experts to evaluate Walton to determine if he is competent to be executed. A spokesman for the governor said two of the three experts had completed reports on Walton's mental health, and one declined to review his case. The experts' conclusions will not be made public, the spokesman said.

Jennifer Givens, an attorney for Walton, said yesterday that there is little doubt that Walton is mentally ill, adding that she is pleased with the governor's decision.

"As we have predicted all along, the governor has determined that Walton's severe mental illness prevents him from understanding fully the punishment he is about to suffer and why he is to suffer it," Givens said.

The reprieve drew fire, however, from Kaine's political adversaries, who said Kaine, who twice defended death-row inmates as a private attorney, failed to deliver on his campaign promise to uphold the death penalty in Virginia. Kaine's former campaign opponent, former Republican attorney general Jerry W. Kilgore, said he was not surprised by the governor's decision.

"It's what we expected and what we said when we were on the campaign trail," Kilgore said. "It's a shame any time one person exerts his will over that of an unbiased jury and not only that, judges and appellate judges."

Virginia Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R) raised similar concerns in a statement yesterday, saying he "respects" Kaine's authority but thinks Walton should be executed. McDonnell said he is "concerned about the impact today's action could have on our justice system."

Since he took office, Kaine has allowed four executions to go forward.

Walton pleaded guilty in 1997 to killing Jessie and Elizabeth Kendrick, an elderly Danville couple, and his neighbor Archie Moore. Walton's current attorneys and his family maintain that he showed signs of the early onset of schizophrenia before his conviction.

Yesterday's decision marked the third time in three years that the execution of Walton, 28, has been at least temporarily halted. In 2003, a federal judge delayed Walton's execution three days to hear testimony about his mental state. This June 8, after ordering an inquiry into his mental state, Kaine said there "is more than a minimal chance that Walton no longer knows why he is to be executed or is even aware of the punishment he is about to receive."

Nicknamed "Crazy Horse" by death-row guards for his bizarre behavior, Walton often refuses to shower and rarely speaks coherently, his attorneys say. Characterized as "floridly psychotic" by a psychiatrist, Walton has said that he will go to Burger King, that he will drive a motorcycle after his execution and that he believes his death will resurrect his three victims and his late grandfather, his attorneys said.

In March, Walton's case narrowly split the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit, which ruled 7 to 6 that his execution could go forward, saying that questions about whether Walton understood that his "death means the end of his physical life" bordered on the "metaphysical."

Last week, a North Carolina judge issued a 60-day stay in the case of Guy T. LeGrande, a convicted killer who wore a Superman T-shirt and sent letters to a judge signed "Lucifer" when he defended himself at his murder trial.

CIVIL LAW:

Trusts Busted (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Harry Kananian died in the year 2000 of mesothelioma -- a cancer almost always caused by asbestos. But the legacy that may survive him is the role he is posthumously playing in exposing evidence of asbestos litigation fraud.

In early 2000, the Ohio resident met with the law firm of Early, Ludwick, Sweeney & Strauss to see about collecting compensation from special trusts set up by companies to deal with asbestos liabilities. So the law firm filed a claim to one trust, saying Kananian had worked in a World War II shipyard and was exposed to insulation containing asbestos. It also filed a claim to another trust saying he had been a shipyard welder. A third claim, to another trust, said he'd unloaded asbestos off ships in Japan. And a fourth claim said that he'd worked with "tools of asbestos" before the war. Meanwhile, a second law firm, Brayton Purcell, submitted two more claims to two further trusts, with still different stories. The two firms swept up as much as $700,000 for Kananian and his estate from trusts and settlements.

In the legal trade, this is known as "double dipping" -- the process by which lawyers file claims at many different bankruptcy trusts on behalf of a single plaintiff. Each trust is told a different story about how the client got sick, and the plaintiff collects from all of them. Of course, the lawyers collect too. This practice may well have remained unexposed had not Brayton Purcell decided to cash in on Kananian one more time. It sued Lorillard Tobacco, this time claiming its client had become sick from smoking Kent cigarettes, whose filters contained asbestos for several years in the 1950s. That suit has now exploded on Brayton, exposing one of the asbestos bar's more lucrative cash cows.

In Cleveland, Judge Harry Hanna of the Cuyahoga County Court of Common Pleas has been asked to rule on a motion to disqualify Brayton from the suit and bar it from practicing in Ohio. The firm stands accused by Lorillard of lying to the court, defrauding asbestos trust funds and obstructing discovery. Those accusations come via a raft of internal emails and documents, most if which are referred to in the court record, that tell a story of two law firms using contradictory stories to rake in money from bankruptcy trusts, then potentially trying to cover it up. All parties are under a gag order from the judge. Last week, Brayton Purcell, amazingly, requested to withdraw itself from the case. * * *

As the tort bar piled on endless -- and often bogus -- asbestos claims in the 1990s, many defendant companies started looking for a way out. One solution was to go into bankruptcy, turn over a huge chunk of money to an asbestos "trust," and emerge from Chapter 11 clear of asbestos woes. These trusts are responsible for one of the largest wealth transfers in history, shifting billions from companies and insurers to plaintiffs lawyers and their largely healthy customers. A number of large trusts are due to come online over the next year alone, with assets of $30 billion.

Many trusts are run by the very lawyers who created them; that is, once the trust is created, the defendant company is no longer involved with claims, and the trial lawyers divvy up the money. These lawyers, because their contingency fees are based on the trust's payouts, have no incentive to ensure that applicants for compensation were actually harmed by that particular trust's product. While it is not illegal to file at different trusts (and some industrial workers were exposed in multiple ways), most such claims are vague or contradictory. Trust payments are also considered legal settlements and thus confidential. So while the asbestos bar may wrongly double dip, this is usually hard to prove.

Harry Kananian met with the firm Early Ludwick in February 2000. According to an Early email, he wasn't clear how he'd been exposed. He had, however, served in the Army in World War II and remembered several months on troop ships known to contain asbestos. On one such two-week trip he'd done welding. He also recalled working in a factory that was "dusty," as well as a "white powdery substance" when he was remodeling his house.

Early Ludwick then filed its multiple claims -- to the 48 Insulations trust, the Eagle Picher trust, the UNR trust, the Celotex trust and others. Brayton Purcell was also retained by the plaintiff and filed claims to Johns Manville and Bethlehem Steel. The discrepancies were never questioned until Brayton sued Lorillard Tobacco, and Brayton probably never thought the prior claims would be an issue. But Lorillard suspected Kananian had already collected on the basis of his work history -- and it argued the jury had a right to know. To Brayton's dismay, Judge Hanna agreed earlier this year.

When Brayton's lead counsel, Chris Andreas, started to realize in February that Judge Hanna would allow the claims as evidence, his first strategy was to sell Early Ludwick down the river. Mr. Andreas seemed to hope that, if the judge thought Early's work was erroneous, he wouldn't allow the claims into court, where they might sway a jury. Mr. Andreas said in court that the Early claims were "flat incorrect," "simply inaccurate," "absurd" and "the most misleading information that [he'd] ever seen." The judge was unmoved.

In a March 10 email, Mr. Andreas relates the bad news to his partners, and explains the problems with the original claims. To give one example: In the UNR claim (which stated Kananian had unloaded asbestos off ships), Mr. Andreas says that, in fact, Kananian only supervised Japanese workers who'd unloaded ships. Also, "there is absolutely no evidence that anyone shipped or unloaded Unibestos [a UNR product] on any of ship [sic] he was involved with during this period, least of all Mr. Kananian himself." The rest of the Early claims had similar problems, he said, admitting that in one of Brayton's own claims "we also overstate Mr. Kananian's exposure . . ." In a separate email he states, "there is no way what our client sent them matches what they put in these forms."

Mr. Andreas worries that "I am forced to try to explain them away as mistakes by clerks or [attorneys]. A jury is going to look down on this type of fabrication by lawyers and can use this information to dump plaintiffs by finding that." He then offers a choice: They can give the money back, in which case Judge Hanna won't allow the claims, or they can "go forward at trial" and try to get the jury to focus on something other than "unsworn claim forms that were just used to pry money out of a bankrupt" (my emphasis). The goal, he says in another email, is to "blame [Early] for bulls----ing the trusts."

Meanwhile, Lorillard was trying to subpoena the confidential trust claims. Brayton knew the judge would go ballistic if it tried to officially squelch this process, so instead it worked behind the scenes. When the Celotex trust informed the law firms that it had received a subpoena, and asked whether they would try to legally block the subpoena, one outside lawyer suggested they "respond to [Celotex] via phone requesting that they resist . . ." Mr. Andreas noted: "I would love if Celotex gave these a--holes a hard time."

When it became clear Lorillard would get its way, the strategy changed again. Brayton Purcell decided it would work with Early Ludwick to submit amended claims to the trusts. In Brayton's original claim to Johns Manville, for instance, the form had described Kananian as a "laborer" who had direct contact with asbestos. It also said he'd worked in "shipyard construction/repair" and listed several Manville products, by name, to which he'd been exposed. The amended claim instead listed Kananian's occupation as "other," noted that he'd only been on board a ship where Manville products were installed, removed any reference to shipyard work, and deleted any Manville products. Other trust claims were similarly purged.

But Brayton Purcell had a problem. It needed to change the forms to bolster the Lorillard suit, but it didn't want to raise alarms at the asbestos trusts. Its solution was apparently to try to make sure the trusts didn't look closely. Even as Mr. Andreas was telling his partners that the original Early claims were "fictional," he instructed those working on the new claims to tell the trusts they were only "correcting some clerical errors." Partner Al Brayton instructed his staff, according to an email, to "simply re-do the old claim form with the new answers and submit with a cover letter. Do not call them."

By spring, Judge Hanna was getting suspicious. To the firms' dismay, he took the rare step of allowing Lorillard to depose its opponents. Brayton Purcell emails show it wondering if the former office assistant who'd prepared the original Manville claim was "disgruntled." Mr. Brayton had already instructed an underling to "immediately brief all personnel preparing claim forms or efficiency responses that they are not to 'make up' information to make a claim qualify." But the firms continued to obstruct, and the judge had enough. This summer, he ordered up their emails.

Among other things, the emails show that raise questions about Mr. Andreas's candor with Judge Hanna. On March 10, Mr. Andreas told the court that he didn't know if the original Early Ludwick claims had even been submitted to the trusts, and said he would "welcome" documentation showing they had. In fact, on March 3 -- a week prior to Mr. Andreas's statement -- a paralegal at Brayton sent an email to Early Ludwick noting that "trial attorney, Christopher Andreas, asked that I follow up with your office on the total amount of settlements your office has obtained in this case." That same day, Early Ludwick sent back an email listing the trusts and how much money had been obtained from each. As for Mr. Andreas welcoming proof from the trusts, this was about the same time he was hoping Celotex would resist.

Then there's Mr. Andreas's knowledge of the claims. On March 23, he told Judge Hanna that his firm would "stand by" its original Manville form. In fact, the firm had submitted a revised claim the night before. When Judge Hanna found out, he asked if Mr. Andreas had known. His response: "I'll just tell you right on the record and I'll repeat it under oath at any other point, I did not know about it when we argued on [March 23]. I did not know it had been prepared." However, Mr. Andreas had been sent an email with the revised form on March 22 -- the night before his "stand by" comment -- and had replied, only two hours after receipt. * * *

Lorillard laid most of this out in a motion requesting that the judge dismiss the case, bar Brayton Purcell from Ohio, and turn the information over to the Justice Department. Lorillard is insisting the original claims were accurate, although Harry Kananian's real history remains the great mystery here.

Brayton Purcell in November filed a 101-page document, arguing that Kananian's mesothelioma was caused by the "total dose of inhaled asbestos from all products," including Kent cigarettes. Regarding its desire to alter the claims, it said it believes the jury had a right to accurate evidence. It addressed one issue, claiming that "while it may be true" that Mr. Andreas knew about the amended claim form even as he said he "stood by" the original, his statement related to the "overall accuracy" of that original. Then, last week, it filed a motion asking to be withdrawn, although it said it was doing this to help its client, not because of the allegations. Mark Abelson, of Campagnoli, Abelson and Campagnoli, an attorney for Brayton Purcell, says: "At this point in time, we don't believe that the Brayton Purcell firm had done anything wrong. It is my belief that Lorillard is making every attempt to create tangential issues to the litigation that will delay and deflect any actual trial on the merits of their own conduct." Early Ludwick had no comment. Lorillard did not return a call.

Judge Hanna has continued to push back the trial date until the claims issue is resolved. A hearing is set for this week, and it isn't clear he'll allow Brayton to withdraw and thus escape any further scrutiny.

Whatever happens, the exposure of this trust scam is bolstering a new wave of oversight. Judges are already taking a closer look at silicosis claims and "prepackaged" bankruptcies -- both cash cows for the trial bar. Just last week, a separate Ohio judge ruled that an asbestos plaintiff must turn over any prior claims to a bankruptcy trust. Similar rulings have been handed down in Virginia and California.

Meanwhile, reform proposals are beginning to emerge. One idea is for the trusts to release data about claimants, so that other trusts and defense attorneys can review existing claims. Some lawyers are requesting that active litigation be put on hold until companies can see who claimed from trusts. That this hasn't already happened is the fault of bankruptcy judges, who have been unresponsive to requests for more oversight of the trusts they help create.

A cleaner system would help true victims. Some lawyers for mesothelioma victims feel the need to file many claims because trusts are drying up -- making it difficult to get decent compensation. The feeding frenzy by plaintiffs lawyers who cash in repeatedly, often on behalf of plaintiffs who are entirely healthy, often leaves little for those who are truly ill. It isn't justice: It's fraud.

Diversity Programs May Face Ax (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court appeared ready Monday to strike down public school diversity programs that use race as a factor in deciding where students go to school.

In the first test of school integration efforts to come before the court since Chief Justice John Roberts and fellow conservative Samuel Alito joined the bench last term, the justices heard two cases — one from Seattle, the other from Louisville — that examine whether using race in school assignments violates the Constitution's equality guarantee.

The court has supported affirmative action policies in education, most recently in 2003, when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor joined the nine-member court's four liberals to allow colleges to consider race in admissions to get diversity.

O'Connor is retired now, replaced by Alito. And Monday's two hours of arguments indicated that the court is moving toward a harder line on race-based policies.

The key player appeared to be Justice Anthony Kennedy, who is at the ideological center of the court. As the liberals asked questions that suggested they supported the school districts' policies, Kennedy joined conservative justices in expressing skepticism about programs that transfer some students out of their neighborhoods to counteract racially segregated housing patterns in those cities.

Kennedy bristled at the notion of "characterizing each student by the color of his or her skin," even for benevolent reasons. He rejected arguments that such policies do not stigmatize or otherwise harm students because all pupils end up with a place in a classroom, even if they are denied the school of their choice.

"The question is whether or not you can get into the school that you really prefer," Kennedy said. "And that in some cases depends solely on skin color. You know, it's like saying everybody can have a meal but only people with (a particular) skin can get the dessert."

Also challenging the policies were Roberts, Alito and Justice Antonin Scalia. Justice Clarence Thomas, the only African-American justice, asked no questions but has made clear in the past that he opposes using race as a factor to address past discrimination.

If the court rules against the districts, it could spell the end to school policies across the nation that use race as a criterion for enrollment and other decisions. The impact of a ruling would depend on its scope. Kennedy suggested that policies such as those in Louisville and Seattle that use race determinatively were unconstitutional but that "magnet" programs that enroll students voluntarily in a racially mixed school might be permissible.

Liberal Justice Stephen Breyer, whose questions indicated he backed the school districts, lamented the possibility that they would not be able to use race-conscious methods to continue integrating schools.

"It seems to me … that there is a terrible problem in this country," he said. "There are lots and lots of school districts that are becoming more and more segregated, and school boards all over are struggling with this problem. If they knew an easy way, they would do it."

Breyer and the other liberals — John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg — suggested a ruling against the school districts could undermine Brown v. Board of Education, the landmark 1954 ruling in which the court abolished the doctrine of "separate but equal" and began the nation's history of school desegregation.

Attorneys on both sides of the issue Monday, whether supporting the school systems' integration efforts or challenging them as wrongly perpetuating the use of race, contend that their side embodies the legacy of Brown.

The significance of the cases — and of their potential impact on the 1954 landmark — was apparent in the courtroom. Among the spectators was Cecilia "Cissy" Marshall, the widow of the late Justice Thurgood Marshall, the nation's first black justice and a legal architect of desegregation. Also in the court was William Coleman, who was part of Marshall's legal team in 1954, went on to become secretary of Transportation in the Ford administration and is now a lawyer in Washington.

Outside the marble-columned building, supporters of the integration programs vastly outnumbered challengers. They chanted, "Equal education, not segregation."

However, it is the challengers — mostly white parents whose children were not assigned to their schools of choice — who seemed more likely to prevail.

Supreme Court Weighs School Diversity Cases (MCT)

By Stephen Henderson

DOJ_NMG_0102415

McClatchy Newspapers, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - In historic arguments over voluntary school desegregation plans in Seattle and Louisville, Ky., a majority of the Supreme Court seemed highly skeptical Monday that race can be used even as a "tipping factor" in the decision to move students around to produce racially diverse schools.

But Justice Anthony Kennedy, probably the decisive vote on the matter, also seemed to stop short of embracing assertions that the Constitution always requires colorblind approaches to school integration, such as magnet schools.

Either way, the court effectively could end voluntary integration plans that are in place in dozens of school districts across the country by next spring. That would force administrators to come up with more subtle ways to ensure that children don't attend schools that reflect the nation's still-segregated housing patterns. Kennedy's distinctions might be the only hope for school districts that want to desegregate.

"When it came to the plans at issue, Kennedy certainly seemed to evince a good deal of hostility," said Ted Shaw, the executive director of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, which is supporting the school districts in the cases.

"But I also think he was trying to figure out where the stopping point was or how far the argument ought to go," Shaw said. "I think he was looking for a limiting principle" for the idea of government colorblindness.

Kennedy was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts, Justice Antonin Scalia and Justice Samuel Alito in his criticism of the school plans. Justice Clarence Thomas, a longtime critic of race-conscious policies, typically doesn't speak during oral arguments but is widely expected to object to the plans.

The cases, Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, mark a return for the justices to the dicey question of how race fits into the Constitution, and how the nation's past can be confronted.

The school districts say integration is a key component of a public education, and is compelling enough by law to justify a limited use of race in policies designed to produce that integration.

Scalia was especially dubious of the argument, advanced by a lawyer for the Seattle schools, that the plans were justified as a way to combat segregation.

"Can you think of any area of law in which we say whatever it takes, so long as there's a real need?" Scalia asked. "I mean, if we have a lot of crime out there and the only way to get rid of it is to use warrantless searches, you know, fudge on some of the protections of the Bill of Rights, whatever it takes, we've got to do it?"

"It seems to me you're saying you can't make an omelet without breaking eggs," Scalia said.

Kennedy seemed closer to Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer on the question of whether race-conscious policies should be permitted at all.

Breyer was particularly exercised over assertions that race-conscious integration efforts, which have been mandated by courts seeking to remedy past segregation, could be deemed unconstitutional outside the context of a court order.

"How could the Constitution, the day that that decree is removed, tell the school board it cannot make that effort anymore, it can't do what it's been doing, and we'll send the children back to their black schools and their white schools?" Breyer asked.

Kennedy was quite pointed in his criticism of the Seattle and Louisville plans, saying that unlike more nuanced measures, they characterize "each student by reason of the color of his or her skin.

"That is quite a different means. And it seems to me that should only be, if ever, allowed as a last resort."

But Kennedy also signaled to lawyers for parents who've challenged the assignment plans that race neutrality may not always be required.

In Seattle, an "open choice" student-assignment plan allows high school students to pick a number of schools they'd like to attend. They're generally granted their choices, but if a school has too many applicants, the district takes several other factors into account to decide who got in.

One of them is race, which is used to prevent most schools from having demographics that differed wildly from the district as a whole.

In Louisville, after public schools were released from a court-ordered desegregation plan in 2000, administrators chose to continue an integration plan. Students choose from among several schools near their homes, and the district assigns them based, in part, on maintaining a racial balance in each school.

But parents, including some blacks, in both districts sued after their children were denied entry to neighborhood schools or schools they otherwise wanted to attend. They say the districts' policies discriminate on the basis of race, something the 14th Amendment to the Constitution doesn't permit.

The parents are supported in both cases by the Bush administration, which has consistently argued that while diversity is a compelling interest, it must be achieved through race-neutral means.

The cases' arguments echo the court's 2003 rulings on college affirmative action, which carved a narrow berth for race-conscious admissions as a way to enhance campus diversity. The school districts rely directly on the reasoning in those cases to support their policies.

The cases also reach back to Brown v. Board of Education, the landmark 1954 case that ordered an end to public school segregation. Brown at one time was used to support massive involuntary busing and sweeping, court-ordered desegregation plans, and its promise of integrated public schools is the legal force behind the voluntary plans that exist today.

A decision is expected by the end of June.

Court Reviews Race As Factor In School Plans (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — By the time the Supreme Court finished hearing arguments on Monday on the student-assignment plans that two urban school systems use to maintain racial integration, the only question was how far the court would go in ruling such plans unconstitutional.

There seemed little prospect that either the Louisville, Ky., or Seattle plans would survive the hostile scrutiny of the court's new majority. In each system, students are offered a choice of schools but can be denied admission based on their race if enrolling at a particular school would upset the racial balance.

At its most profound, the debate among the justices was over whether measures designed to maintain or achieve integration should be subjected to the same harsh scrutiny to which Brown v. Board of Education subjected the regime of official segregation. In the view of the conservative majority, the answer was yes.

While there is no reliable data on how common these plans are, they are thought to be widespread among school districts where residential patterns would otherwise produce neighborhood schools of one race or nearly so. Depending on how broadly the court rules, possibly hundreds of districts would need to modify or scrap voluntary integration plans.

The National School Boards Association as well as the Council of the Great City Schools, representing 66 urban districts, filed briefs on behalf of Seattle and Louisville, warning of impending disruption if the justices overturn the lower court rulings that upheld the two plans.

The Supreme Court had declined to review a similar voluntary integration plan in Massachusetts last year, shortly before the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and the arrival of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. But in June, after weeks of internal debate, the justices accepted these two appeals.

One was filed by a white woman in Louisville whose son was denied a transfer to attend kindergarten in a school that needed black rather than white students in order to keep its black population at the district's required minimum of 15 percent.

The other was filed by parents in Seattle who organized as a corporation to oppose the plan there, which applies only to the city's 10 high schools. A racial "tiebreaker," used when a high school attracts more students than there are places, intends to keep the schools within 15 percent of the district's overall makeup, which is 60 percent nonwhite.

Before the arguments on Monday, the challenge for the school board lawyers defending the plans, along with their allies in the civil rights community, had appeared to be to persuade the justices that the appropriate analogy was not to affirmative action, a freighted subject for the court in which benefits are bestowed on one group and withheld from another, but rather to integration, in which the goal is to educate everyone as equally as possible.

But by the end of the tense two hours of argument, that effort had not so much failed as it had become irrelevant. Lawyers for the school systems found themselves struggling, under the justices' questioning, to meet the even more basic challenge of explaining why the plans should be seen as something different from the intentional segregation that the court struck down in Brown v. Board of Education.

For example, Michael F. Madden, the Seattle district's lawyer, tried to argue that because the Seattle high schools were "basically comparable," and "everyone gets a seat," the court should not view the plan as "a selective or merit-based system where we adjudge one student to be better than the other."

It was, Mr. Madden said, "a distributive system" that was "quite wholly dissimilar to a merit or selective-based system."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. countered, "Saying that this doesn't involve individualized determinations simply highlights the fact that the decision to distribute, as you put it, was based on skin color and not any other factor."

He added: "I mean, everyone got a seat in Brown as well. But because they were assigned to those seats on the basis of race, it violated equal protection. How is your argument that there's no problem here because everybody gets a seat distinguishable?"

"Because segregation is harmful," Mr. Madden replied.

"It's an assignment on the basis of race, correct?" the chief justice persisted.

DOJ_NMG_0102417

It was, Mr. Madden replied as his 30 minutes ran out and the red light came on, an effort "to bring students together in a mix that is not too far from their community."

As the arguments proceeded, the court's more liberal members appeared increasingly and visibly dispirited. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg tried unsuccessfully to turn the chief justice's colloquy with Mr. Madden in a different direction. The question of whether "using racial integration is the same as segregation," she said, was "pretty far from the kind of headlines that attended the Brown decision."

Bringing "white and black children together on the same school bench," Justice Ginsburg continued, "seems to be worlds apart from saying we'll separate them."

Justice Stephen G. Breyer let his frustration show in several exchanges with Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, who argued the Bush administration's position as a "friend of the court" for the challengers and against the school systems in both cases.

"Think, go back to Cooper v. Aaron," Justice Breyer told the solicitor general, referring during the argument in the Louisville case to the court's 1958 decision enforcing a desegregation order in Little Rock, Ark. "Go back to the case where this court with paratroopers had to use tremendous means to get those children into the school. That's because the society was divided."

He continued: "Here we have a society, black and white, who elect school board members who together have voted to have this form of integration. Why, given that change in society, which is a good one, how can the Constitution be interpreted in a way that would require us, the judges, to go in and make them take the black children out of the school?"

"Well, I understand that, Justice Breyer," Mr. Clement said. "But I think the answer to that is that the lesson of history in this area is that racial classifications are not ones where we should just let local school board officials do what they think is right."

The Louisville plan, adopted in 2000 as the formerly segregated district emerged from 25 years of federal court supervision, provides that all schools should have a black student enrollment of no lower than 15 percent and no greater than 50 percent. The district as a whole, which includes suburban areas of Jefferson County as well as the city of Louisville, is about one-third black.

Mr. Clement said the 15-to-50-percent range was a "strict racial band" that was not sufficiently "narrowly tailored" to satisfy the "strict scrutiny" to which the court's precedents subject government actions that are based on race. The administration's position is that those choosing to adjust the racial balance in their schools should do so by "race-neutral means," like magnet schools that attract children across racial lines.

"There's a fundamental difference between whether or not the policy manages to avoid classifying people on the basis of their race," the solicitor general said.

Justice David H. Souter asked Mr. Clement why this position was not just another way of saying that "the important thing is simply to hide the ball." If improving the racial mix was the objective, Justice Souter asked, "why can't they do that candidly?"

There were "several responses," Mr. Clement answered. "One is that the Constitution puts a particular premium on avoiding express racial classifications."

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy asked the lawyers a series of questions designed to test the outer reaches of their positions. Could a school district deliberately place a new school in a location designed to supply a racially mixed student body, he asked, and appeared displeased when Harry J. F. Korrell, the lawyer representing the parents challenging the Seattle plan, answered no.

While his questions suggested that he would not rule out any and all policies undertaken with a knowledge of the probable racial consequences, Justice Kennedy made clear his distaste for the policies at issue in these cases, Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District, No. 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, No. 05-915.

To Mr. Madden, the Seattle district's lawyer, Justice Kennedy said that unlike magnet schools, special resources, or school location decisions, "you're characterizing each student by reason of the color of his or her skin."

He continued: "That is quite a different means. And it seems to me that that should only be, if ever allowed, allowed as a last resort." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Supreme Court Could Rule Against Use Of Race For Public School Diversity (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 5, 2006

The Supreme Court appeared headed on Monday toward a ruling that will sharply limit, if not eliminate, the use of race as a factor in assigning students to public schools to achieve diversity.

During two hours of oral argument, Justice Anthony Kennedy, whose vote may determine the outcome of the case, seemed deeply skeptical of the constitutionality of using race as a factor, especially in a school district that has already been declared "unitary" and ended efforts to desegregate.

"If we, for the first time, say that a system that has achieved unitary status ... can turn around and use individual skin color. ... We've never said that," Kennedy exclaimed at one point. "That takes us on a very perilous course."

A ruling against the use of race could have a broad impact in school districts nationwide that use a variety of race-conscious methods to cure racial imbalances caused by housing patterns. Civil rights leaders who were among the spectators packing the courtroom Monday were pessimistic afterward.

"If they are inclined to view these voluntary measures in the same light as segregation and any use of race is constitutionally suspect, then God help us," said Ted Shaw, director and counsel of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund. "I'm not going to predict defeat, but it's an uphill fight after what we heard today."

At issue in Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education were programs aimed at achieving racial diversity and balance throughout the public schools of Seattle and Louisville, Ky., respectively.

Parents whose children were not admitted to their school of choice because they would have upset the desired racial mix challenged the programs. But in both cases, appeals courts upheld the programs.

One measure of the tenor of the arguments Monday was the repeated effort by Justice Stephen Breyer to remind his colleagues about long-standing Court precedents, ranging from Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education to Cooper v. Aaron, which in his view support the use of race to achieve public school diversity.

Swann, the 1971 ruling that allowed the use of busing and racial balancing to eliminate lingering segregation, was repeatedly cited by Breyer. Once desegregation is achieved through these measures, Breyer said almost plaintively, "How could the Constitution ... tell the school board it cannot make that effort anymore, it can't do what it's been doing, and we'll send the children back to their black schools and their white schools?"

Teddy Gordon, representing the Louisville parents who challenged the school board's use of race, replied that race-based remedies are no longer appropriate once past desegregation programs have ended. "Once you've achieved the unitary status, you no longer get to carve out that exception to the Fourteenth Amendment," Gordon said.

Louisville School Board lawyer Francis Mellen Jr. responded by arguing that the program has effectively maintained the desegregation that was achieved after a court order started the process in the 1970s. "This case presents a story of a board of education that has replaced a desegregation decree with a student assignment plan that works."

Justices David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, and John Paul Stevens to a lesser extent, also seemed determined through their questioning to salvage the argument in favor of race-conscious school programs. Souter, for example, pointed out that the only harm Seattle or Louisville students suffer because of the race factor is that they might not get to go to their first-choice schools. But unlike university affirmative action programs that might result in qualified white students not gaining admission, the elementary and secondary schools will still educate all students in the district. "The principal benefit is the education, not the choice of schools," Souter said.

But Harry Korrell, who represented the Seattle parents who challenged that city's program, said the use of race as a factor "strikes at the heart of the equal protection clause, which commands that government treat people as individuals, not simply as members of a racial class."

The only sign from Kennedy that he might not rule out all uses of race came when he repeatedly asked whether a school board could choose the site of a new school with the goal of achieving racial balance in light of residential demographics. Korrell said if racial equality was the sole goal, it would be unconstitutional. But he allowed that if race was just one of several factors, it might be permissible if analyzed in the same way the Court has handled race-based redrawing of voting districts.

Solicitor General Paul Clement argued that "in the real world," race is rarely the only factor in such decisions, implying that they could be permitted if other factors predominate. Clement participated in both cases, arguing against the use of race. He said race-neutral means are still available to school boards to achieve a racial mix, adding that "the lesson of history" is to oppose racial classifications by local school boards.

Silent during the entire two hours was Justice Clarence Thomas, the Court's only African-American member. In past rulings and speeches, Thomas has made it clear he opposes affirmative action and thinks it stigmatizes blacks. He has also argued that black students don't necessarily get a better education just because white students are in their midst.

At one point late in the arguments, Thomas leaned forward as if to start asking a question or making a comment, but he apparently thought better of it and leaned back again, allowing the clock to run out on arguments in what could be the most important civil rights cases in years.

Court Hears Cases On Schools And Race (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102419

Supreme Court deliberations are private, but yesterday's oral arguments on whether it is constitutional to allow school systems to use race in making school assignments became as much a public debate between the divided justices as a questioning of lawyers.

And after two hours, it seemed to reflect a court majority highly skeptical of the proposition that the benefits of racially diverse public schools can justify any restriction on an individual's constitutional right to equal protection.

"You're characterizing each student by reason of the color of his or her skin," Justice Anthony Kennedy told a lawyer representing the Seattle school board. "And it seems to me that that should only be, if ever allowed, allowed as a last resort."

The ultimate decision is likely to be one of the most defining of the court headed by the new chief justice, John G. Roberts Jr., and a powerful statement about where the nation stands more than 50 years after Brown v. Board of Education demanded an end to segregated schools.

The court, encouraged by the Bush administration, has grown increasingly distrustful of racial classifications, and it reached out to take up the cases challenging schools in Seattle and Louisville even though appeals courts had upheld them as constitutional.

Because of the stakes, the day at the court took on a feeling of great import -- there were demonstrations on the plaza out front, some people camped overnight in freezing temperatures to secure a spot in the courtroom, and the lines for members of the bar began forming before dawn. More than 50 organizations weighed in with supporting briefs, mostly on the side of the school boards.

With the departure of Sandra Day O'Connor, Kennedy is seen as the justice mostly likely to depart from his normally conservative outlook. His active questioning of lawyers representing the school boards, who have been sued by white parents whose children were denied their first choice of schools, was the most closely watched.

He noted that even the Bush administration, which intervened on behalf of the white parents, said in its brief that "school districts have an unquestioned interest in reducing minority isolation," but it added that only if it were achieved by "race-neutral means."

"Isn't it odd jurisprudence where we have an objective that we state in one set of terms but a means for achieving it in another set of terms?" he asked Solicitor General Paul D. Clement.

But he also repeatedly questioned the constitutionality of allowing a school system, especially one that has remedied past discrimination, to make school assignment decisions based "solely on skin color." Kennedy seemed to disapprove of the school boards' argument that students weren't being harmed because they still were getting school placements.

"You know, it's like saying everybody can have a meal but only people with separate skin can get the dessert," he said.

In the cases at issue -- Parents Involved in Community Schools Inc. v. Seattle School District and Meredith v. Jefferson County (Ky.) Board of Education-- both systems offer parents and students a choice of schools, partly to achieve a level of integration that wouldn't otherwise be possible because of racially segregated housing patterns.

Both set goals for white and minority representation at schools and, along with other factors, made decisions about school assignments based on a student's race. The previous time Seattle used the system -- it has stopped because of the litigation -- about 100 minority students and 200 white students didn't get their first choice.

The Louisville-Jefferson County plan was implemented after the school system emerged from a 25-year desegregation plan overseen by the federal courts. The goal was to maintain the racial integration it had achieved.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg noted that the federal government was now challenging a system it had once championed.

"What's constitutionally required one day gets constitutionally prohibited the next day," she mused. "That's very odd."

Along with the other liberal justices -- John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Stephen G. Breyer -- she seemed to agree that a limited use of race to maintain a more integrated system should be sanctioned.

It set up an interesting debate among the justices in which the liberals argued for a deference to local officials who have found a system that for the most part their constituents like, and conservatives arguing for the strict color-blind protections of the 14th Amendment.

Roberts noted that in segregated school systems, students were also guaranteed a spot, but "because they were assigned to those seats on the basis of race, it violated equal protection."

Ginsburg responded that questioning whether using racial criterion to achieve integration "is the same as segregation, it seems to me is pretty far from the kind of headlines that attended the Brown decision."

Justices Reconsider Race-based School Admissions (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102420

The Supreme Court yesterday explored the question of how far districts can go in ensuring diverse public schools, hearing cases from parents in Louisville, Ky., and Seattle who argue it is wrong to use race as a factor in assigning students to schools.

At issue is whether students can be denied admission to their top choice of public school and assigned elsewhere in order to keep the schools racially mixed.

Attorneys for the school districts argued race is just one of several factors taken into account and usually isn't the main factor. But they said without the plans it would be very difficult to prevent more schools from being segregated by choice or by reflecting the racial makeup of the neighborhood.

"Ultimately, we'd have a resegregated school system," said Francis Mellen Jr., who represented the Louisville schools.

Louisville's schools followed a systemwide federally mandated desegregation plan for 25 years and the board ultimately decided to keep much of it in place. Mr. Mellen said it is a success story that has support from both black and white parents.

Lawyers challenging the programs, including a representative from the Justice Department, said a racially diverse school is a fine goal, but there are ways to achieve it without using what amounts to unfair racial quotas.

"This strikes at the heart of the Equal Protection Clause [of the 14th Amendment], which commands that government treat people as individuals, not simply as members of a racial class," said Harry Korrell, who represented a group of Seattle parents.

The court's more liberal justices seemed to have no problem with using race to keep schools mixed and said the plaintiffs' thinking simply doesn't compute. "It's very hard for me to see how you can have a racial objective, but a nonracial means to get there," said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Conservative justices -- including Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr., the court's two newest members, appointed by President Bush -- did not seem thrilled with the programs.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who could be the deciding vote, said the Seattle program, which applies to high school students, seems to be saying that "everybody can have a meal," but only some people get "dessert," since certain students are denied access to schools they want owing to their race.

Mr. Korrell said that happened to about 300 Seattle high school students, both black and white.

Michael F. Madden, representing the Seattle school district, argued that the students aren't being denied admission; rather, the seats are simply being distributed. But Justice Roberts said, "The decision to distribute, as you put it, was based on skin color and not any other factor."

Rulings in the cases are expected to be handed down by the end of June.

Repeated reference was made yesterday to a 2003 case in which the Supreme Court OK'd a law school affirmative-action program at the University of Michigan.

Mr. Madden said it is hard to compare the Seattle case, since it doesn't deny one student a better education than another student. "This is not like being denied access to a state's flagship university," he said.

Outside of the court, Theodore M. Shaw, director of the NAACP's Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said that if the court rules against these programs "it will be a reversal of historic proportions."

He said Justice Kennedy was especially "active" in the questioning and is usually difficult to convince on desegregation cases.

Court Appears Likely To Bar School 'Racial Balancing' (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court justices, hearing arguments on school integration, signaled today that they are likely to bar racial guidelines for assigning students to the public schools.

Such a ruling would deal a blow to civil rights lawyers and to school officials nationwide who had hoped to maintain a semblance of classroom integration in cities whose neighborhoods are divided along racial lines.

It would be a major victory for those who have called for "color blind" decision-making by public officials.

At issue today were the integration guidelines adopted by the schools boards in Seattle and Louisville, Ky. They were challenged by parents of the small number of students, most of them white, who were denied their first choice in schools because of race.

All the justices who spoke up during the argument agreed that racial integration is a laudable goal. However, a narrow majority of them, in comments and questions, said the Constitution forbade shifting children from one school to another based on their race.

DOJ_NMG_0102421

"Outright racial balancing is patently unconstitutional," said Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a centrist who often casts the deciding vote. "And that seems to be what you have here," he told the lawyer defending Seattle's program, whose guidelines gave "nonwhite" students first choice for enrolling in its most popular, predominantly white high schools.

Agreeing with Kennedy, Chief Justice John G. Roberts said, "The purpose of the equal protection clause is to ensure that people are treated as individuals rather than based on the color of their skin."

No students have been excluded from school because of their race, responded Michael Madden, the school board's lawyer. They may be assigned to a "different [but] basically a comparable school."

"Everyone got a seat in Brown as well," replied Roberts, referring to the landmark decision that struck down racial segregation. "But because they were assigned to those seats on the basis of race, it violated equal protection."

Madden disputed the comparison between forced segregation and voluntary integration. "Segregation is harmful" to students, while integration "has benefits," he said.

Achieving racial diversity "is certainly an admirable goal," said Justice Antonin Scalia. "Even if the objective is O.K., you cannot achieve it by any means whatsoever.... I thought one of the absolute restrictions [in the Constitution] is that you cannot judge and classify people on the basis of their race."

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. also skeptically questioned the school lawyers. Justice Clarence Thomas, though he said nothing today, has always insisted that public officials may not treat individuals differently because of their race.

Until today, civil rights lawyers held out hope that Kennedy — and perhaps Roberts — might vote to uphold the local school boards that pursued voluntary school integration. But both made clear that they believe explicitly that race-based plans cannot stand.

School Desegregation Faces Big Test (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In twin cases that could define the 21st-century meaning of Brown v. Board of Education, the Supreme Court weighed arguments for barring local school boards from voluntarily adopting race-conscious integration plans.

Both sides in the cases claim to be asking for a modern-day interpretation of the Brown decision, the landmark 1954 ruling that abolished official segregation in public education. The cases pit parents challenging race-conscious enrollment plans, who say Brown forbids any consideration of race, against an education establishment that argues that the legacy of American segregation requires continued efforts to foster integration.

At stake, education officials say, are hundreds of integration plans voluntarily adopted by school boards from Lynn, Mass., to St. Petersburg, Fla.

With four justices seen as likely to oppose such programs, and four others as likely to find them constitutional, the focus was on Justice Anthony Kennedy. In comments yesterday, Justice Kennedy suggested discomfort with race-conscious school assignments, regardless of their assertedly benign purposes.

Justice Kennedy appeared to accept the idea that government sometimes can factor race in its decisions, such as considering the racial composition of various neighborhoods when considering sites for new schools, so they would draw a diverse enrollment. But programs that classify specific individuals by race are "perilous," he said.

One case that came before the court yesterday involved Seattle, a city that never suffered official segregation and whose enrollment policy allows students to select any of 10 high schools. When a particular school has more applicants than seats, officials use several tiebreaking factors -- including race -- to attain an enrollment that roughly mirrors the citywide student population. Whites account for 40% of the population, with blacks, Asian-Americans, Hispanics and Native Americans making up the remaining 60%.

The second case came from Louisville, Ky., which once ran a dual school system that reserved some campuses for whites, others for blacks. A 1975 federal court order imposed mandatory busing to desegregate the schools. A judge dissolved the order in 2000, finding the schools had been successfully desegregated.

Local authorities, seeking to maintain integrated campuses, decided to continue the desegregation policy, which aims to keep black enrollment at each school between 15% and 50%. As a whole, the system's enrollment is 34% black.

A parent group in Seattle and a white parent in Louisville sued in the two respective cases, contending that racial classifications violated the 14th Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. Federal appeals courts disagreed, and the parents, backed by the Bush administration, petitioned the Supreme Court.

A half-century ago, the Brown decision set in motion an aggressive, court-driven effort to root out segregation in public schools. In that case, a unanimous Supreme Court stunned the nation by declaring "separate educational facilities...inherently unequal," and thus unconstitutional. A generation of court-ordered busing to desegregate black and white student enrollment followed, a contentious policy that drove some white families to suburbs from cities in an effort to avoid participation.

But with official segregation a fading memory, the justices have confronted the more difficult question of when government can consider race for purportedly beneficial purposes and not to cure state-mandated discrimination. The court's precedents call for strict scrutiny of race-conscious polices to ensure that they are "narrowly tailored" to achieve a "compelling governmental purpose."

The court has struck down government contracting programs that gave an advantage to minority-owned businesses. But in 2003 it upheld race-conscious criteria at the University of Michigan law school, because "attaining a diverse student body" was a compelling interest.

The dynamics were different yesterday. Not only were the institutions elementary and secondary schools rather than universities, but the author of the 5-to-4 Michigan decision, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, has been replaced with Samuel Alito. Like Chief Justice John Roberts, Justice Alito worked as a lawyer in the Reagan administration, which strongly opposed most programs that took account of race. At yesterday's arguments, the two new justices seemed to hew to those views, as did Justice Antonin Scalia. Justice Clarence Thomas, who by custom never speaks at arguments, consistently has opposed race-conscious programs.

The court's four more liberal members suggested that U.S. society still bears the legacy of the nation's history of racial discrimination and that school officials should be free to craft enrollment policies to promote diversity. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg observed that in 1975, Louisville officials had been forced to accept a desegregation plan, but after the court order was lifted, decided "it's worked rather well, so we'll keep it." How can "what's constitutionally required one day" be "constitutionally prohibited the next day?" she said. "That's very odd."

But the Louisville schools' attorney, Francis Mellen, said prior official segregation was irrelevant to his argument. "We stand on the same footing as the Seattle district, as a unitary district," he said in reply to a question from Chief Justice Roberts.

A decision is expected by the end of the court's term, in June.

Separately, the justices declined to hear a petition from R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. to toss out a lawsuit from a longtime smoker.

Outside, A 'Fight For Equality' (WP)

By Keith L. Alexander

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Chanting slogans and waving signs, thousands of demonstrators -- mostly high school and college students and teachers -- gathered yesterday on the steps of the Supreme Court to support the use of race in programs to maintain school integration.

Demonstrators from as far as California, along with students from Washington area high schools and universities, braved the breezy, 40-degree weather and gathered on the court steps as early as Sunday night to protest a case that the demonstrators said could reinstitute school segregation. Then, holding signs saying "Fight for Equality" and chanting "by any means necessary," they marched down Independence Avenue for a rally at the Lincoln Memorial.

Inside the court, the justices considered arguments in the case, which challenges school diversity programs that take into account the race of students. The demonstrators agreed with attorneys for schools in Seattle and Louisville, who argued that race remains a necessary tool.

On the steps of the memorial, student leaders defended affirmative action policies in public schools and demanded school improvements. Three busloads of students from the District's Ballou Senior High School called for better facilities.

"We want better computers," said Brenda Bell, 15, a Ballou sophomore. "No dripping ceiling. We have broken water fountains. We have mice. Our schools should be as nice as schools everywhere else in this city."

Charles J. Ogletree Jr., a Harvard Law School professor and one of the organizers of the march, said the biggest difference between yesterday's demonstration and previous marches was the role of teenagers and young adults.

"Young people were leading this effort to preserve opportunities for the children of tomorrow," Ogletree said. "This wasn't the usual suspects. It was the youth who saw this as such an important effort that they had to mount this movement. And they did so in a very impressive way."

DOJ_NMG_0102423

Organizers estimated that as many as 5,000 demonstrators gathered outside the Supreme Court, but the number declined as the day wore on. By the time the march reached the steps of the Lincoln Memorial at noon, about 1,000 remained.

Students wearing paraphernalia from Howard University, Hampton University, the University of Michigan, Morehouse College, Clark Atlanta University and other colleges raised their fists and chanted, "Give kids good schools."

About 30 students from Hampton University left their campus in Hampton, Va., at 5:30 a.m. on a chartered bus to arrive in time for the demonstration. "We wanted to support the cause and make sure our voice was heard," said Hampton student Dominique Green, 18.

Dozens of people camped out on the steps of the Supreme Court to be among the 50 or so members of the general public to receive tickets to hear the arguments in the courtroom. Anurima Bhargava, 30, an NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund lawyer, said she and her mother, Ranjana, 60, arrived at 9:45 p.m. Sunday and waited through the night, wrapped in sleeping blankets, to get tickets for the arguments for her father, Vijay.

At one point, the steps between the Lincoln Memorial and the Reflecting Pool were transformed into a church scene. Speaker Rodney Jeremiah Reynolds, a freshman at Yale University, said he hoped that one day the nation would not need affirmative action, "but that day has not come yet."

Supreme Court Justices Face New Arguments On Desegregation, Racial Preferences (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 5, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Demonstrators in favor of racial preferences and bearing "Fight For Equality" placards descended on the Supreme Court Monday as justices prepared to hear fresh arguments in cases testing when race may be used as a basis for assigning students to public schools.

The cases could produce the most important decisions on school integration in the U.S. in decades.

Parents in two cities are challenging school assignment plans that factor in a student's race in an effort to have individual school populations approximate the racial makeup of the entire system. Federal appeals courts have upheld both programs.

On the sidewalk in front of the Supreme Court, hundreds of demonstrators marched to dramatize their issue. A parent-teachers group from Chicago and several civil rights groups were among those sponsoring the demonstration.

Demonstrators chanted "Equal education, not segregation" and "We won't go to the back of the bus, integration is a must." Some held signs that read "Stop racism now."

"It's ridiculous to separate us. We worked hard to get everyone together. Why separate us now?" said Jade Johnson, 15, a Washington high school student. Johnson said she came to the demonstration instead of going to school because the issue is important and affects the whole country.

The school policies in contention are designed to keep schools from segregating along the same lines as neighborhoods. In the Pacific coast city of Seattle, only high school students are affected. The plan in another city, Louisville, Kentucky, applies systemwide.

"The plan has prevented the resegregation that inevitably would result from the community's segregated housing patterns and that most likely would produce many schools that might be perceived as 'failing,'" the Seattle school district said in its brief to the high court.

The Bush administration has taken the side of the parents who are suing the school districts, much as it intervened on behalf of college and graduate students who challenged racial preferences policies known as affirmative action before the Supreme Court in 2003.

In 2003, the court upheld race-conscious admissions in higher education in a 5-4 opinion by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

O'Connor, however, has since retired and been replaced by conservative Justice Samuel Alito. Lawyers on both sides of the issue presume that Alito is inclined to oppose the school plans.

About 400 of the 15,000 U.S. school districts are under court orders to desegregate. It is believed that hundreds more voluntarily take race into account.

There are no firm figures, although the Pacific Legal Foundation said up to 1,000 districts voluntarily use race as a factor in school assignments, drawing boundaries, deciding where to locate new buildings and in other ways. The foundation opposes race-based policies.

Stop Discriminating By Race (USAT)

By Douglas Kmiec

USA Today, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102424

In a phrase often cited to show the Supreme Court's disdain for racial preference, Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote in a 1995 ruling (quoting Justice Sandra Day O'Connor): "At the heart of the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that government must treat citizens as individuals, not as components of a racial … class."

The Seattle and Louisville school districts have not honored this basic precept of equality. Excluding students from a desired public school on the basis of race is as wrong today as it was in 1954 when the court decided Brown v. Board of Education. Treating students as "white" or "non-white" statistics should be unanimously rejected.

The supporters of racial balancing are not the descendants of Brown, which desegregated public schools, but of Plessy v. Ferguson, which upheld the pernicious "separate but equal" doctrine in the late 19th century. Just as the Plessy majority obtusely asserted that if separation meant inferiority it was only because the minority chose "to put that construction upon it," so too the advocates of today's rigid ratios of white and non-white students can see no harm. The harm, however, is palpable. And it is to all races, since it indulges the ugly stereotype that skin color determines thought and action.

Race may be an aspect of our personal lives for good (racial pride) or ill, and diversity in viewpoint is attractive in educational settings. That is why the Supreme Court allowed public universities in Grutter v. Bollinger (2003) to consider race along with other factors in admissions decisions. But the court was adamant: Racial balancing is always unconstitutional. The school districts violated that principle, and worse. Seattle's differentiation of white from non-white, for example, lumps together those of African, Asian, Latino or Native American heritage. When a student declines to disclose racial ancestry, the schools use "visual inspection." Admission by skin pigment is not academic diversity.

It is speculated that the usually collegial, and often unanimous, court led by Chief Justice John Roberts might divide sharply on this one. It shouldn't. The moral authority asserted by Earl Warren to banish race stands foursquare behind his young, articulate successor. The way to end racial discrimination is to stop discriminating by race — not to invite and embed the practice in the decision-making of thousands of schools.

52 Years Later, Integration Faces New Supreme Court Test (USAT)

USA Today, December 5, 2006

Since the historic 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education began dismantling separate schooling for black and white children, the Supreme Court has spent a half-century painstakingly working out a fair way of making America's classrooms more racially diverse.

The results can be seen nearly everywhere you look. African-Americans head major companies. The two most recent secretaries of State are black. A vibrant, educated black middle class has sprung up, and colleges actively seek black students to enrich their campuses, expanding that middle class further.

So it was ominous Monday to hear Supreme Court justices sounding hostile to voluntary — and popular — desegregation plans in Seattle and Louisville. If the justices rule them unconstitutional, the tenuous advance of equal opportunity could be undermined or even reversed.

As with anything involving race, the system of desegregation and affirmative action that has evolved under the court's watchful eye is controversial. Whites sometimes feel slighted, and it is whites who brought the Seattle and Louisville cases to court.

Both cities assigned students to schools in part to ensure that the schools are racially diverse, and parents whose children were temporarily denied admission to the schools they preferred sued, claiming racial bias.

Lower courts ruled against them, and just a year ago, the issue seemed settled. The court refused to hear a challenge to a desegregation plan in Lynn, Mass., that is similar to the Louisville plan.

But then Justice Sandra Day O'Connor retired and was replaced by Justice Samuel Alito, who civil rights advocates fear is the crucial fifth vote to undo the two plans — and others in hundreds of school districts that follow similar guidelines to achieve diversity.

In 2003, O'Connor was the fifth vote in a pivotal 5-4 decision that said the University of Michigan Law School could consider race as a factor in admissions, as long as there was no explicit quota for admitting black applicants. The court noted that diversity promotes "cross-racial understanding and the breaking down of racial stereotypes" and gives students invaluable skills that "can only be developed through exposure to widely diverse people, cultures, ideas, and viewpoints."

That is the reason Louisville and Seattle tried to diversify their schools. Another reason was that students in overwhelming black or Hispanic schools consistently underperform.

The plans of both cities are complex, trying to balance family preferences against diversity and other non-racial considerations, but they are widely accepted in those communities, and they work.

DOJ_NMG_0102425

But they appear far less popular at the court. Court watchers came away thinking the school diversity plans will be in trouble when the court rules early next year. Justice Anthony Kennedy, the likely swing vote now, said at one point that Seattle's plan seems to hinge in some cases "solely on skin color … it's like saying everybody can have a meal, but only (certain people) can get the dessert."

More telling was the answer to a question Kennedy asked about what has happened to Seattle schools since the school board suspended the plan after an adverse court ruling in 2001. Kennedy wondered whether the schools had integrated on their own.

The facts should sober him. In 2000, white enrollment at predominantly non-white Franklin High School was 25%; by 2005 it was down to 10%. Without the plan, Seattle's schools have gone backwards. The high court shouldn't lead a charge to ensure similar results around the nation.

Truck Driver Convicted For Deaths In Smuggling Case (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO, The Associated Press

AP, December 5, 2006

HOUSTON (AP) — Now that a jury has convicted a truck driver for his role in the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt, his defense attorneys said they are focused on one thing: sparing him a death sentence.

The federal jury convicted Tyrone Williams on Monday of all 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting he faced for ferrying illegal immigrants during a May 2003 smuggling attempt from South Texas to Houston.

His airtight tractor-trailer was packed with more than 70 immigrants who punched out taillights and screamed for help when the heat inside the tomblike trailer became deadly. Nineteen of the immigrants died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation.

On the 20 death penalty eligible counts Williams faced in his retrial, the new jury found that his actions resulted in the death of a person, sending the trial to a punishment phase. That phase is set to begin Wednesday and last about a week.

Jurors will decide whether Williams should be sentenced to death or up to life in prison.

Craig Washington, Williams' defense attorney, said he plans on presenting testimony from about 20 witnesses. He wouldn't comment on who would testify on Williams' behalf or speculate on what will be key to his case.

"The jury has to decide whether to take another human being's life. So everything is on the table when they do that. And everything about a human being that the jury wants to know to decide whether the person lives or dies is important," said a visibly shaken Washington.

Prosecutors say Williams merits a death sentence because he was responsible for the deaths by not freeing the immigrants or turning on the trailer's air conditioning, which could have saved their lives. Some survivors testified they thought the air conditioning had been turned on.

Prosecutors declined comment on the verdict, but during a court hearing after the jury's decision was read, said they would be presenting 25 to 26 witnesses during the punishment phase and concentrating on how the crime was committed.

Williams had no visible reaction when the verdict was read, but hugged Washington, a former Houston congressman, before being led away by U.S. marshals.

Washington said his client transported the illegal immigrants but wasn't responsible for their deaths because he didn't know they were dying until it was too late. Washington blamed another smuggling ring member for causing the deaths by overstuffing the trailer.

Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop near Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston.

Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen who lived in Schenectady, N.Y., is the only one of 14 people charged in the case who is facing the death penalty.

This was the second time Williams was tried for the smuggling deaths.

Last year, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury couldn't agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the decision, saying the verdict didn't count because the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

The new jury deliberated for more than four days, beginning Nov. 27 and taking a three-day weekend. They returned the verdict after deliberating for about two more hours Monday.

Douglas McNabb, a Houston attorney who specializes in federal criminal defense, said Williams' team of defense lawyers has an "uphill climb" during the punishment phase.

"Primarily the government is going to argue that not only what he did was intentional, but that it was such a heinous offense that the defendant has no redemptive value at all and should be executed," he said.

Trucker Guilty In Migrant Deaths (LAT)

By Lianne Hart, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

The Texas driver could get the death penalty. A trek in his hot trailer was fatal to 19 people.

HOUSTON — A Texas jury Monday convicted a truck driver on all 58 counts against him for his role in the deaths of 19 people during a bungled human smuggling attempt.

Tyrone Williams, 35, faces a possible death sentence or life in prison. The punishment phase of the trial will start Wednesday and is expected to last about a week.

Williams stared ahead and showed no emotion when the verdict was read, but later hugged his lawyer, Craig Washington, before being led away by U.S. marshals.

"I'm deeply disappointed," Washington said outside the courtroom.

Prosecutors declined to comment on the verdict, but told U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal that they expect to call about 25 witnesses during the sentencing trial.

In May 2003, Williams hauled more than 70 illegal immigrants in a sweltering trailer from south Texas to a truck stop near Houston. As temperatures inside the trailer rose, the increasingly desperate riders peeled off their clothes, punched out tail lights for air and shouted for help.

By the time Williams opened the door about 3 1/2 hours later, 17 people had died of dehydration, overheating or suffocation. Two others died later.

Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop and fled to Houston, 100 miles away. He was arrested after walking into a hospital complaining of anxiety.

During the trial, the jury of seven women and five men watched as grieving family members from Mexico, Honduras, El Salvador and the Dominican Republic identified their relatives from grisly photos. One showed a 5-year-old boy who had died in his father's arms.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Rodriguez told jurors that Williams was a "vile and heartless truck driver" who ignored the suffering of the riders.

Williams' lawyers said he didn't know how many people were packed into his trailer, and didn't understand the immigrants' cries for help, which were in Spanish.

Williams' first trial ended in a hung jury in March 2005.

Of the 14 people charged in the case, Williams is the only defendant to face death. His lawyers have said that Williams, who is black, was singled out because of his race.

Trucker Convicted In Deaths Of 19 Illegal Immigrants (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

HOUSTON, Dec. 4 — A truck driver was found guilty of all charges Monday and faces possible execution in the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants who suffocated in his airless trailer in South Texas in 2003.

In a retrial of the nation's deadliest human trafficking case, the federal jury that convicted the driver, Tyrone M. Williams, 35, of Schenectady, N.Y., begins hearing testimony Wednesday on whether to give Mr. Williams the first death sentence under a 12-year-old "alien smuggling" statute or a lesser term of up to life in prison.

The milk trailer, piled with bodies and 55 survivors, was found abandoned at a truck stop near Victoria, Tex., in the early hours of May 14, 2003.

Mr. Williams, a legal immigrant from Jamaica, sat impassively through 58 recitations of "guilty" as the verdict form was read, then embraced his lawyer, Craig A. Washington. Asked afterward how his client had taken the news, Mr. Washington, a former Texas congressman, said, "Better than me."

Mr. Washington, whose trial defense conceded Mr. Williams's role as a smuggler but challenged his awareness of the victims' suffering, said he planned to put on about 20 witnesses to testify about mitigating factors in Mr. Williams's history.

The lead prosecutor, Daniel C. Rodriguez, an assistant United States attorney who had painted Mr. Williams as "vile and heartless," declined to comment until the punishment phase was concluded.

Mr. Williams's first trial ended in March 2005 with an incomplete verdict later thrown out by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. Jurors had found Mr. Williams guilty on 38 of the 58 counts but deadlocked on the others, including conspiracy resulting in death, a charge carrying possible capital punishment. Jurors also could not agree on how to answer questions assessing Mr. Williams's degree of culpability.

Monday's verdict, on the fifth day of deliberations, found him guilty of all 58 counts: conspiracy plus counts of harboring, transporting and transporting resulting in death for each of the 19 victims. The jurors also found him culpable as a principal offender, out for "private financial gain."

Evidence in the trials portrayed Mr. Williams as a milk trucker and sometime drug courier who had been recruited by a smuggling ring to transport 60 illegal immigrants on a similar run from the border about a week earlier and who then took $7,500 to carry a group from Harlingen, Tex., past a Border Patrol checkpoint in Sarita to a waiting van and pickup truck.

But the relief vehicles became stuck at the checkpoint, and Mr. Williams, with the truck's refrigeration turned off, was directed by the smugglers to continue toward Houston.

A companion in the cab, Fatima Holloway, who was traveling along for a drug deal, testified for the government that Mr. Williams ignored the banging of his passengers as they succumbed to airlessness, dehydration and temperatures as high as 173 degrees, finally clawing out a taillight in a desperate bid to breathe.

The first to die, a survivor testified in English, was a 5-year-old Mexican boy who expired in his father's arms, crying, "Daddy, Daddy, I'm dying." Sixteen more people suffocated before Mr. Williams finally halted the truck in Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston, and two more died later in the hospital.

How many were crammed into the 18-wheeler remains unclear. The dead and survivors total 74, but some riders may have escaped when Mr. Williams unlocked the doors.

The jurors asked to review a particularly graphic piece of evidence: a videotape from the Victoria truck stop in which Mr. Williams and Ms. Holloway seem composed while buying 55 bottles of water — just as one of the survivors staggers in pleading for help.

Mr. Williams and Ms. Holloway fled in the cab, and Mr. Williams was arrested later in a Houston medical center where he had sought treatment for stress.

Of 14 defendants charged in the case, Mr. Williams is the 11th to be convicted and the only one to face the death penalty. Seven, including ringleaders of the scheme, have been sentenced to long prison terms, and three are awaiting sentencing. Two had their charges dismissed, and one man is a fugitive.

In the first trial, Mr. Washington raised a defense of racial discrimination, arguing that Mr. Williams, who is black, had been singled out for execution because of his race. Judge Vanessa D. Gilmore pressed prosecutors to explain their reasoning and, when they refused, said she intended to inform the jury.

The Fifth Circuit, in throwing out the partial verdict, ruled racial questions out of the case and, citing Judge Gilmore's heavy schedule, reassigned the case to Judge Lee H. Rosenthal.

In what some legal experts saw as a defense misstep this time, Mr. Williams, apparently against Mr. Washington's advice, declined to concede the identities of the victims, requiring the government to call relatives whose grief-stricken testimony clearly anguished the jury.

First Trial's Juror Says Williams Not Alone (HC)

By Harvey Rice, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 5, 2006

Holdout felt others shared the blame for deaths

One of the jurors in Tyrone Williams' first trial, which ended with a hung jury in March 2005, said he held out to spare the truck driver from a death sentence because he believed others shared responsibility for the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants.

"I couldn't see them giving the death sentence to one person," said Horace Rains, 79, a merchant seaman who lives in east Harris County.

Williams was one of 14 people charged in the failed smuggling attempt that left 19 illegal immigrants dead in the back of a tractor trailer near Victoria in 2003. He is the only one to face a possible death sentence.

Rains says he and a woman , whose name he could not recall, kept the 2005 jury from reaching a unanimous verdict. His revelation was made possible by U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal's decision to lift a gag order issued by the judge who presided over Williams' first trial.

U.S. District Judge Vanessa Gilmore gave an oral order to jurors at the end of the first trial not to speak with the news media or attorneys after they were discharged.

Story held until verdictGilmore lifted a written gag order in May this year after the case was transferred to Rosenthal, but not the oral order to jurors. The Houston Chronicle asked Rosenthal to lift the oral order and provide a list of jurors because reporters were prevented from interviewing them after the trial.

Rosenthal refused to make the jury list available because of a standing policy by Houston federal courts forbidding the release of juror information. She lifted the gag order, however, and said jurors were free to contact the Chronicle.

Rains contacted the Chronicle after a new jury had heard eight days of testimony in Williams' retrial. The Chronicle delayed publishing the story until the new jury reached a verdict.

The jury found Williams guilty of 58 smuggling counts Monday. The penalty phase of the trial begins Wednesday.

Rains was juror No. 3 in the first trial. That panel failed to reach a verdict on a smuggling conspiracy count, which carried the death penalty, and 19 counts of harboring illegal immigrants.

The jury did find Williams guilty of 38 smuggling transportation counts, 19 carrying a possible death sentence, but failed to answer special questions for each count, including whether Williams had a primary responsibility for the deaths or was an aider and abettor.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that failing to answer those questions amounted to a failure to reach a verdict.

No intentionRains said he and a woman juror refused to answer the special questions because they believed it would have been tantamount to a death sentence.

"That part would have made them give him the death sentence," Rains said. "A lot of them wanted him to get the death sentence."

If the holdouts had voted with the majority, the trial would have gone to a penalty phase in which prosecutors would have to prove Williams deserved the death penalty.

Rains said he supports the death penalty but not for Williams.

"I don't believe he had any intention of letting those people die," he said. "He didn't shut the door. He didn't know how many people were in there."

Rains said Abelardo Flores, the smuggler who recruited Williams and provided key prosecution testimony, was just as guilty.

Flores pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against Williams in return for the prosecution's support of a reduced sentence. He is awaiting sentencing.

Prosecutors Interview Two Shot By Police In Queens (NYT)

By Al Baker And William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Prosecutors from the Queens district attorney's office conducted bedside hospital interviews yesterday with the two men wounded in a hail of 50 police bullets that claimed the life of Sean Bell, the first time investigators have heard from any direct participants in the Nov. 25 shooting, a lawyer for the two men said.

In separate interviews, the two men, Trent Benefield, 23, and Joseph Guzman, 31, told prosecutors what their lawyers have been saying publicly for days about the shooting, according to the lawyer, Sanford A. Rubenstein.

The two said that only they and Mr. Bell, who was 23, were in or near the car when the shooting erupted — contradicting accounts from some officers involved that a fourth man was with the group and may have been armed.

Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman also said that the five police officers who opened fire on them did not identify themselves and that they had no idea that they were facing the police, Mr. Rubenstein said. He was one of three lawyers present as a team of assistant district attorneys and members of the district attorney's staff questioned the men in their rooms at Mary Immaculate Hospital.

Richard A. Brown, the Queens district attorney, is gathering facts about the case, which he has said will go before a grand jury.

For days, the Police Department has been seeking a fourth man who officers and a civilian witness quoted by the police say was wearing a beige jacket and who law enforcement officials believe may have been with Mr. Bell, Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman.

One of the detectives who fired, according to a person briefed on his version of events, said the fourth man was in Mr. Bell's car. The civilian witness, who looked down from an apartment window after she heard gunshots, described seeing a man in a beige jacket fleeing the scene, the police said.

Mr. Rubenstein and others, including Charlie King, a lawyer who is representing several men who were in Mr. Bell's bachelor party that morning and who witnessed the shooting, have insisted that the police are wrong. "There was no fourth man in the car or next to the car," Mr. Rubenstein said.

Mr. Rubenstein said Mr. Guzman and Mr. Benefield told prosecutors that the undercover officer who fired the first shots, a 28-year-old six-year veteran of the department, "did not identify himself either through a shield or a verbal command. Period."

DOJ_NMG_0102429

As with the back-and-forth over the "fourth man," Mr. Rubenstein's statements served to create a clear line separating the versions of events being given by those close to the wounded men and those close to the police officers. A person briefed on the account of that undercover detective has said that that detective got in front of Mr. Bell's car, pulled out his gun and, with his police badge around his neck, identified himself as an officer.

That detective and the other officers fired after Mr. Bell drove into the detective and an unmarked police van, the police said. The officers suspected that one of the men had a gun, but no gun was later found, the police have said.

Mr. Rubenstein declined to offer further specifics about the officials' questions or his clients' answers. But he said the exchange marked the beginning of his clients' cooperation with prosecutors.

"What's next is for the district attorney to continue his initial investigation, which they are in the process of conducting," Mr. Rubenstein said. "Any witnesses who saw what happened should come forward, either directly to the district attorney's office or contact me, and we will see to it that they get the opportunity to come forward to the district attorney's office."

Kevin Ryan, a spokesman for the district attorney's office, would not discuss details of the interviews.

A law enforcement official involved in the investigation said that as the medical conditions of the two men improve, and the inquiry moves forward, officials expect to speak to them again. "As long as they were medically ready to talk, we want to talk to them," the official said. "Even though we're not setting a deadline, we're going to move expeditiously."

The five police officers who fired the shots have not yet spoken to the police or prosecutors.

"The Internal Affairs Division has conducted inquires and provided all information to the Queens district attorney," Paul J. Browne, the Police Department's chief spokesman, said yesterday when asked about the statements Mr. Benefield and Mr. Guzman made to prosecutors.

As the investigation moves forward, prosecutors are seeking to gather as much independent evidence as they can — from witness accounts, forensics and ballistics to information about the events leading up to the shootings, including surveillance video from inside and outside the club, phone records and radio transmissions from the officers and other material, the official involved in the investigation has said.

Among other steps prosecutors will take to get ready for their grand jury presentation, they will prepare a detailed timeline, starting at the point where the officers began their tour of duty on the night of Nov. 24 but focusing mainly on the minutes leading up to the shooting and on the shooting itself, according to the official. Some points along the timeline will be firmer than others, set by benchmarks like radio transmissions, cellphone records and other more determinate factors, the official said.

Prosecutors will also put together detailed profiles of each of the officers, the official said.

Michael J. Palladino, president of the Detectives Endowment Association, said he and the president of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, Patrick J. Lynch, met yesterday with Mr. Brown and Jack Ryan, Mr. Brown's chief assistant, for about 30 minutes.

Mr. Palladino said that he wanted to know when the case would be presented to a grand jury and "wanted to come away with a comfort level" that the four detectives and one police officer involved in the shooting "would have a level playing field" in Mr. Brown's investigation.

"Because I think they're entitled to a fair and impartial investigation, and most importantly, they are entitled to due process," Mr. Palladino said.

He said he came away from the meeting with a sense that the five would be treated fairly.

Appearing last night on "Larry King Live," Mr. Bell's fiancée, Nicole Paultre, said that she had spoken to Mr. Guzman and Mr. Benefield in the hospital and that they had believed they were about to be carjacked that morning on the street. "They were afraid," she said.

Ms. Paultre was wearing the wedding ring that Mr. Bell never got to place on her hand. She said that he had been buried with his ring.

"I'm actually, to be honest, not angry," she said. "I'm more just trying to be strong. I just want justice. Me and my family just want justice."

Meanwhile, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, in Florida yesterday, said that while people "have a right to express themselves" about the shooting, he found "disgusting and disgraceful" some demonstrators' signs, which read "Death to Pigs." <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Lauderdale Mayor, Union Call Critics 'Reckless' For Condemning Police Shooting (FLSUNSEN)

By Akilah Johnson, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, December 5, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE -- Standing on the steps of City Hall on Monday, the mayor and police union called the actions of some elected officials and the NAACP "irresponsible" and "reckless" after the fourth fatal shooting by Fort Lauderdale police this year.

The community has rushed to condemn officers Robert Norvis and Todd Hill before the investigation into the Nov. 28 shooting is finished, said Jack Lokeinsky, president of the Fort Lauderdale Fraternal Order of Police.

Norvis, 35, and Hill, 33, tried to stop a stolen Mitsubishi SUV. They opened fire, police said, after the driver put the SUV in reverse and accelerated toward the officers. Driver Troy Eddines was killed and passenger Travis Jackson was wounded.

"Judge incidents after all the facts are ascertained, and not before," Lokeinsky said Monday with a diverse crowd of more than 75 officers standing behind him. "That did not happen in this case. Elected officials have an obligation to attempt to defuse, not incite the community."

That statement came after a chaotic community meeting Thursday at the Mizell Center, where hundreds of residents demanded answers.

On Monday, Mayor Jim Naugle stood among the sea of police blue.

"The posturing of some in the community trying to stir things up, to me, is really wrong," Naugle said of Commissioner Carlton Moore and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "People were acting like something was wrong in this incident, and that is reckless and irresponsible."

Moore, two state legislators and the NAACP called for state and federal investigations into the shooting. The FBI has begun a civil rights investigation.

The NAACP plans to ask federal officials to broaden their investigation and look at all recent Fort Lauderdale police shootings, as well as the department's policies and practices, particularly those concerning use of force.

"When it comes to investigating our own, this department is an open book," Lokeinsky said, adding that Fort Lauderdale has a Citizens Police Review Board.

A grand jury will decide if the shooting was justified, Naugle said. "And the grand jury is the people ... us."

Moore and Marsha Ellison, president of the Fort Lauderdale branch of the NAACP, said Monday that they are not provoking the public but expressing concerns that exist among northwest Fort Lauderdale residents.

Moore said the police department is a public entity, and the public, therefore, has every right to scrutinize it.

"Are they saying they can't be questioned?" he asked.

One criticism has been that the department seems more concerned with highlighting Eddines' and Jackson's lengthy criminal records instead of figuring out what happened.

Police now are trying to do the same to him, Moore said. A Broward Sheriff's deputy stopped Moore on Sunday when a check of his license plate indicated it was registered to the wrong car, said sheriff's spokesman Elliot Cohen. The stop occurred about 7:50 a.m. in the 600 block of Northwest 27th Avenue.

Turns out, it was the correct license plate, but Moore's driver's license was suspended, Cohen said. Moore was ticketed for driving with a suspended license with knowledge. His license was suspended more than a year ago for failure to pay traffic fines, officials said.

"All of a sudden Carlton is the issue," Moore said Monday. "Anything but the police."

Panel Discusses Atlanta Police Shooting (NSDY/AP)

By Errin Haines, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 5, 2006

ATLANTA -- Civil rights leaders, clergy and city officials met Monday with residents of a northwest Atlanta neighborhood to discuss how to ease tensions between them and police after officers serving a warrant killed an elderly woman at her home.

Many in the audience had questions for Atlanta Police Chief Richard Pennington, who said he was committed to a thorough investigation into the Nov. 21 fatal shooting of Kathryn Johnston.

"I assure you that we are going to do everything we can to make sure we get to the bottom of this tragedy," Pennington said. "We need to do a lot of healing."

Pennington said he was not able to comment on specifics of the case, which has been turned over to the FBI and Georgia Bureau of Investigation.

Diana Myers, 46, who has lived in the neighborhood for 17 years, called the meeting a farce.

"They didn't answer none of our questions," Myers said. "They didn't say nothing. But our community, we're not letting this go. We have to change our community."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which hosted the meeting, has called for the establishment of a civilian review board with the power to subpoena witnesses and a return to community policing.

Johnston -- who family members said was 92, but was 88 according to the county medical examiner -- was home alone when plainclothes officers burst in, searching for drugs. Police said she opened fire with a revolver, wounding three officers before she was shot.

The officers said they obtained the "no-knock" warrant earlier that day after they said an informant bought drugs at the house from a man who has not been arrested.

The informant later denied buying drugs at Johnston's home and said he was told by police to lie about the incident, according to Pennington. The chief said the informant, who's in protective custody, is a key part of the FBI-led investigation.

Black Lawmakers Set To Take Crucial Posts Face Pressure (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — The impending Democratic takeover of Congress will elevate more blacks to positions of power in the Capitol than ever: 4 major House committee chairmen, as many as 16 subcommittee chairmen, the third-ranking House Democratic leader and a senator considered a credible candidate for his party's presidential nomination.

It is so much power that Representative Charles B. Rangel, the New York Democrat set to be chairman of the pivotal Ways and Means Committee, said he hesitated to speak about it publicly. "I don't want to scare the hell out of people," Mr. Rangel said, "that blacks are now in charge of the committees and so, therefore, watch out."

While celebrating their rise to prominence, black lawmakers face conflicting pressures from their traditional supporters on one side and the Democratic leaders on the other. Many African-American lawmakers represent poor, predominantly black districts created to ensure black representation under voting rights laws. Their safely Democratic seats have helped them rise in seniority ahead of colleagues from more politically heterogeneous districts. Many lean well to the left of the Democratic caucus as a whole.

Traditional party allies like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and some members of the Congressional Black Caucus say they expect their newly powerful champions like Mr. Rangel, 76, to push a long-stalled agenda that includes hearings or a commission on reparations for slavery, guaranteeing voting rights for convicted felons, prohibiting racial profiling by police or customs officers, restricting gun sales, and sharply increasing the compensation paid to people displaced by Hurricane Katrina.

But like other leaders of the larger Democratic caucus, the black lawmakers are being cautioned to be mindful of a broader audience that includes voters in Republican-leaning swing districts, where those initiatives can be politically perilous. And black lawmakers say they feel pressure to appeal to a broader audience because their names and faces often appear as emblems of their party's liberalism in what they consider racially tinged campaign appeals by their opponents.

"It's going to be a delicate balance for the chairmen," said Representative Melvin Watt, the North Carolina Democrat who is chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus. "They want to be progressive in their agenda, but they don't want the public to react negatively to what they are doing, because they know you are leading up to a 2008 presidential election." (Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, who is black, could be a presidential candidate.)

Mr. Watt and others emphasized that the Democratic leadership had already embraced some black caucus priorities, like raising the minimum wage and increasing education subsidies. But the black caucus is still preparing its own agenda of items left off the Democratic leadership's program for the first 100 days of the new Congress, including more aid for the victims of Hurricane Katrina, many of whom were black.

The number of African-Americans in Congress has grown to 43 from just 13 at the founding of the Congressional Black Caucus in 1969. But although the 2006 election elevated some caucus members to prominence, it did not add to the group's numbers. Its 43 members still make up less than 10 percent of the House and 1 percent of the Senate. By comparison, blacks make up about 13 percent of the population.

The previous high mark for black power in Congress was in 1993-4, when three blacks served as chairmen of less significant House committees, said David Bositis, a researcher at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, an African-American research and policy group. In addition, Carol Moseley Braun of Illinois, the second black senator since Reconstruction, was elected in 1992.

Many black lawmakers maintain that since then Republican partisans have often played to the racial animosities of some white voters by focusing attention on the black lawmakers who would be committee chairmen if the Democrats controlled the House. Republican speeches and other appeals often emphasized that Mr. Rangel would take over the Ways and Means Committee and that Representative John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, at 77 the dean of the black caucus, was in line to lead the Judiciary Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0102432

Weeks before the midterm elections, the Republican strategist Mary Matalin told The Washington Post that the party was seeking to "hammer home what a Pelosi-Rangel-Conyers House would really mean," linking the two black members to Representative Nancy Pelosi, a liberal white Democrat from San Francisco in line to be House speaker. Black lawmakers say the Republican attacks usually fail to mention their white liberal counterparts like Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin, soon to be chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Richard A. Viguerie, a conservative direct mail pioneer, said the political liability was not the lawmakers' race but the impression that the Democrats were "a party of special interests."

"With the feminists, the homosexual groups, the other interest groups, you put it all together with the black interest groups and it does not look like America," Mr. Viguerie said, predicting that the theme would "get pounded" in conservative talk radio and other outlets during the next Congress.

"We have to be very careful," said William Lacy Clay Sr., a former Democratic representative from Missouri who was a founding member of the Congressional Black Caucus and chairman of the postal committee before the Republican takeover in 1994. (His son, William Lacy Clay Jr., now holds his seat.) "You can bet your life we do not live in a color-blind society," the elder Mr. Clay said.

Some lawmakers, though, said the Democratic victories this year showed that racially charged attacks were losing their edge. "It didn't work," said Representative Bennie Thompson, 58, a Mississippi Democrat who is set to be chairman of the Homeland Security Committee.

Mr. Thompson said he would not shy away from potentially controversial measures intended to undo the effects of discrimination, including ensuring that a part of domestic security contracts went to firms owned by African-Americans and other minorities, that contractors hired members of minority groups, that research money went to historically black colleges, and that border security officers did not single out travelers on the basis of race or ethnicity.

Representative William Lacy Clay Jr. said black lawmakers should not get distracted by the concerns of the larger Democratic caucus. "We need to stay focused as a caucus on the people who sent us there," Mr. Clay said, "and remember we are the black caucus."

Mr. Conyers, who has sponsored a bill creating a commission to study the idea of reparations, and Representative Juanita Millender-McDonald, a 68-year-old California Democrat who is set to lead the House Administration Committee, both declined to discuss potential agendas until the caucus formally selected the new chairmen.

Mr. Rangel, however, said he was conscious that as Ways and Means chairman he would be accountable to a different constituency, including what he called "wannabe Democrats" — moderate freshman elected in Republican-leaning districts.

So instead, Mr. Rangel said, he will advocate policies to help the disadvantaged of all races, which could help blacks as well. "When God hit with Katrina, she didn't give a damn about color at all," he said, "but she sure did give the poor people a hard road to travel." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Pioneering Fire Chief Fights For Her Job Amid Lawsuits (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

CHICAGO, Dec. 4 — Two years ago, when Bonnie Bleskachek was named fire chief in Minneapolis, it made news far beyond Minnesota because she was the first openly lesbian firefighter to achieve that rank in the professional fire service of a major city.

Hailed as a pioneer, Chief Bleskachek was showered with praise for her years of hard work. Perhaps no one was more pleased with the appointment than Mayor R. T. Rybak, a supporter of gay rights who made the promotion a media event.

But last Wednesday, it became clear that everything had changed. Citing a lack of confidence in Chief Bleskachek's management style, Mr. Rybak asked the City Council to fire her.

The move was made after suits were filed against the city and Chief Bleskachek that accused her of playing sexual politics, retaliating against a former partner, acting as a lustful predator and showing bias against at least one heterosexual male firefighter.

"All of that information has been presented to us in great detail," Mr. Rybak said. "I have to be honest. I very much wanted Bonnie Bleskachek to succeed."

Chief Bleskachek says that she did succeed and that is precisely why she is entangled in such a case.

"Being an out lesbian, which the mayor really wanted to push, the first openly lesbian fire chief, made me an easy target," she said. "The sharks smelled blood in the water."

John A. Klassen, an employment lawyer representing the plaintiffs in three of the four suits against Chief Bleskachek, rejected that argument.

DOJ_NMG_0102433

"None of these cases are antilesbian," Mr. Klassen said. "These cases are about discrimination."

He added, "It's unfortunate that someone who could have been a beacon" for gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender people "was engaging in what everybody views as stereotypically male harassment behaviors."

The suits, including one by a former partner of Chief Bleskachek, depict a firehouse culture where lesbians and their allies enjoyed favors and people who crossed them risked punishment.

Chief Bleskachek said the complaints were nonsense, calculated to prey on some of the public's worst fears about gay men and lesbians in power. Of her accusers, she said, "They knew it would be tantalizing and salacious and that the City Council would run, turn tail and run the other way."

The city has settled or is in the process of settling three suits for modest sums. That, Chief Bleskachek, said, angered her most of all.

"I wanted to have my day in court, to be deposed, to force these people to produce some proof," she said. "It's a devastating blow to my career, my reputation, my everything."

The Minneapolis Fire Department had made strides in dismantling barriers to women and minorities, being held up as a model. It was widely considered one of the best places in the country to work as a firefighter, particularly for women.

The national average for women in firefighting agencies is 2.5 percent; in Minneapolis, 71 of 435 members, or 16 percent, of the Fire Department are women.

Last year, the department was first in the country for the number of women in the ranks, according to Women in the Fire Service, an advocacy group in Madison, Wis.

It was not always that way. In the late 1970s, the department was sued over a lack of diversity. It remained under federal oversight until 2000, when it was clear that a lack of diversity was no longer a problem.

Some credit goes to Chief Bleskachek, 43 supporters have said. In 1996, she was a co-founder of the Minnesota Women's Firefighter Association, helping prepare women for firefighting careers and offering professional development to women who sought leadership posts.

Minneapolis has not decided whether the department still has a place for Chief Bleskachek, but she said she wanted to be part of it.

"I've worked too hard for years," she said. "If I'm such a terrible manager, if I'm such a bad leader, where are the red flags in my past? The only thing I can come up with is that this is a whole lot of homophobia and sexism."

A plaintiff, Firefighter Jennifer Cornell, is a former partner of Chief Bleskachek. They share custody of the chief's two children.

Firefighter Cornell said in court papers that Chief Bleskachek, out of vengeance and pride, nullified the results of a test for promotion to battalion chief on which she performed well because Chief Bleskachek's current partner, also a firefighter, did not pass.

Another plaintiff, Firefighter Kathleen Mullen, had been a friend of Chief Bleskachek for years, until the chief started dating Capt. Mary Maresca, who used to go out with Firefighter Mullen.

Firefighter Mullen passed the first part of the battalion chief's test, only to have the remainder of the test canceled. She said the results were thrown out to prevent her promotion and in retaliation for not approving of Chief Bleskachek's current relationship.

Chief Bleskachek said that a panel of city officials had found some test questions flawed and that she had stopped the entire test.

The two cases were settled. Firefighter Cornell had sought $300,000. She received $69,000 and a guaranteed promotion. Firefighter Mullen received a backdated promotion and $29,000.

After the first two suits were filed, a third firefighter, Kristina Lemon, filed a legal complaint stating that 10 years ago Chief Bleskachek pursued an unwanted romantic relationship with her. After being spurned, Firefighter Lemon said, Chief Bleskachek used her increasing power over the years to penalize her.

In the complaint, Firefighter Lemon described a loud argument when Chief Bleskachek demanded that she admit romantic feelings. At another time, Firefighter Lemon said in the complaint, Chief Bleskachek told her that she had "sexual dreams" about her.

"The defense for that is pretty simple," said Jerry Burg, a lawyer for Chief Bleskachek. "It didn't happen. These two people haven't talked in 10 years, and Kristina is making it up."

Firefighter Lemon's case is in the final stages of settlement, said her lawyer, R. Daniel Rasmus. He would not discuss the terms.

A fourth suit was filed against Chief Bleskachek and her current partner, Captain Maresca, by Firefighter Elondo J. Wright, who says he suffered discrimination because he is not gay and not a woman. The federal case is in the early stages.

DOJ_NMG_0102434

In his complaint, Firefighter Wright said that he was called a home wrecker after joining an all-female crew headed by Captain Maresca and that he was denied opportunities for advancement. He also said he saw the women “behaving in a physically inappropriate manner” while on duty at the firehouse, where they had adjoining rooms.

Captain Maresca declined to comment.

Amid the accusations less than a year after her reappointment to a second term, Chief Bleskachek said her head was spinning.

“It’s been brutal,” she said. “I still feel like I’m recovering from shock.” <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Minneapolis Likely To Oust Lesbian Fire Chief (WP)

By Kari Lydersen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Two years ago, Minneapolis, known for its civic diversity and tolerance, made national headlines for naming Bonnie Bleskachek the first openly lesbian fire chief of a major U.S. city.

Now city officials are cringing in the face of four lawsuits filed against her.

The city has settled two lawsuits with women firefighters who allege that sexual favoritism on Bleskachek's part stunted their careers in the department. A sexual harassment suit from a third female firefighter and a gender discrimination claim from a male employee are pending.

Last week, city officials were briefed on an investigation being conducted by a local law firm into Bleskachek's performance as chief. After the briefing, Mayor R.T. Rybak announced that a proposed deal that would have given Bleskachek severance pay and demoted her within the department is off the table. Instead, the city may move to fire her from the force, pending the completion of the investigation.

"The only thing decided is a broad consensus from the mayor and City Council that she be removed from the fire chief position," said Rybak's spokesman, Jeremy Hanson.

Bleskachek, 43, is furious that the city has settled the lawsuits rather than taking them to trial, where she could have told her side of the story.

"They have no evidence at all; this is all based on conjecture and hurt feelings," she said, in her home in a pleasant, modest south Minneapolis neighborhood.

There is no doubt the Fire Department is rife with personal dramas and romantic entanglements. One of the lawsuits against Bleskachek was filed by Jennifer Cornell, 35, the chief's ex-partner of six years, who shares custody of their two children. Another suit was brought by Kathleen Mullen, 43, a longtime friend who had dated Bleskachek's current girlfriend.

A third complaint is from a woman who says Bleskachek flirted with her and then punished her professionally after she declined the advances. Bleskachek counters that the firefighter, Kristina Lemon, was the one who professed attraction to her a decade ago and that she became angry when Bleskachek disciplined her last year for a physical altercation with another firefighter in a burning building.

In February, Cornell and Mullen were the only ones to pass the first portion of a test to promote two employees to battalion chief. Shortly afterward, Bleskachek and several other department officials scrapped the test and left the two positions vacant. Mullen and Cornell charge that the move thwarted their careers and was taken because Bleskachek's current partner, Mary Maresca, had failed the test.

Bleskachek said that the test had been hastily prepared and that officials were shocked that even after a preparatory college class, only two out of 13 firefighters passed. "The test was flawed," she said. "There were questions with more than one answer and ones that were poorly written."

In September, the city settled with Cornell for $65,000 and Mullen for $29,000. Mullen was retroactively promoted to battalion chief, and Cornell was promised a promotion within two years.

"Both of those women had a lot to lose by suing the city and would only have done it if it was absolutely necessary," said John A. Klassen, the attorney for Cornell, Mullen and Elondo Wright, 39, a black male firefighter who recently filed a civil rights lawsuit against Bleskachek, Maresca and the city.

Wright's lawsuit alleges that he was harassed after he was transferred to an all-female fire company overseen by Maresca in 2002. He says Maresca forced him to train long hours late into the night while other firefighters were relaxing, and he alleges that from 1999 to 2005, women supervisors gave him 86 informal disciplinary write-ups, while four male supervisors gave him a total of four. Bleskachek was Maresca's supervisor at the time.

"We're battling the public perception that where there's smoke there's fire," said Bleskachek's attorney, Jerry Burg. "But Bonnie was really a small player in the story of Elondo Wright."

The Minneapolis Fire Department had no women firefighters until 1986, though it was under a federal consent decree to increase diversity. When Bleskachek joined in 1989, she said women faced constant harassment by men.

She is credited with aggressively recruiting women and co-founding the Minnesota Women Fire Fighters Association, which helps women prepare for the entrance test. The national group Women in the Fire Service says 70 of the 447 Minneapolis firefighters are female, the highest percentage of any major department in the country.

Even Bleskachek's critics admire her firefighting and management skills.

"She's a very bright, competent individual who train-wrecked her career by letting personal relationships and abuse of her office cloud what could have been an enormously promising career," Klassen said.

Tom Thornberg, president of Minneapolis Fire Fighters Local 82, said union members are grateful to Bleskachek for convincing the city to establish minimum staffing levels, which it had never had.

National and local gay rights groups declined to comment on the situation but said Minneapolis is considered a leader in gay rights. Klassen says pride in this reputation backfired.

"The city's desire to hold itself out as a diverse, accepting community plays a role in this whole tragedy," he said. "The mayor didn't really look at his candidate well enough to see if she could handle it."

Md. Court Urged To Toss Out Ban On Gay Marriage (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

An attorney for 19 gay and lesbian Maryland residents urged the state's highest court yesterday to strike down a law banning same-sex marriage, saying there is "no constitutionally sufficient justification" for denying his clients and their children protections that only marriage affords.

During an hour-long argument in a crowded chamber of the Court of Appeals in Annapolis, attorney Kenneth Y. Choe of the American Civil Liberties Union invoked the civil rights struggle and said the ability to marry is a fundamental right that belongs to all Marylanders, not only to those for whom that right has always been recognized.

"Despite the fact that plaintiffs have formed committed relationships and loving households, the state excludes them and their children from the numerous important protections that come with marriage solely because the person whom they love is a person of the same sex," he said.

On behalf of the state, Assistant Attorney General Robert A. Zarnoch urged the court to let stand the statute that defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman. Arguing that the judiciary should defer to the legislature, Zarnoch noted that no federal or state appellate court in the country has held that, as the plaintiffs argue, there is a fundamental right to same-sex marriage.

"An invalidation of Maryland's law would have the unfortunate consequence of placing these issues outside the arena of public debate, outside the legislative and democratic process," Zarnoch said.

The court took the case after the state appealed a ruling by Baltimore Circuit Court Judge M. Brooke Murdock, who held in January that the 1973 law banning same-sex marriage is discriminatory and "cannot withstand constitutional challenge." In anticipation of an appeal, Murdock stayed her decision when she announced it.

With Murdock's ruling, Maryland was thrust deep into a debate that has raged across the country at least since 1996, when Congress passed a law barring federal recognition of same-sex marriages and allowing states to do the same.

Massachusetts alone recognizes same-sex marriage, but several states and the District allow domestic partnerships or civil unions that offer some of the rights of marriage.

Plaintiffs, activists on both sides and legal observers packed the wood-paneled courtroom in Annapolis yesterday in what was one of the court's most well-attended sessions in recent memory. The potential audience was wider still; the court began a webcast of its proceedings Thursday.

The judges asked few questions, and little hint of their leanings could be detected. Judge Dale R. Cathell was notably vocal during Choe's presentation, when he interjected five times -- once to ask whether in some instances the proper function of the court was, as Zarnoch had suggested, to defer to the legislature.

Later, on the steps of the courthouse, the legal abstractions faded as the plaintiffs described the protections they do not have because their relationships are not legally recognized: inheritance and adoption rights, decisions about life support, hospital visitation.

Patrick Wojahn, a disabilities lawyer, said his partner, Dave Kolesar, a broadcast engineer, had experimental brain surgery some time ago. Wojahn worried that he might not be able to ride in an ambulance if Kolesar's medical condition recurred and he had to be taken to a hospital.

"We just want to have the security to know that if something happens to him, or to me even, we will be able to be there for each other," Wojahn said.

Among those on the steps was RoseMarie Briggs of the Family Leader Network, a national lobbying organization that backs a constitutional amendment prohibiting same-sex marriage. She said children who are raised "in the home with their married mother and father in a low-conflict marriage" are more likely to succeed in school and to avoid such social hazards as illegal drug use.

"Our laws should reflect what is best for children, not what is best for adults," she said.

In court, Zarnoch argued that the disputed statute is "gender-neutral" because it does not benefit or burden one sex more than the other.

He also argued that gay men and lesbians do not constitute a "suspect class," a designation applied to racial minorities and other groups that have faced discrimination and are held to be deserving of special protections under the law.

Such classes, Zarnoch said, are typically politically powerless. By contrast, he said, "in Maryland, we have openly gay legislators who, in fact, are legislative powerhouses in leadership."

Choe disputed that, saying that if gays and lesbians were politically powerful, they would have been able to achieve their aims through the legislature rather than in court.

For And Against Same-Sex Marriage At Maryland's Highest Court (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Dec. 4 (AP) — The state has no rational basis for denying same-sex couples the fundamental right to marriage, a lawyer for plaintiffs in a gay-marriage case told Maryland's highest court on Monday.

A lawyer for the state argued that Maryland's 1973 ban on same-sex marriage did not constitute gender discrimination because it applied equally to men and women and that the question on same-sex marriage should be decided by the legislature.

"There is no fundamental constitutional right to same-sex marriage," said the lawyer, Robert Zarnoch, counsel to the General Assembly.

Nine same-sex couples and a gay man whose partner is dead filed a lawsuit in 2004 against court clerks who denied their applications for marriage licenses. In January, Judge M. Brooke Murdock of the Circuit Court for Baltimore struck down the law defining marriage as a union between one man and one woman, and the state immediately appealed.

The highest court, the Court of Appeals, gave no indication of how it would rule.

Kenneth Choe, an American Civil Liberties Union lawyer who argued on behalf of the plaintiffs, said they were not trying to undermine the religious institution of marriage. Instead, they are seeking the ability to make medical decisions for one another and to provide legal and financial stability for themselves and their children.

Mr. Choe's argument centered on whether the state had a rational basis to deny same-sex couples the right to marry. "It is not enough that there is a reason for including the included class," he said. "There must also be a reason for excluding the excluded class."

"The state could grant right-handed people but not left-handed people the right to marry simply by observing that marriage benefits right-handed people and their children," he said.

In his rebuttal, Mr. Zarnoch argued that such a statute would be "wholly arbitrary," but that the same-sex marriage ban was not. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

State, ACLU Square Off Over Same-sex 'Marriage' (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- Lawyers for the state of Maryland yesterday said there is no constitutional right for same-sex "marriage," but advocates for homosexuals argued that marriage is a fundamental right for all state residents.

"There is no fundamental, constitutional right to same-sex marriage," Robert A. Zarnoch, an assistant state attorney general, told the state Court of Appeals.

Kenneth Y. Choe, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, said that state law should not exclude homosexual couples from "marrying" because they have "committed relationships and loving households."

DOJ_NMG_0102437

"Fundamental rights belong to all Marylanders," Mr. Choe said. "They do not belong only to those who have historically enjoyed them."

The seven-member Court of Appeals -- the state's highest court -- heard arguments in a lawsuit brought by nine same-sex couples and one homosexual man seeking to "marry." The court is expected to issue a ruling in weeks.

The lawsuit challenges a 1973 amendment to the state constitution that defines marriage as a union only between one man and one woman.

Representing the state, Mr. Zarnoch said the lawsuit seeks to redefine the law and the institution of marriage. He recommended that the court allow the legislature to settle the issue.

"The General Assembly is the proper venue to weigh these issues," said Mr. Zarnoch, adding that if the court were to redefine marriage, it would have "the unfortunate consequence of placing these issues outside the area of public debate."

The state's case rests largely on the original intent of the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the state constitution and on the authority of the legislature to change laws.

Enacted in 1972, the ERA was created to eliminate discrimination against men or women based on sex.

The lawsuit aims to include "sexual orientation" under the term "sex."

However, the state made clear that the lawmakers who passed the ERA specifically did not want homosexual "marriage" to be allowed under the statute.

High courts of several other states have ruled that their ERAs do not cover sexual orientation and cannot be used to justify same-sex "marriage."

Mr. Choe of the ACLU said the court should not let the legislature decide the matter and asked the judges not to "capitulate."

Judge Dale R. Cathell took issue with Mr. Choe's characterization.

"I don't equate due deference to the word capitulation ... . This court doesn't have a history of capitulation," Judge Cathell said, drawing laughter from the packed courtroom.

The state is appealing a ruling in favor of the plaintiffs issued in January by Baltimore Circuit Court Judge M. Brooke Murdoch.

Judge Murdoch ruled that maintaining traditional marriage "is not a legitimate state interest" if it discriminates against homosexuals.

Voters in 27 states, including seven in the most recent election, have opted to define marriage in their state constitutions as a union only between a man and a woman.

Last month, Arizona became the first state in which residents voted against a ban on same-sex "marriage."

In July, five state courts and one federal court issued rulings upholding traditional marriage laws similar to those in Maryland. Only Massachusetts allows same-sex "marriages."

Outside the courthouse after the hourlong hearing, Delegate Don Dwyer Jr. told reporters he would try again to put the marriage issue to the voters in the coming legislative session.

Mr. Dwyer, Anne Arundel County Republican, has failed to win enough support for the measure in the Democrat-controlled legislature in the last few years.

Before Mr. Dwyer addressed reporters, the 19 plaintiffs stood behind Mr. Choe and Dan Furmansky, executive director of Equality Maryland, a homosexual lobbying group.

"The only truth that really matters today is the truth that is love, the love of these couples behind me," Mr. Furmansky said. "They love each other very, very, very much."

Mr. Zarnoch disagreed. "You can't just change the state family law overnight on a court decision," he said.

U.S. Panel Rejects Plan For Paper Ballots (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

GAITHERSBURG, Md., Dec. 4 (AP) — A federal advisory panel rejected a recommendation on Monday that states use just voting machines whose results could be independently verified.

The panel, drafting guidelines for the United States Election Assistance Commission, deadlocked, 6 to 6, on a proposal that would have required electronic machines to produce paper records or other independent means of checking results. Eight votes were needed to pass the recommendation.

The resolution, proposed by Ronald Rivest, a computer scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, closely mirrored a report that warned that paperless voting machines were vulnerable to errors and fraud and could not be made secure.

Some opponents of the proposal said that they supported paper records but that the requirement could overwhelm state election boards.

Congress created the panel after the counting problems in 2000. The meeting on Monday was at the National Institute of Standards and Technology, which is advising the panel on technology. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Federal Panel Rebuffs Guidelines That Insist On A Paper Trail (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

A federal advisory group rejected a measure yesterday that would have discouraged states from using electronic voting systems that lack an independent means of verifying their results, according to a spokeswoman for the National Institute of Standards and Technology.

Members of the Technical Guidelines Development Committee, a group created by Congress to advise the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, deadlocked 6 to 6 on the proposal at a meeting held at the NIST headquarters in Gaithersburg. Eight votes are needed to pass a measure on the 15-member committee.

NIST spokeswoman Jan Kosko said the proposal was introduced by Ronald Rivest, a computer science professor at MIT who heads a subcommittee on transparency and security.

Rivest told committee members that software errors in paperless machines could go undetected, leading to a situation in which "an election result is wrong and you have no evidence to show that it's wrong."

Committee member Brit Williams, a computer scientist who has conducted certification evaluations of Georgia's paperless electronic voting system, opposed the measure. "You are talking about basically a reinstallation of the entire voting system hardware," he said.

Five states -- Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland and South Carolina -- use machines without a paper record exclusively. Eleven states and the District either use them in some jurisdictions or allow voters to chose whether to use them or some other voting system.

The proposal was based on draft recommendations developed by scientists at NIST, who said in a document released last week that voting machines that do not produce a paper record of each vote "cannot be made secure."

The committee is beginning to prepare technical guidelines that the Election Assistance Commission is expected to adopt next year but that would not be implemented until 2009 or 2010. The guidelines are not binding, but many states require election officials to use voting systems that meet national criteria.

Echoing the work of the NIST scientists, Rivest's proposal suggested guidelines that reject systems "in which the correctness of the election results is dependent on the correctness of the software."

Utah, Using Olive Branch, Tries To Add Seat In House (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY, Dec. 4 — The State of Utah and the District of Columbia are perhaps the oddest imaginable political allies in a nation of polarized partisan loyalties, alike in few things other than bankable predictability: Washington Democratic, Utah Republican.

But they share outrage that each does not have more influence in Congress, and Utah took a big step toward a marriage of convenience Monday when legislators here approved a plan that would give the state a fourth Congressional seat before the next census and Washington its first voting representation ever.

The plan by Utah, which was denied a fourth seat after the 2000 census because the government did not count thousands of residents who were away serving as missionaries for the Mormon Church, faces big hurdles.

Still, the gulf of political difference between the state and the District is the very glue that offers both of them some hope Congress will give its required approval: one of the newly created seats would almost certainly be Democratic, the other Republican, with no net change in the balance of power.

Both sides also express hope that the measure can be adopted in the current lame-duck session of Congress, though time is running short.

Even here, the idea has its opponents, who cite the constitutional provision that reserves Congressional representation for the states.

DOJ_NMG_0102439

But as the voting neared on Monday, Republicans, who have overwhelming control of the Legislature, urged their members to stay focused on what Utah would get from the bargain. What Congress does or does not do for Washington is not Utah's business, they said.

"Our purpose here today is really just to substitute one map for another," said Representative David Clark, a Republican who sponsored the measure on the House floor, where it passed by 51 to 19 after clearing the Senate earlier in the day on a vote of 23 to 4.

A spokesman for Gov. Jon Huntsman Jr., a Republican, said he would sign the bill.

Advocates for the District exulted.

"It's great news for Utah, great news for D.C.," said Ilir Zherka, executive director of DC Vote, a nonprofit group that works for Congressional representation.

"We've been able to keep an unusual coalition together," Mr. Zherka added. "This is the most momentum this issue has had in 30 years."

Backers of the Congressional bill that would adopt the idea, enlarging the House to 437 members from its current 435, said they hoped the action by Utah would add momentum and lead to approval in the final days of the current Congress.

But both houses are expected to adjourn by the end of the week, and House leadership aides of both parties said Monday that it was very unlikely the bill would make it to the House floor before then. It is not even currently on the floor schedule, they said.

If the legislation stalls, the new Democratic majority could resurrect it after taking control in January. But the Democrats want to make certain that any changes in the Congressional boundaries do not threaten Representative Jim Matheson, the party's lone lawmaker from Utah.

Democrats in the Legislature said they saw no such problem: if the plan is adopted, Mr. Matheson's new district will be heavily concentrated in the area of Salt Lake City, where the party is strong.

Despite the overwhelming backing for the measure, some legislators here continued to see it as wrongheaded and perhaps unconstitutional.

One Republican who voted no, Representative Julie Fisher, noted the state's rapid population growth and its expectations for the next census, saying, "We will get our seat anyway in 2010, without selling short our nation's most revered document." <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Utah Redistricting Brings D.C. Closer To Vote (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

D.C. officials yesterday cheered the Utah Legislature's approval of a redistricting map that is key to the District's voting rights bill, saying the development brings city residents one step closer to having a vote in the House.

"I do think we can move this bill," said D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat who co-sponsored the D.C. Voting Rights Act. "The main problem is time."

Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty, who met with House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi last week and discussed the bill's prospects, said that Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, told him she would move aggressively for the bill.

"I remain optimistic that the bill will move this week," said Mr. Fenty, a Democrat. "And if it doesn't, I'm hopeful it will be at the top of the legislative agenda in 2007."

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Mrs. Pelosi, said the bill would be a priority for Democratic lawmakers if introduced again next year.

The Utah Legislature yesterday approved a map dividing the state into four congressional districts. The redistricting map was required by lawmakers to move the Voting Rights Act proposal, which has been put forward by Mrs. Norton and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican.

The plan would give the largely Democratic District a seat in the House and add a fourth seat for largely Republican Utah. It also would expand the House permanently from 435 to 437 members.

But the chances of the measure making it out of the House Judiciary Committee and through both chambers of the Republican-controlled Congress before lawmakers adjourn this month are shrinking.

The bill was not on the House floor schedule issued last week, although bills can be added to the docket.

A House senior leadership aide said yesterday there had been "zero discussions" about bringing the bill to the floor this week.

And an aide for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said the chances of the bill passing the Senate this session are "rather slim" because the squeezed time frame doesn't allow for much debate.

Mrs. Norton also said some House Republicans have suggested changes to the bill beyond the Utah redistricting. But she remained hopeful that the measure could move forward.

"We can't do the impossible, but we can certainly keep pressing for this bill as long as this session is still alive," Mrs. Norton said. "Even with all the uncertainty, we're not willing to throw in the towel."

If lawmakers fail to pass the bill before the current session expires, Mr. Davis is expected to reintroduce it immediately after the next session begins Jan. 4.

David Marin, a spokesman for Mr. Davis, said the bill's supporters are holding out hope that it will be introduced this week.

"There are a lot of calls going around to a lot of very influential people," Mr. Marin said. "We're still optimistic."

D.C. Vote, a nonprofit advocacy group, is expected to visit congressional offices today in an effort to have the bill brought to a vote.

Ilir Zherka, executive director of the group, said he expects about 60 advocates to visit about 80 congressional offices, using yesterday's vote in Utah as momentum to have the bill heard this year.

"It's definitely still an uphill battle," Mr. Zherka said. "The effort in Congress is to do as little as possible and get out, and our effort is to add things to their list. This bill is still in the mix."

Without Further Delay (WP)

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

THE PEOPLE of the District of Columbia shouldn't have to wait another minute, let alone another month, to get the full voting representation in government that is their due as Americans. A bill to give the District a vote in the House of Representatives is pending, but for reasons that are as unclear as they are unacceptable, it may not be brought to a vote. Instead of idly watching the hours tick down in the final days of a generally useless legislative year, the 109th Congress should muster the political will to right a 200-year-old wrong.

A significant step was taken yesterday with the Utah legislature's approval of a redistricting plan that carves out an extra congressional seat for the fast-growing state. The resourceful proposal to give the District a voting seat hinges on balancing it against an additional seat for Utah, which just missed qualifying for one more legislator after the last census. The House would increase in size by two, to 437; because it's presumed that Utah voters would elect a Republican and District voters a Democrat, party politics are neutralized. Now that Utah's political leaders have agreed on the shape of a redistricting map, they may prod the Republican leadership to take action.

Some might argue that a lame-duck Congress shouldn't enact far-reaching reform. But this bill has been four painstaking years in the making. It enjoys widespread bipartisan support, and there is no organized opposition to it. Indeed, how could there be? Legal scholars of all political persuasions have testified to its soundness and, as Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said, "It's hard to make a straight-faced argument that the capital of the free world shouldn't have a vote in Congress." If President Bush would like to argue against democracy for the District, he should do so openly; otherwise he should openly support this bill. The same goes for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

That the bill got this far is a testament to Mr. Davis and his partnership with Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), the District's nonvoting delegate in the House. If the bill languishes this year, Mr. Davis has vowed to make it the first bill he introduces in the new Congress. But that carries risks. Will the Republicans who signed on this year stay committed? Will Democrats balk at the seat for Utah? New questions mean potential new delays. All the while D.C. residents continue to pay federal taxes and go off to war without a say in making policy.

That's fundamentally wrong. That's why the 109th Congress couldn't come up with a better ending than one titled "The District of Columbia Fair and Equal House Voting Rights Act of 2006."

House To Consider Abortion Anesthesia Bill (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

In a parting gesture by social conservatives before Republicans relinquish control, House leaders plan to bring up a bill tomorrow that would declare that fetuses feel pain and require abortion providers to offer pregnant patients anesthesia for their unborn child.

The scheduled vote may be the last on abortion-related legislation for years. That's because Democratic leaders hope to avoid confrontations over hot-button social issues that divide their caucus, and focus instead on military and pocketbook issues.

But Republicans and antiabortion activists signaled yesterday that they intend to press hard on social issues, even those that failed to gain traction during GOP control, to separate moderate-to-conservative Democrats from their more liberal leaders.

"The Democrats are facing an interesting situation because they ran to the right in this election," said Wendy Wright, president of the conservative group Concerned Women for America. "They promised one thing to America with their campaigning. The question is, will they live up to that image? Running and hiding is not a solution."

Democrats are shying from the fight. Party leaders in the House have declared tomorrow's decision "a vote of conscience" and will not try to sway the outcome. House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) does not plan to speak on the bill, a rarity for her.

The fetal pain bill is coming up nearly as an afterthought, in the final week of a lame-duck session of Congress. House Republican leaders are using expedited procedures to bring it to a vote, meaning it will take a two-thirds vote of the chamber to pass. Its supporters are setting expectations low.

"Hopefully, we get a majority," said Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.), the bill's author. "Two-thirds is hard on anything, except if it's a post office."

Even if the bill can muster a two-thirds vote, it cannot pass the Senate before Congress adjourns.

But social conservatives see an opportunity to test Democrats' evolving position on abortion, a position that has become more amenable to incremental curbs on ending pregnancies and more vocal about reducing the number of abortions. Under Republican control, Congress passed a ban on the late-term abortion method called "partial birth" abortion by its foes and passed the Unborn Victims of Violence Act, which increased penalties for crimes that harm a fetus.

At first blush, the Unborn Child Pain Awareness Act would seem to be anathema to abortion rights groups. It requires abortion providers to tell a woman whose pregnacy is 20 weeks past fertilization "there is substantial evidence" that the fetus will feel pain during the procedure -- a point hotly debated among physicians and pain specialists.

The woman would then have to sign a form accepting or declining anesthesia for her fetus. Some medical groups interpret the language to mean that the fetus would have to have an application of anesthesia separate from the mother's, a procedure that many abortion clinics are not capable of providing.

Even the bill's definition of pregnancy -- beginning at the moment of fertilization, rather than at implantation in the uterus -- is problematic to some abortion rights groups, since it would legislatively establish that some forms of birth control induce abortion by blocking implantation after fertilization.

Backers of the bill have framed it as a common-sense extension of existing state laws that mandate that patients receive information about abortion procedures before giving their consent.

"This is just a compassion piece of legislation to take informed consent to the level it should be at," said Rep. Phil Gingrey (R-Ga.), an obstetrician and antiabortion conservative.

While the measure has provoked strong opposition from Planned Parenthood and the National Abortion Federation, NARAL Pro-Choice America, perhaps the nation's leading abortion rights group, has stayed neutral.

"Pro-choice Americans have always believed that women deserve access to all the information relevant to their reproductive health decisions. For some women, that includes information related to fetal anesthesia options," Nancy Keenan, NARAL's president, has said in a statement on the bill.

Democratic leaders cited NARAL's position when they decided against trying to influence the vote. Democratic leadership aides said yesterday that they are leery of Republicans charging that they are already out of touch with mainstream values, even before they assume power.

Citing those divisions, the National Right to Life Committee's Douglas Johnson dared Democrats to vote against the bill. If it passes the House, Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) will try to pass it in the Senate by a unanimous voice vote.

"Somebody will object," Johnson said. "We want to know who that person is."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

'Without honor'

Yesterday, when we called on John "Jack" McDermott, who supervised the Watergate investigation as special agent in charge (SAC) of the FBI's Washington Field Office, he was awaiting a scheduled visit from a Hollywood screenwriter.

The big question now is whether Hollywood will listen.

"Tom Hanks has already paid Mark Felt's family for the rights to write the screenplay on 'Deep Throat,' and I can only surmise that they will only be willing to proceed with this if Hanks were planning on projecting Felt in a heroic manner. You don't make too many films about the devil," Mr. McDermott tells Inside the Beltway.

DOJ_NMG_0102442

"Our aim is to see if we can inject some degree of perspective in this thing," he says. "So I plan to accommodate them by making myself available for the sole purpose to get the proper slant on this thing -- projected in a way consistent with accuracy. You try to save what you can -- keep this from becoming historic revisionism."

Mr. McDermott makes no secret of his disdain for former FBI Deputy Director W. Mark Felt, who after decades of secrecy has conceded to being "Deep Throat." The retired SAC has charged that Mr. Felt's repeated leaks to the press not only compromised the Watergate probe, but placed witnesses in jeopardy.

"[A]ll other arguments seeking to justify Felt's actions are trash," says Mr. McDermott, handing this column yesterday a three-page, unpublished summary he has written surrounding Mr. Felt's secret role in Watergate.

"Felt was the bureau's Benedict Arnold," Mr. McDermott opines. "Having been entrusted with the highest levels of military command by [Gen. George] Washington and his staff, Arnold betrayed his oath, his country and his fellow citizen-soldiers to pursue his own ambitions. Felt did no less to the bureau and his fellow agents.

"Let's not fool ourselves," he says. "The bureau's reputation for faithfulness and unselfish devotion to duty has been seriously diminished by this foul episode."

Mr. McDermott acknowledges having "long admired most of Tom Hanks' work product," however, the retired SAC is concerned that the Hollywood actor and director is "sold" on a belief that "Deep Throat" is a champion of truth that otherwise would have been suppressed, rather than a cowardly bushwhacker, disloyal to his fellow agents and his oath of office."

He concludes that "some have called Felt a hero; but heroes don't lurk in the shadows for 33 years. ... The man is without honor."

Mr. McDermott retired in September 1979 as the FBI's deputy associate director.

Spoken by Spanish

Rob Toonkel, director of communications for U.S. English Inc., called our attention yesterday to a new Zogby International poll finding that 65 percent of Hispanics favor making English the official language of the United States.

He says the results of the poll of 903 Hispanic adults "challenges the long-standing claim that Hispanics generally oppose official-English measures. "

Lucky 35

The National Archives on Dec. 15 will continue its moving tradition of holding a naturalization ceremony for petitioners seeking U.S. citizenship.

Chief Judge Thomas F. Hogan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia will preside as 35 petitioners take the oath of citizenship in front of the Charters of Freedom -- the Declaration of Independence, the U.S. Constitution and the Bill of Rights, which was adopted 215 years ago.

Uh-oh

Good grief, have you read the December issue of Popular Mechanics?

"Friday the 13th of April, 2029, could be a very unlucky day for planet Earth," according to the article penned by David Noland. "At 4:36 a.m. Greenwich Mean Time, a 25-million-ton, 820-foot-wide asteroid called 99942 Apophis will slice across the orbit of the moon and barrel toward Earth at more than 28,000 miles per hour.

"The huge pockmarked rock, two-thirds the size of Devils Tower in Wyoming, will pack the energy of 65,000 Hiroshima bombs -- enough to wipe out a small country or kick up an 800-foot tsunami. On this day, however, Apophis is not expected to live up to its namesake, the ancient Egyptian god of darkness and destruction. Scientists are 99.7 percent certain it will pass at a distance of 18,800 to 20,800 miles. We will have dodged a cosmic bullet. Maybe."

Mr. Noland points out that NASA "is taking a wait-and-see attitude."

FCC May Ask Commissioner With Conflict To Break Tie On AT&T-BellSouth Merger (USAT)

By Paul Davidson, Usa Today

USA Today, December 5, 2006

Moving to break a deadlock over approval of AT&T's (T) purchase of BellSouth (BLS), the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission said he will ask a recused commissioner to cast the tie-breaking vote.

For nearly two months, the FCC has been split 2-2 along party lines, with Democrats Jonathan Adelstein and Michel Copps pressing for tough conditions on the $80 billion deal, which would create the nation's largest phone company.

The impasse has forced three postponements of votes on the merger and talks broke down again Friday over Democrats' demands for non-discrimination assurances for AT&T's broadband traffic and reduced wholesale prices.

DOJ_NMG_0102443

In a letter to congressional leaders Friday, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, who favors no conditions on the deal, said he will ask fellow Republican Robert McDowell to break the stalemate.

McDowell disqualified himself because he previously worked as a lobbyist for a trade group that opposed the deal. Martin told lawmakers a recused commissioner may be authorized to vote if the government's interests outweigh any ethical concerns. He said he has asked the FCC general counsel to determine if McDowell may vote.

Enlisting McDowell could "spark various ethical/legal complaints" and a political ruckus with leaders in the new Democratic-controlled Congress, Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin said in a report.

The FCC hopes to clear the deal at its Dec. 20 meeting, before the new Congress takes over in January. Levin predicted McDowell would "seek some sort of compromise" but would lean toward Martin's view.

In a statement, Copps said "taking a mulligan by starting over with (McDowell involved) would create more problems than it resolves" and "short-circuit discussions."

Recent talks broke down partly over Democrats' efforts to prevent AT&T's DSL broadband service from offering faster downloads to websites that pay higher fees. AT&T agreed not to prioritize traffic on a portion of its network, rather than throughout its network, say people with direct knowledge of the discussions.

AT&T also bristled at demands for binding arbitration to settle disputes over the wholesale prices it charges rivals to lease its network for business services.

AT&T has been more receptive to Democrats' requests to charge lower prices for its stand-alone broadband service, say people with knowledge of the discussions. As a condition of the AT&T-SBC merger, the company agreed to offer DSL without also requiring customers to buy AT&T phone service. That way, consumers could choose a rival Internet-based phone service, such as Vonage. But competitors have complained that AT&T's pricing gives consumers no incentive to buy standalone DSL. AT&T says its prices are competitive.

To win FCC approval for its acquisition of BellSouth, AT&T has offered other concessions, such as $10-a-month DSL service for 30 months and expansion of its broadband service in rural areas. Such offers may be withdrawn if McDowell joins the discussions.

FCC clearance is the final regulatory hurdle for the deal, which has been approved by the Justice Department and 18 states.

'Rubber-Stamp' Inference Riles Federal Judge At Telecom Merger Hearing (LAW)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell, The Deal

The Deal, December 5, 2006

Fireworks in a Washington, D.C., courtroom don't necessarily signal bad news for two telecommunications mergers under review by a federal judge, but they may portend a battle over merger law.

On Nov. 30, District Court Judge Emmet Sullivan heard the latest round of arguments in his review of the mergers between Verizon Communications Inc. and MCI Inc., and SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., which the Department of Justice approved in 2005.

Sullivan, months into a congressionally mandated review of the merger, was taken aback when Verizon's lawyer bluntly suggested the judge had little power to unwind the deals.

"This merger is not going to be unscrambled by anything this court does," senior Verizon lawyer John Thorne told Sullivan.

The startled judge -- who has repeatedly said he intends to conduct an independent review and "won't be a rubber stamp" for the government -- nearly came off the bench. Leaning forward, he glared at Thorne and asked the Verizon attorney to explain his opinion of the judge's authority and the importance of the Tunney Act proceeding.

Thorne, who is well-versed in antitrust law, replied, "If a transaction is largely good, it should close."

Sullivan's irritation aside, Thorne's view of restricted judicial authority is shared by many antitrust experts.

Thorne concluded that anti-competitive issues posed by a merger, which in this case resulted in the telecoms being ordered to let competitors lease lines into some 700 buildings in about a dozen markets, can be dealt with after a deal closes through the Tunney Act process.

Continuing to glare at Thorne, Sullivan said, "Maybe Congress should make it clear that mergers couldn't close until there has been judicial review," he said.

As Thorne finally sat down, Sullivan said, "I'm going to do an independent review and we'll see where the merger stands at that point."

Despite Sullivan's tough words, other antitrust experts say the judge, in fact, has little power to rewrite the Justice Department's two merger approvals.

In merger cases where DOJ predicts anti-competitive harm and negotiates divestitures or other remedies with the merging parties to resolve the problems, the agency must submit any remedies for approval by a federal judge. The Tunney Act, a law enacted in the 1970s and amended in 2004, mandates that process.

The current Tunney Act proceeding is the first subjected to hearings since the Congress moved to strengthen the law two years ago.

DOJ's practice has been to allow mergers to close prior to the Tunney Act hearings. In many cases, including the two telecom mergers now under judicial review, the agency does not require execution of the divestitures until the Tunney process concludes.

In most merger cases, DOJ simultaneously files with a district court the complaint outlining the competitive harms as well as the negotiated consent decree spelling out the proposed remedies.

Most of the time, in what has been characterized as a rubber-stamp process, judges quietly approve the consent decree.

But for all Sullivan's concern, he is left with two choices. He can decide that the required divestitures are in the public interest, and enter an order approving them, or he can decide they are not sufficient.

If he rules against the remedies, DOJ would go back and reconsider their options, DOJ lawyer Claude Scott told the court. Should that happen, the divestiture requirements could be dropped, eliminating the need for any further court action.

"I know you don't have to file anything," in these cases, Sullivan told Scott. In an effort to introduce a little levity, he grinned. "Are you sorry you did? Just kidding."

If the DOJ decided to appeal the decision, as at least one lawyer arguing against the deal predicted, the matter would shift to the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where the chief judge is Douglas Ginsburg, a Reagan appointee and a former assistant attorney general for antitrust at DOJ. Depending on how far Sullivan goes, Ginsburg and other judges on the appeal court panel could see the Tunney Act process as infringing on prosecutorial discretion, according to a lawyer who requested anonymity.

"And that might not be the best thing for consumers," because without the Tunney Act, it's not clear why divestitures are required to protect consumers, the lawyer said.

In the AT&T and Verizon mergers, however, trade groups for rivals of the big telecommunications companies have vociferously opposed the remedies, arguing that in fact the mergers themselves should never have been approved.

In court, Justice Department lawyers have gone out their way to avoid the rubber-stamp analogy while still arguing that Sullivan's role is limited to judging whether the remedies are sufficient to fix the mergers' perceived harm to competition.

"You do have a role in looking at this remedy," Scott said when Sullivan queried him after the exchange with Thorne.

Sullivan, however, has repeatedly said he isn't sure he is limited to just determining whether the remedy fits the harms alleged in the complaint.

Therein lies the rub, according to antitrust lawyers watching the case. While the Tunney Act does allow judicial scrutiny of the remedy, the decision of whether to require any divestitures is a matter of prosecutorial discretion that lies with the antitrust regulators.

As in the case of AT&T Inc.'s subsequent purchase of BellSouth Corp., DOJ found no anti-competitive harm, and consequently that deal didn't require any judicial review. Sullivan noted that and queried whether DOJ's decision not to impose conditions on the BellSouth deal was intended to avoid another Tunney act review.

"The government chose not to file a complaint in a case that was on the heels of this case," Sullivan said to Scott. "Does this alter the landscape"?

Scott said no.

So far, Sullivan, a Clinton appointee, has conducted public hearings, ordered DOJ to produce nonpublic documents, and allowed lawyers for the diverse opponents, such as industry groups CompTel and AcTel, and even the New York State Attorney General's office, to review and comment on the matter.

During the hearing, Sullivan said he might hold an evidentiary hearing before issuing his ruling.

Kentucky Congressman Raises Concerns About Delta Merger (LOUBIZ)

Louisville (KY) Business First, December 5, 2006

Kentucky congressman Geoff Davis is encouraging the U.S. Attorney General and Transportation Secretary to conduct a "full and careful review" of US Airways' efforts to merge with Delta Air Lines.

In letters dated Dec. 1, Davis told both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Transportation Secretary Mary Peters that he is "very concerned about the significant loss of competition and the likely impact on air fares this merger could create."

"The tremendous overlap of the route networks of these carriers would cause significant consolidation, reducing flight choices and increasing already expensive fares for our consumers," he wrote. "This potential merger affects thousands of jobs, and Delta/Comair has an economic impact for our region in the billions."

Atlanta-based Delta (Pink Sheets: DALRQ) operates its second-largest hub at the Cincinnati/Northern Kentucky International Airport in Hebron, Ky. That hub, which also contains the headquarters of Comair, Delta's regional carrier subsidiary, employs an estimated 10,000 people and has an economic impact of nearly $4 billion, according to a news release issued Monday by Davis, a Boone County Republican representing Kentucky's Fourth District.

"We feel that Delta and its employees, through extraordinary sacrifice and hard work, are making tremendous progress on their restructuring plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a strong and independent carrier," Davis wrote to Peters and Gonzales. "The interests of all may be best served by ensuring they remain on this course."

US Airways made its $8 billion merger offer public on Nov. 15 when the airline released a letter to Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein outlining its unsolicited bid. Grinstein already had rebuffed the offers privately and has continued to argue that Delta and the public would be best served if it emerges from bankruptcy as an independent, stand-alone airline.

Mercury News Reduces Number Of Layoffs After Bargaining Session (AP)

By Rachel Konrad, Ap Business Writer

AP, December 5, 2006

San Francisco (AP) -- After a 20-hour bargaining session ended Monday morning, the San Jose Mercury News and its union reached a tentative agreement on a two-year contract that reduced the number of workers to be laid off.

The 263,000-circulation daily newspaper will eliminate 27.5 full-time positions, down from the 69 positions originally slated to be cut.

The paper, which employs 490 members of the San Jose Newspaper Guild, guaranteed it would not lay off more union workers through June. Managers will notify employees of the layoffs by Tuesday morning.

Laid off workers may receive two weeks pay for every year of service, up to 10 weeks of salary, and two months of paid health care.

The reduction in layoffs was welcome news among reporters, photographers and other editorial workers, who wore black Monday to show solidarity with soon-departed colleagues.

"Nobody wants to see good journalists and friends walk out the door," said columnist and guild member Mike Cassidy. "But I'm encouraged because it shows that the owners of the paper do have a concern for quality journalism and are willing to try to work with the unions to remain the paper it is."

Newspaper spokesman Dan Breeden confirmed terms of the agreement but would not comment further.

Luther Jackson, executive officer of San Jose Newspaper Guild, did not immediately return calls Monday.

The contract provides 2 percent annual wage increases and a $1,000 bonus meant to help reduce the sting of a new health plan that requires members to pay at least 20 percent of premiums.

The company froze its pension plan and replaced it with a 401K matching contribution of up to 3 percent if an employee contributes 6 percent.

Despite concessions, the agreement offers a measure of stability in a newsroom rattled by corporate turmoil.

MediaNews Group Inc., the nation's fourth-largest newspaper publisher, acquired the Mercury News, the Monterey County Herald and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. earlier this year in a complex deal valued at $1 billion. MediaNews also owns the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers.

The Mercury News was previously owned by Knight Ridder, the nation's second largest newspaper publisher, which put itself up for sale late last year under pressure from shareholders unhappy with a sagging stock price. The slump reflected investors' souring sentiments about traditional media as the Internet siphons away advertising revenue.

The new contract, which expires in October 2008, permits MediaNews to coordinate news coverage and advertising with other papers in the chain.

Late last month, a federal judge issued a temporary restraining order on the San Francisco Chronicle, whose parent company, Hearst Corp., appeared interested in collaborating with MediaNews on local distribution and national advertising sales. U.S. District Judge Susan Illston said such a deal would possibly violate antitrust laws.

Plaintiffs In Iowa Microsoft Case Won't Call Gates, Ballmer As Witnessess (AP)

By David Pitt, The Associated Press

AP, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102446

DES MOINES, Iowa – The attorney representing plaintiffs in one of the few state-level class-action antitrust lawsuits left against Microsoft announced today that she would not call Chairman Bill Gates and CEO Steve Ballmer as witnesses.

Roxanne Conlin won a judge's ruling prior to the trial that would have forced Gates and Ballmer to travel to Des Moines for direct questioning even though the two executives were expected to testify later in the case when Microsoft presents its defense.

Judge Scott Rosenberg's ruling indicated that Gates and Ballmer would be required to travel to Des Moines from Washington only once. That would have allowed Microsoft attorneys to question the two men directly — in effect presenting part of their defense in the middle of the plaintiffs' case.

Conlin released a statement today that said the decision was reached to avoid any potential confusion by jurors.

"I am concerned such a disruption of our case may create unnecessary confusion for the jurors," Conlin said. "There is absolutely no reason to have such a disruption in light of the defense's promise to call Bill Gates as a witness."

The Iowa lawsuit claims Microsoft violated Iowa's competition laws and seeks about $330 million for Iowans who have purchased the software maker's products since 1994.

Microsoft attorney Rich Wallis said Friday that many of the allegations Conlin is making are 15 to 20 years old and the company resolved many of the issues years ago. Wallis said the case is about whether Iowans paid fair prices for computer software, and the company will show that consumers received a good value for their money.

The lawsuit was originally filed in 2000, after federal antitrust actions against Microsoft were settled. It has already been before the Iowa Supreme Court three times on various legal issues and been sent back to Polk County District Court for trial.

Conlin will be allowed to play a 10-hour unflattering 1998 deposition by Gates from another lawsuit that shows a fidgety, nervous looking chief executive.

She has said the videotape will give jurors "good insight into the motivation and business practices of Microsoft."

Microsoft has planned on calling Gates and Ballmer as witnesses from the outset of the trial and said Conlin's change in strategy does not affect their case.

"This does not change our strategy one iota. Bill Gates and Steve Ballmer are coming to Iowa to testify in our case," Wallis said. "They're looking forward to telling our story as we have said all along."

The change will mean Gates and Ballmer will come later next year. Both men are expected to be on the witness stand for about four days.

The jury of seven men and five women have been told the case will likely last about six months.

Bank Of N.Y. To Buy Mellon Financial In $16.5B Deal (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, December 5, 2006

Bank of New York said Monday it will buy Mellon Financial for $16.5 billion in stock, creating an investor service behemoth and one of the world's largest asset managers.

The combined company, to be called Bank of New York Mellon, will rank first worldwide with $16.6 trillion of assets under custody, says globalcustody.net (custody services distribute cash and dividends held in trust on behalf of the trust owners). It will be in the top 10 of the world's largest asset managers, overseeing more than $1.1 trillion of assets, says David George, analyst at A.G. Edwards.

“This deal does make sense,” says Eric Fitzwater at bank industry research firm SNL Financial.

Investors seemed to agree. Shares of Bank of New York gained $4.27 to $39.75, and Mellon gained $2.73 to $42.78. Investors were so pleased because the expectations for the merger are “reasonable and realistic,” says Gerard Cassidy, analyst at RBC Capital Markets.

The deal is significant for the industry because it results in:

·Cost savings. The combined firm plans to slash pretax costs by 8.5% or $700 million a year in a three-year plan. Part will be accomplished by cutting 3,900 of 40,000 jobs. The restructuring plan is expected to cost $1.3 billion. Cassidy thinks that after everything is done, the new company might save more and spend less to restructure.

·Pressure to consolidate. Being big is a major advantage in the asset custody business, where firms are paid relatively small amounts to handle routine back-office tasks, Fitzwater says. “In this sector, scale is huge,” he says.

The new combined company will put major pressure on smaller firms to combine so they can compete, Cassidy says.

As large as the Bank of New York's buy of Mellon is, it's just the latest in a frenzied year for financial M&A. The deal is the industry's second-largest this year and 12th-largest ever, Thomson Financial says.

It's not surprising to see strong M&A activity in the financial industry since the stocks have done so well, says Anant Sundaram, finance professor at the Tuck School of Business. Banks are on the hunt for deals using their rich stock, he says. Bank CEOs are telling themselves: “Everyone is doing it (merging), so let me do it also,” he says.

Banking On Market Complexities (WSJ)

By Clint Riley

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Bank of New York Co.'s proposed takeover of Mellon Financial Corp. reveals a new pot-of-gold in the investment industry: The increasingly complicated, global investment strategies used by hedge funds and other sophisticated money managers has been a boom for banks that keep track of all those trades.

If the $16.5 billion stock deal is approved by regulators and shareholders, that business now would have a new leader: The combined Bank of New York Mellon Corp. would have $16.6 trillion in assets under custody -- overseeing trade processing, internal accounting, fund administration and other such services for hedge funds, retirement plans, mutual funds and government entities. That figure would catapult the company ahead of J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., which oversees about $12.9 trillion under custody.

WSJ's Clint Riley explains2 why the merger "is meant to be."

The new company would have another $1.1 trillion in assets under management, making investment decisions on behalf of mostly big institutional clients, putting it in the top 10 global asset managers.

Share prices for both companies rallied on the news, with the Bank of New York up 12% and Mellon up nearly 7% for a total combined stock market value of $47.5 billion.

Investors bid up prices for the other two big stand-alone custody banks' shares, with Northern Trust Corp. and State Street Corp. jumping amid speculation that they could become takeover targets or steal customers from their merging rivals. Prices for smaller asset servicers in the U.S. and abroad also rose, including Investors Financial Services Corp.

"This is about the future and not about the past," said Robert P. Kelly, Mellon's chief executive, who will become chief executive of the combined company if the deal is completed as planned, in mid-2007. "We are in a consolidating industry and we are in businesses that are becoming more global."

Hedge funds and institutional investors, including governments in emerging markets, are making a larger number of often-complicated investments across multiple asset classes in many countries, sometimes simultaneously through several trading strategies.

MORE ON THE MERGER

· Tale of the Tape: Merging Assets3

· Analysts React: 'Strategic Sense'4

· Read the full text5 of the companies' statement on the merger agreement.

The complexity of dealing with varied regulations, currency conversions and accounting differences world-wide is forcing many asset managers, which once serviced their own trades, to outsource the work to larger and better-equipped financial institutions with global reach.

To keep up with investing trends, banks and asset servicing firms are employing sophisticated technology, including software that can quickly translate foreign language, track currency transactions and ensure compliance with constantly shifting regulations.

Such technology is costly to develop and maintain. Those with the broadest client bases have the advantage of spreading such costs, allowing them to reap higher returns.

'Guaranteed' Profits

That is part of what is driving consolidation in the industry, which previously had been confined to acquisitions of smaller players, including some overseas.

The Bank of New York brings its scale and expertise in asset servicing, as well as short-term lending to traders and trade clearing -- the business guaranteeing that all parties in a trade will make good on their commitments.

This potentially lucrative business would provide about 71% of the new company's annual revenue, or $8.9 billion of the $12.5 billion total.

The remaining $3.6 billion, or 29%, would come from asset and wealth management, Mellon's forte.

Most of Mellon's business is as a money manager for big institutional clients, but it also advises the struggling mutual-fund family Dreyfus Funds.

Despite its well-known brand name, investors have been pulling more money out of Dreyfus stock and bond funds than they put in for the past three years, according to Financial Research Corp.

The combined company would be based in New York and have 40,000 employees in 36 countries.

DOJ_NMG_0102448

It said cost-cutting from the proposed takeover should save the new company $700 million a year in pretax expenses, or about 8.5%. It hopes to cut about 3,900 jobs over three years, through attrition "where possible."

Bowing to Mellon's iconic status in its hometown of Pittsburgh, the new company plans to base some of its divisions there and add jobs.

Current shareholders of Bank of New York will control more than 60% of the new company, while Mellon's current management team will largely take over day-to-day operations of the company. The current chairman and chief executive of Bank of New York, Thomas A. Renyi, will stay on for 18 months as executive chairman and play a key role in its integration.

"This is a combination that is coming out of strength," said Mr. Renyi in an interview. "Now is the time to play on a global stage."

The deal, described by the banks as a merger of equals, brings together two storied financial institutions that analysts have speculated for years would join forces.

Mellon was founded by the family of industrialist Andrew Mellon, the other, the brain child of Alexander Hamilton. Both men were once U.S. Treasury secretaries; Hamilton was its founder, and his visage today graces the $10 bill.

"Hamilton and Mellon are probably drinking scotch right now," quipped Gerard Cassidy, a bank analyst for RBC Capital Markets.

Back in early 1998, Mr. Renyi approached Mellon with a so-called bear hug -- a merger offer to a corporate board that falls short of a hostile takeover bid. The idea was harshly rejected by Mellon's board, then led by Frank V. Cahouet.

The Challenge to Renyi

"Our board does not believe you have the commitment or the experience to implement a strategy that capitalizes on the quality of the Mellon franchise and the value inherent in it," Mr. Cahouet told Mr. Renyi in a letter.

Mr. Renyi didn't let that deter him. For years, he had sought to have his bank viewed in a better light by investors and fellow bankers, arguing that it didn't deserve to be trading at cheaper valuations than its biggest competitors Mellon, State Street of Boston and Northern Trust of Chicago.

In late September, with Mellon under new leadership and the 60-year-old Mr. Renyi approaching retirement age, he decided that the timing was right to try again. He found a receptive audience in his counterpart at Mellon, Mr. Kelly, an expansion-minded bank executive who left Wachovia Corp. less than a year ago to head Mellon. Both men were acutely aware of the huge scale their companies needed to compete in the competitive business.

Though speculation was rampant that more consolidation was in the offing, Northern Trust and State Street tried to douse it. "We believe we have a strong future serving our clients and creating shareholder value as an independent company," said a Northern Trust spokesman.

A State Street spokeswoman said her company also doesn't feel it is under pressure to do a deal.

The deal also could prompt other big banks with such operations to move to strengthen their positions, including Citigroup Inc., which has a custody unit that is the fourth largest in the business. Asset services is a double-digit growth engine for Citigroup and J.P. Morgan.

Bank Of New York To Buy Mellon For $16.5 Billion (NYT)

By Peter Edmonston

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Bank of New York has agreed to acquire Mellon Financial of Pittsburgh in an all-stock transaction valued at $16.5 billion that will create the world's largest securities-servicing firm, the two companies announced today.

The combined entity will be called Bank of New York Mellon and have annual revenue of more than $12 billion.

The boards of both banking companies have approved the deal, which is expected to close early in the third quarter of 2007 and will immediately add to earnings, the companies said.

For Bank of New York, the deal will bolster its position as a leader in the securities servicing and processing business, which provides the backbone of the world's stock and bond markets. Earlier this year, Bank of New York nearly doubled the size of its corporate trust business, which handles record-keeping for debt issues, by agreeing to swap many of its retail branches for J.P. Morgan Chase's corporate trust unit.

The combined company will have $16.6 trillion in assets under custody and act as corporate trustee for an additional $8 trillion in assets.

"Mellon is going to have the opportunity to accelerate what is are very compelling growth rates for the company," said Thomas A. Renyi, Bank of New York's chairman and chief executive, during a presentation for investors and banking industry analysts today. "This is a combination that has extraordinarily similar and very complimentary businesses."

Wall Street viewed the deal favorably for both banking companies. Bank of New York's shares climbed $4.27, or 12 percent, to close at $39.75 today on the New York Stock Exchange, while Mellon's shares gained $2.73, or 6.8 percent, to $42.78.

While the deal ends a longstanding rivalry for both companies, it will bring together institutions whose heritage is tied to two titans of American business history. Mellon was founded more than a century ago by Judge Thomas Mellon, who handed over the business to his son Andrew; the Bank of New York was founded by Alexander Hamilton in 1784.

When the deal is completed, Bank of New York's shareholders will own 63 percent of the stock in the combined company, with Mellon's shareholders owning the remainder. Under the terms of the deal, Bank of New York's shareholders will receive 0.9434 shares of the combined company for each their current shares. Mellon's shareholders will exchange their stock on a one-for-one basis.

The combined company's board will have 10 members appointed by Bank of New York and eight members appointed by Mellon. Its headquarters will be in New York.

"Several business divisions" are expected to be based out of Pittsburgh, said Robert Kelly, Mellon's chairman and chief executive, who become chief executive of the combined company. Mr. Renyi will serve as executive chairman for 18 months after the transaction closes, to be succeeded as chairman by Mr. Kelly.

The companies said today that their merger would allow for annual cost reductions of about $700 million. The companies' combined work force of about 40,000 will be reduced by about 3,900 over three years, though specific businesses or locations where jobs are to be shed have not yet been determined.

Mr. Kelly joined Mellon in February, after activist investors had pushed the company for change in strategy. In his previous job as chief financial officer at Wachovia, Mr. Kelly led the Charlotte, N.C.-based banking company through a series of large acquisitions. Still, many analysts saw Mr. Kelly's hiring at Mellon as a sign that the company would not put itself up for sale any time soon. Shortly after his appointment, he told The New York Times that "I am not focused on M.&A."

Last month, Mr. Kelly gave a presentation to investors and analysts outlining his strategy for improving the company's margins and expanding its international presence. After the presentation, an analyst at Prudential securities, Michael Mayo, raised his rating on Mellon's stock to "overweight" from "underweight," writing in a research note that Mr. Kelly had "outlined a series of steps that should help liven up what we had considered a sleepy organization."

Mr. Mayo also noted that Mellon's securities-processing business would fare well if the stock market continued its recent rise. Each 10 percent increase in the stock market would bolster Mellon's revenue by 1 to 2 percent, he estimated.

Goldman Sachs and the law firm Sullivan & Cromwell advised Bank of New York in the transaction. Mellon was represented by UBS Investment Bank, Lazard and the law firms Simpson Thacher & Bartlett and Reed Smith. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Old-Line Institutions To Merge (WP/AP)

By Eileen Alt Powell

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 4 -- Bank of New York said Monday that it would take over Mellon Financial in a $16.5 billion all-stock deal that will create the world's largest securities servicing company.

The merger, which is projected to be completed by mid-2007, combines two financial institutions that are steeped in American history.

Bank of New York was founded in 1784 by Alexander Hamilton, who went on to become the first secretary of the U.S. Treasury. Mellon Financial, based in Pittsburgh, was founded in 1869 by the famous family of financiers and philanthropists.

The new company, which will preserve links to that heritage by calling itself Bank of New York Mellon, would become the world's leading asset servicer, with $16.6 trillion in assets under management. It also will rank among the top 10 global asset managers with more than $1.1 trillion in assets under management.

The companies, in announcing the deal, said it would result in the elimination of about 3,900 jobs, or nearly 10 percent of their combined work force of about 40,000. The reductions would be made through normal attrition "wherever possible," the companies said in a statement.

The deal was approved by each company's board of directors but requires approval by regulators and shareholders.

Investors appeared to signal support Monday: Bank of New York shares closed at $39.75, up 4.27; Mellon Financial closed at $42.78, up $2.73. Analyst David A. George with A.G. Edwards & Sons in St. Louis upgraded Mellon Financial to "buy" from "hold," saying "from our perspective, this is an excellent transaction as it creates a securities servicing and asset management behemoth that can rival any bank or asset manager in the world."

The announcement also said that Thomas Renyi, chairman and chief executive of Bank of New York, would lead the merger integration team as the new institution's executive chairman for 18 months. Mellon's chairman and chief executive, Robert P. Kelly, would be chief executive of the merged bank and then replace Renyi when he retires. Gerald L. Hassell, president of Bank of New York, will hold the same position in the new company.

Renyi, 60, has been chief executive of the New York bank since 1997 and chairman since 1998. Kelly, 52, who had been the chief financial officer of Wachovia in Charlotte, took over at Mellon last February with the retirement of longtime chief executive Martin G. McGuinn.

The new company would have its headquarters in New York.

The companies said they expected the combined company to cut costs by about $700 million a year and said the deal will result in restructuring charges of about $1.3 billion.

LSI Logic To Buy Agere In Bet On Data-Storage Chips (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

LSI Logic Corp. agreed to buy Agere Systems Inc. for stock valued at about $3.45 billion, placing a big bet on the market for chips used in data storage and networking.

The purchase agreement announced yesterday is the largest in the 25-year history of LSI. The Silicon Valley company pioneered the market for chips that companies customize for specific chores.

LSI Logic CEO Abhi Talwalkar2 tells CNBC that the purchase of Agere Systems brings together 4,300 engineers, 10,000 strong patent portfolio and "a competitive pipeline of innovation."

Abhi Talwalkar, a former Intel Corp. executive who became LSI's chief executive in May 2005, has narrowed the company's broad range of products to focus on chips for managing disk drives and communications between computers and data-storage systems. LSI chips also are used in consumer-electronic products.

Agere, of Allentown, Pa., traces its lineage to Bell Laboratories, the one-time research arm of AT&T Corp. that invented the transistor. Lucent Technologies Inc., which inherited those operations, spun Agere off in 2000. Agere also sells data-storage chips, as well as chips used in networking devices and cellphones.

Mr. Talwalkar said the deal creates a "formidable competitor" across all parts of the data-storage market, and bolsters LSI's position in networking and consumer electronics -- while assembling a big team of engineers with a massive collection of patents.

For Agere, being part of a larger company reassures customers about the future of its products. "We had some of our largest customers concerned at the size we were about our ability to move forward," said Richard Clemmer, its president and chief executive.

Under a definitive agreement between the companies, Agere shareholders will receive 2.16 shares of LSI for each Agere share they own, or a total of 379 million LSI shares. Based on LSI's closing price Friday, the companies estimated the value to Agere shareholders at about $4 billion, or $22.81 a share -- 28% above the closing price of Agere's shares on Friday.

Following the announcement of the deal, however, LSI's shares fell nearly 14%, or $1.44, to $9.12 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange, reducing the transaction value. Agere's shares rose 8.5%, or $1.51, to $19.30 on the NYSE.

Tim Luke, an analyst at Lehman Brothers, said some investors may be concerned about the price of the deal, particularly because LSI had seemed to be moving away from communications markets. "I think investors had been hoping they would be more focused," he said.

The companies expect to record cost savings starting next year, with annual savings of at least $125 million in 2008. The deal will slightly cut into earnings next year but "meaningfully" add to earnings in 2008, the companies said. LSI and Agere had combined revenue of $3.5 billion for the 12 months ended Sept. 30. The deal is expected to close in the first quarter.

DOJ_NMG_0102451

Mr. Talwalkar will remain CEO of the combined companies, which will keep the LSI name and be based at LSI's headquarters in Milpitas, Calif. The deal must approved by regulators as well as shareholders of both companies.

Upon completion, Agere shareholders will own about 48% of the combined company and Agere will designate three seats on its nine-member board. LSI shareholders will own 52% of the combined company an designate the remaining six board seats.

Family Leads Management Bid For Vegas Casinos (WSJ)

By Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

A management-led $4.7 billion buyout offer for Station Casinos Inc. represents a way for the company's founding family to tighten its hold on Station at a time when competition is intensifying for Las Vegas residents, its core customers.

Station received an $82-per-share offer from a group led by Chairman and Chief Executive Frank Fertitta III; his brother, President Lorenzo Fertitta; and Colony Capital LLC. The Fertittas already own about 20% of Station, a Las Vegas-based company that owns and operates 16 so-called locals casinos aimed largely at suburban Las Vegas residents. The offer also calls for the assumption of more than $3.4 billion in Station debt.

WSJ reporter Randall Smith discusses2 why high profile Wall Street firms like Morgan Stanley are overcoming a traditional distaste for casinos by seeking to invest in them, albeit in a low-profile manner.

Spokespeople for Station and Colony declined to comment.

Speculation about a buyout of Station has circulated for weeks, and yesterday the offer sent the shares up more than 22%, ending the day at $84.90 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. That is $2.90 higher than the offer price, suggesting that investors expect a higher offer before a deal is reached.

Any deal for Station will likely be closely scrutinized because of management's involvement. Station says it appointed a special committee of independent directors to review the proposal.

The move comes as Station is facing tough competitive issues. Last month, the company lowered its fourth-quarter and 2007 earnings estimates. Station reported net income of $161.9 million in 2005 on revenue of $1.1 billion. It faces competition from Boyd Gaming Corp. and others angling for gamblers who live in Las Vegas, as opposed to tourists. The softening of the "locals" market is partly because of Station, which has built glamorous casino-resorts that have cannibalized its older properties.

It also comes amid a wave of interest in casino-industry buyouts. Gambling giant Harrah's Entertainment Inc. Oct. 2 received an $81-per-share offer from private equity firms Apollo Management and Texas Pacific Group. That offer was quickly raised to $83.50 per share, according to people close to the situation, valuing the company at $15.5 billion.

Station has seen its long-term debt increase in the past year to more than $3.4 billion, partly on higher interest expense and loans used to finance stock buybacks. Station has repurchased about 19% of its common stock this year.

Questions have been raised about the company's stock compensation program, which has allowed the Fertitta family to realize about $300 million in stock-based compensation since 2002. In a May 4, 2005, proxy paper, research firm Glass Lewis & Co. said Station's "equity-based compensation practices are among the most expensive and liberal we have reviewed."

The Fertittas and other partners involved in the buyout offer, Blake Sartini and Delise Sartini, together own 27% of the outstanding Station shares, according to a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Mr. Sartini, a former Station board member, couldn't be reached to comment.

Casino analysts are split over whether outside bidders will make a run for Station. "Unlike Harrah's...we expect the Station management led LBO will not likely receive multiple offers and come to a quicker resolution than Harrah's," Robin Farley, analyst at UBS Investment Research in New York wrote in a research note. The Fertitta brothers already hold casino licenses in Nevada, making their path to a deal easier than the Harrah's suitors, who face complicated licensing issues.

Reckson Rejects Icahn's Late Bid (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Reckson Associates Realty Corp. has rejected a late bid from financier Carl Icahn and will hold a shareholder vote tomorrow seeking approval for its planned merger with SL Green Realty Corp.

Reckson's board issued a statement late last night saying that Mr. Icahn's cash-and-stock offer "does not meet the standard set forth in the SL Green merger agreement to permit discussions or negotiations" with American Real Estate Partners LP, which is 90%-owned by Mr. Icahn.

DOJ_NMG_0102452

On Monday, Mr. Icahn faxed a letter to the independent board of Reckson, offering $1 billion in cash and $3.3 billion in a new class of stock in American Real Estate Partners, traded on the New York Stock Exchange. The proposal was considerably altered from his planned all-cash bid of $49 a share because he lost his two partners over the weekend.

The board's rejection of Mr. Icahn's proposal, by a vote of its independent directors last night, came even before Mr. Icahn issued his official bid, which he had said he would provide today to Reckson, a Uniondale, N.Y., real-estate investment trust.

The development is a victory for SL Green, of New York, another REIT, whose efforts to acquire Reckson hit a kink on Nov. 16 when Mr. Icahn and his then-partner, New York real-estate developer Harry Macklowe, jumped in with a surprise proposal. The partners announced they were willing to pay $4.6 billion for Reckson, trumping SL Green's $4.1 billion bid from Aug. 3. Reckson's directors began discussions with Messrs. Macklowe and Icahn, and last week it looked as if SL Green was losing ground when Mack-Cali Realty Corp., an Edison, N.J., REIT, was allowed to join the Icahn-Macklowe partnership. But over the weekend Mack-Cali and Mr. Macklowe both opted out, leaving Mr. Icahn alone in the bidding.

But the outcome is also surely a disappointment to many Reckson shareholders who had been excited about the considerably higher price originally proposed by Messrs. Icahn and Macklowe.

Mr. Macklowe wasn't available for comment. Mack-Cali said that after performing due diligence on Reckson's assets, it determined that bidding wasn't in the best interests of its shareholders. Mr. Icahn declined to discuss why his partners dropped out.

In his letter to Reckson, Mr. Icahn offered preferred units in American Real Estate Partners that would carry a 5% annual dividend and would be convertible for AREP units at the price of $104.50 per unit. Mr. Icahn's letter stated that, if the preferred units were valued at par, it would constitute a total consideration of $49 per share for Reckson -- his original proposed price. That would top a cash-and-stock SL Green bid that was valued at about $45.60 a share as of yesterday's close.

However, as soon as Mr. Icahn announced the proposal, some analysts immediately cast doubt on whether the offer would persuade Reckson to walk away from an agreement to be acquired by SL Green. The analysts said the newly created securities weren't as liquid as cash or common stock, making Mr. Icahn's bid difficult to value.

For Mr. Icahn "to come in at the 11th hour, with a bid that doesn't include the two local real-estate players and introduces a new security, it's going to make it tough for the board to go with that bid," said John Lutzius, chief executive of Green Street Advisors Inc., a Newport Beach, Calif., real-estate investment and trading firm.

And indeed by late last night, Reckson's statement from its independent directors was citing that very concern: "In making this determination, the Reckson board considered that there are substantial valuation issues associated with the securities being offered as part of the AREP proposal and that these securities could be valued at a substantial discount to par, which would reduce the proposal's economic value."

Earlier yesterday in an interview, Mr. Icahn had said that he was hopeful that Reckson would consider his bid, saying he believed traditional REIT investors would find the dividend on the preferred units attractive, and "if there's a question of liquidity, I think that will be taken care of once they are issued."

Both SL Green and Reckson had publicly questioned whether Mr. Icahn's bid was credible. But Mr. Icahn said he wanted to buy Reckson because it is a good value -- not to prove doubters wrong. "I didn't appreciate them saying that, but I don't make investment decisions of this magnitude based on just being a little miffed," he said.

To bolster his bid, Mr. Icahn had offered to immediately deposit $613 million into escrow if Reckson accepted his merger proposal, his letter states. That would have covered the $99.8 million breakup fee that would be owed to SL Green if Reckson went with another bidder. It also would have included a "good faith deposit" by Mr. Icahn that would be forfeited to Reckson if American Real Estate Partners didn't meet its merger-agreement obligations.

Reckson's shares fell $2.34, or 4.9%, to $45.75 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday; SL Green shares slipped 95 cents, or 0.7%, to $134 on the Big Board.

Gold Kist Accepts Pilgrim's Pride's Sweetened Bid (WSJ)

By Richard Gibson

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Gold Kist Inc.'s agreement to be acquired by Pilgrim's Pride Corp. for a sweetened $21-a-share bid ended a four-month standoff in a deal that would create the world's largest chicken processor.

Assuming the proposed transaction is completed, the combined company would leapfrog industry leader Tyson Foods Inc. as the largest processor of chicken. Tyson, which also processes beef and pork, would remain the world's largest meat company, with more than three times the annual sales.

The $1.1 billion offer was approved by Gold Kist's board Sunday after a weekend of negotiations over price. The accord came three days after the announcement that 67% of Gold Kist shareholders had tendered their stock despite repeated urgings from management that it was preferable to remain independent.

Shares of Pilgrim's Pride gained $2.52, or 9.9% to $27.90 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, while Gold Kist stock was up 90 cents, or 4.5%, to $20.87 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

In what Pilgrim's Pride executives called a "cordial" meeting in Dallas on Saturday and Sunday, Pilgrim's Pride sweetened its initial $20-a-share bid by $1, Gold Kist agreed to a takeover and Pilgrim's Pride was allowed to look at Gold Kist's nonpublic documents for the first time since it launched its unsolicited offer in August.

Rising grain prices, other competitive pressures and overseas concerns about avian flu have squeezed poultry processors in recent months. For the fiscal year ended Sept. 30, Pilgrim's Pride reported a net loss of $34.2 million, or 51 cents a share, on sales of $5.24 billion. Gold Kist reported a net loss for the year ended Oct. 1 of $17.7 million, or 35 cents a share, on sales of $2.13 billion.

To improve their results, both Pilgrim's Pride and Gold Kist have cut poultry production about 5% in recent months.

Combined annual sales of Pilgrim's Pride, based in Pittsburg, Texas, and Gold Kist, of Atlanta, would exceed $7.5 billion. Pilgrim's employs about 40,000 people and Gold Kist about 16,500, both primarily at facilities in the southeastern U.S.

Analysts estimated the acquisition would give Pilgrim's Pride a 27% share of the U.S. chicken market and put Tyson's share at 24%. Pilgrim's Pride Chief Executive O.B. Goolsby said that his company has "absolutely no intention of any plant closings" from the pending combination.

EU To Investigate Car Battery Merger (AP)

AP, December 5, 2006

EU to Investigate Merger in European Car Batteries Market

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- The European Union launched an antitrust investigation Monday into plans by German car battery maker VB Autobatterie to buy the car battery business of Italy's FIAMM group.

An initial review revealed "serious competition concerns," EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said in a statement.

Under EU rules, she has until April 23 to reach a final finding.

"When the largest producer of automotive starter batteries (in Europe) wants to acquire the third-largest manufacturer in an already highly concentrated market, the Commission must ensure that this would not adversely affect consumers," Kroes said.

VB and FIAMM make and market batteries for makers of cars, trucks and commercial vehicles as well as car parts and repair services. VB is a joint venture of Johnson Controls Inc. of Milwaukee and the German Robert Bosch GmbH, Europe's leading supplier of car starter batteries.

If VB buys FIAMM's battery business, the number of European suppliers would drop from three to two. Kroes said she also would examine any impact of the acquisition on the "independent aftermarket," which covers sales of replacement batteries.

Water War Brewing Along Mexico-California Border (AP)

By David Kravets

AP, December 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - The Bush administration urged a federal appeals court Monday to allow a section of a major canal separating California and Mexico to be lined with cement to stop millions of gallons of water from seeping south of the border each year.

The 82-mile-long All-American Canal, which gets life from the Colorado River, in part nourishes crops on both sides of the border about 100 miles east of San Diego along the Calexico-Mexicali border - where the lining is proposed. The U.S. government says Mexico already gets 489 billion gallons of Colorado River water legitimately each year under a 1944 treaty and isn't entitled to the seepage, which provides a farming lifeline in Mexico.

A Justice Department attorney, John Smeltzer, told a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that Mexicans have no right to the water, which is also the lifeblood for 500,000 acres of U.S. farmland.

The lining project will provide enough annual water for 135,000 new homes in the San Diego area.

DOJ_NMG_0102454

All three judges suggested while hearing oral arguments in the case Monday that people in Mexico might not have legal standing to assert a claim for the water in U.S. courts.

"How does a constitutional barrier against takings of property in the United States apply to somebody's property in Mexico?" Judge John Noonan asked.

The San Francisco-based appeals court temporarily blocked the $210 million, 23-mile-long lining construction project in August after Mexican business interests and U.S. environmental groups sued.

The lawsuit essentially claims that the Mexicans are entitled to the water. It says there would be a significant number of job losses on the Mexicali side of the Imperial Valley border as thousands of acres of crops would turn to dust, that Mexican wells would become polluted without the seepage and, among other things, migratory birds would be threatened if wetlands disappeared.

R. Gaylord Smith, an attorney for Consejo de Desarrollo Economico de Mexicali, a Mexican business group, argued that the U.S. has abandoned rights to the water.

Judge Sidney Thomas said the U.S. might have abandoned the water, but that doesn't mean "somebody else acquires it."

Malissa Hathaway, another attorney for the business group, said the societies of Mexicali in Mexico and adjacent Calexico on the U.S. side depend on one another, meaning the lining will affect the U.S.

"No one has looked at the economic effects of taking land out of production," she said.

Water consumption spurred by breakneck growth in Southern California prompted Western states to complain they weren't getting their share of Colorado River water. The dispute resulted in a water redistribution deal that included the lining project as California settled for less water.

Colorado River water first flowed to California's arid southeast in 1901 on the Alamo Canal, which dipped into Mexico. California farmers soon decided they needed a canal completely within the United States, leading to completion of the All-American in 1942.

Critics of the project say migrants may die crossing a lined canal because concrete will deprive desperate swimmers of tall grasses to grab. While the canal appears calm, migrants who cram onto inflatable rafts can be swept away by a fierce undercurrent.

The court did not indicate when it would rule.

The Mexican government is not a party to the case, but disapproved of the lining in court briefs.

The case is Consejo de Desarrollo Economico de Mexicali v. United States, 06-16345.

House To Vote On Senate's Offshore Drilling Plan (WP)

By Steven Mufson And Juliet Eilperin

Washington Post, December 5, 2006

The House is scheduled to vote today on a Senate plan for offshore oil and gas drilling that would open up new acreage in the Gulf of Mexico but that falls far short of an offshore drilling bill the House adopted earlier this year.

House Democratic leaders have decided not to take a position on the bill in order to avoid having to choose between different constituencies within the party's own ranks. Environmental groups oppose the drilling measure; the Sierra Club issued a statement saying that "it's time for Congress to stop appeasing Big Oil" and that "drilling is a bad deal for Americans."

Yet in the face of high energy prices, many Democrats support wider drilling to increase domestic natural gas supplies. And Louisiana Democrats avidly support the Senate bill because it would divert 37.5 percent of federal royalties to Gulf states for coastal restoration projects. Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) has been pushing especially hard for its passage.

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) opposes offshore drilling and is concerned about the loss of federal royalties, said spokeswoman Jennifer Crider. But Pelosi will not try to rally the Democratic caucus against the Senate bill.

Earlier this year, the House voted for an offshore drilling plan that would have opened the Atlantic and Pacific coastal waters to oil and gas drilling for the first time in a quarter-century. Senate leaders told House negotiators that there was no chance that approach could pass the Senate and that the House would have to go along with the Senate's version. House negotiators, led by outgoing House Resources Committee Chairman Richard W. Pombo (R-Calif.), resisted that compromise, but now key Republicans say they will accept the Senate version.

"What concerns me is that a month from now, when natural gas finds its way past $12 again, folks out there will be scratching their heads as to why we didn't pass a more comprehensive bill," Rep. John E. Peterson (R-Pa.) said in a statement.

The bill, which will be considered on an expedited basis, cannot be amended and requires the support of a two-thirds majority of the House.

DOJ_NMG_0102455

Separately, the White House confirmed on Saturday that President Bush is considering lifting a 17-year-old moratorium on offshore drilling near Alaska's Aleutian Islands. The area was put off limits to drilling after the Exxon Valdez oil tanker spill in 1989.

The area, which includes Bristol Bay, is home to the world's largest wild salmon run along with commercial fisheries for red king crab, pollock and cod. According to the Sierra Club, commercial, sport and sustenance fishing in the region harvests more than 25 million fish a year and contributes $300 million to the local economy.

In 2003, Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) persuaded Congress to remove protections for Bristol Bay, but it has remained off limits to drilling until 2012 under a directive by President Bill Clinton.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) said, "As the Republican Party prepares to relinquish control of the House and Senate, they are attempting a last-minute giveaway of public lands as an early Christmas present to the big oil companies."

Drew Malcomb, a Minerals Management Service spokesman, said, "The north Aleutian Basin area is currently part of the five-year oil and gas leasing plan, but no drilling could occur there unless the presidential withdrawal was removed."

A few dozen environmental and tribal groups active in Alaska wrote an "open letter" to Bush on Friday, urging him to protect Bristol Bay.

Eric Siy, executive director of the Alaska Marine Conservation Council, an advocacy group, said that many tribal communities depend on the area for subsistence fishing. For them, Siy said, drilling in Bristol Bay "is like burning the pews to heat the church."

Some US Cities Grapple With An Unusual Problem: Too Many Churches (CSM)

By Amy Green

The Christian Science Monitor, December 5, 2006

ORLANDO, FLA.

It's rush hour in southeast Orlando - Sunday rush hour, that is.

About a dozen churches are within a few miles of one another, and more are under construction. Neighbors venturing out for bagels and other errands find themselves stuck in traffic, heads bowed not in faith but frustration. Some complain that the traffic persists all week, as religious, youth, sports, and other activities draw crowds after work and school.

"It's ridiculous," says Pat DeLanger, an accountant who was about to climb into her car on a recent Sunday with her teen-age daughter after a service at St. Isaac Jogues Catholic Church. She lives less than a mile away, but expects her Sunday morning drive to stretch to 30 minutes once construction on another church across the street is complete. "We live right there. We probably could walk faster."

While communities traditionally zone against houses of ill-repute, not houses of worship, frustrations have grown since 2000, when then-President Clinton signed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act. The law doesn't exempt churches from zoning regulations, per se. But when religious groups say the rules would create "a substantial burden," officials must show a compelling reason for the limits. Sometimes, the results leave neighborhoods feeling helpless in the face of ecclesiastical development.

Across the country, local governments are challenging the law in court, says Marci Hamilton, a church-state scholar at Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University in New York. She believes the issue probably will reach the US Supreme Court.

"It's happening all over the country," Ms. Hamilton says. "I get an e-mail from a new neighborhood daily. It's unbelievable because of this law what religious entities are willing to impose on residential neighborhoods."

For their part, religious leaders say they are responding to growth in their communities by providing needed services. Growth among houses of worship - particularly megachurches - poses a delicate quandary for local leaders. In smaller communities, too many churches - because of their tax-exempt status - can even strain the economy.

The federal government exempts religious organizations from property taxes, but some cities have become creative in collecting money from churches, says Chris Hoene, research manager for the National League of Cities in Washington. For example, some have begun taxing religious organizations' profit-generating enterprises, such as publishing. Especially in communities that operate on small margins, a small change in the budget can mean a big difference.

"It's a growing concern, because ... the not-for-profit sector is continually noted as a fast-growing sector," Mr. Hoene says.

In Stafford, Texas, leaders decided that with 51 places of worship and only 300 acres left to develop, they had too many churches. This Houston suburb of 20,000 balloons on Sundays, since many of the worshippers commute from outside the community, says Mayor Leonard Scarcella. With no property tax, the city's budget was stretched. Leaders imposed new regulations that would subject anyone who wants to develop in Stafford to stricter review.

"We believe very strongly in God. If you want religion, you can get just about anything here," Mr. Scarcella says. "We don't have 51 of anything else.... We're looking into ways that we can maintain balance."

DOJ_NMG_0102456

Tensions can run especially high over land residents hope to preserve for agriculture or conservation purposes.

In Maryland's Montgomery County, leaders zoned 93,000 acres as an agricultural reserve in 1980. The zoning allowed churches, and there were about 60 scattered around, says Royce Hanson, chairman of the county planning board. More than a year ago, several megachurches sought to develop in the area.

Neighbors balked, and leaders rejected building plans that would have required their own water and sewer systems. Religious organizations haven't sued yet, Mr. Hanson says, but they're not happy with the decision. The plans were "out of character with the rural area," he says. "Those of us who want to preserve the agricultural reserve believe it was a good solution."

In southeast Orlando, Faith Assembly of God is paying the city impact fees of up to $1 million to build a new location to hold its 6,000 members, the Rev. Robb Hawks says. He says the argument that places of worship don't pay for their own development is a fallacy. His church will hold weeklong activities at its current location, and hold worship services in its new home, which will be located right across from another large church.

Neighbors are concerned that the roads can't handle the development, but Mr. Hawks offers no apology for his church's growth. It's a reflection of Orlando's rampant development, he says.

"I find it fascinating that people will move into a housing development ... and the first thing they want to do is stop any developments going in around them," Hawks says. "People come ... looking for community, and where do you find community?... They go looking for a church to not only fulfill their spiritual needs but their social needs as well."

Administration Tried To Cut Payouts To Nuke Workers (USAT)

By Peter Eisler

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration repeatedly sought ways to limit payouts to nuclear weapons workers sickened by radiation and toxic material, according to a memo written by congressional investigators and obtained by USA TODAY.

The investigation focuses on a federal program created in 2000 to compensate people with cancers and other illnesses tied to their work at government and contractor-owned facilities involved in Cold War nuclear weapons production. About 98,000 cases have been filed under the program, and the Labor Department has approved compensation in about 24,000 of those cases. However, program records show that not all of those approved claims have been paid.

Since 2002, “there is a continuous stream of (administration) communications … strategizing on minimizing payouts,” according to the Nov. 30 memo by staff for the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Border Security and Claims. The memo, prepared for the panel's chairman, Rep. John Hostettler, R-Ind., summarizes and quotes from thousands of pages of records reviewed by the subcommittee in its probe.

The subcommittee holds a hearing today on the investigation. Hostettler is pressing ahead despite losing re-election last month, vowing to release key documents and urging Democrats to continue the probe when they take over in 2007.

Administration officials say the memos reflect internal brainstorming on how to avoid compensating workers who aren't eligible.

“We're not pursuing those ideas,” says Shelby Hallmark, the Labor Department's director of workers' compensation programs. “What we've been doing all along is trying to ensure that the program is implemented in a way that is fair and consistent and in accord with the law.”

Hostettler was not available for comment, but he said at a November hearing that records reviewed in the investigation “do not support” the administration's stance. “This program was supposed to assure workers … (that) their government was finally going to do right by them,” he added. “Those tasked with implementing (it) have failed that purpose miserably, and they need to be exposed.”

The program covers workers from about 350 facilities nationwide, as well as uranium miners. Claimants can get up to $150,000; some also can get paid for medical bills, lost wages and disability.

In a memo from October 2005, program director Hallmark complains to White House officials that the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, which reviews some claims, is adopting “extreme exaggerations of (worker exposure) on the grounds that every decision point must be as ‘claimant favorable' as conceivably possible.” The documents also show officials debating ways to change the balance of a program oversight panel by adding members skeptical of workers' claims.

“You've got bureaucrats pressuring the scientists, and when they can't get what they want, they try to squeeze the (adjudication) process wherever they can,” says Richard Miller, a claimants' advocate with the Government Accountability Project. “These workers are dying with every day that goes by.”

Nuclear Power Revival Could Encounter Hurdles (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0102457

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration's plan for a "renaissance" in nuclear power may be crimped by tightening worldwide supplies of uranium and a lack of enrichment facilities to turn the uranium into fuel for power plants.

In a recent setback, an accident in October flooded the world's largest uranium mine, which was set to open in Canada next year. That nudged prices for processed uranium ore, already up more than 800% since 2001, even higher.

Meanwhile, enrichment facilities, which turn uranium into fuel for nuclear power plants, have already pledged their services because of growing interest in nuclear fuel by other countries. The result is that the U.S. is relying more than before on Russia, which provides about half the enriched nuclear fuel used in this country.

Uranium is extracted from mines and processed into a form called "yellowcake." The yellowcake, in turn, is processed at enrichment plants, into fuel for nuclear-power plants. A far more time-consuming process is required to turn yellowcake into fuel for nuclear weapons.

Spurred by President Bush, who for years has touted nuclear power as a clean, safe way to generate electricity, the owners of U.S. utilities have made plans for at least 30 new U.S. nuclear power plants.

The administration is calling its plan a "renaissance," as it would revive a domestic industry that has been dormant for decades. The most recent time a utility ordered a new nuclear power plant in the U.S. was 1973.

Spurring the renaissance isn't just the tax breaks the administration is offering for the first six plants. Some utilities also are looking to nuclear power because of the soaring prices of natural gas and the prospect of controls on fossil-fuel generated power. Possible climate-change legislation wouldn't affect nuclear power, which doesn't generate the same pollutants.

However, the "Ad Hoc Utility Group," an industry collective that represents 85% of the utilities involved in producing nuclear power is nervous about securing adequate fuel supplies for nuclear power plants over the next 10 years. The group is lobbying the administration to allow Russia to sell enriched fuel directly to U.S. utilities.

That effort is opposed by USEC Inc., the Bethesda, Md., company that acts as the U.S. agent for Russian enriched fuel under a 1993 agreement that requires Russia to supply $12 billion of enriched uranium derived from its nuclear weapons to the U.S. USEC opposes the introduction of more Russian fuel, arguing that it could interfere with its plans to finance and build a new enrichment plant in the U.S.

The supply situation with uranium and enrichment facilities will be discussed today at an international gathering of nuclear power experts here. One speaker, Thomas L. Neff, a senior researcher at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, says the supply issues mean that "it will take heroic efforts to fuel the expected growth in nuclear power by 2015. Under the most positive assumptions you might just get there. But they may not pan out."

Mr. Neff, who has followed the nuclear fuel market for 30 years, blames the tightening uranium supply on a failure to open mines in the U.S. and elsewhere. Between 1987 and 2001, he says, stockpiles of processed uranium were "sold off really cheap." Some hedge funds, he adds, are exacerbating the situation by buying and holding uranium off the market in an effort to reap profits later.

The accident at the Canadian mine highlights the supply problem. In October, the ceiling of the nearly completed mine, located in Saskatchewan, collapsed and let in a flood of water. The mine's owner, Cameco Corp., says the mishap will delay completion for as long as three years. The mine could eventually supply 17% of the world's uranium demand, Cameco says.

The dwindling supply of uranium enrichment plants began after two U.S. facilities, built after World War II, shut down, leaving power-plant owners more dependent on the Russians. Natural uranium has less than 1% of the unstable isotope U-235, which must be concentrated to a level of 4% to 5% to make fuel for nuclear power plants. The concentration required to make nuclear weapons is closer to 90%. The concentration is done through a complex sifting process called enrichment.

USEC plans to build a $2 billion enrichment facility near Piketon, Ohio, scheduled to open around 2009, but it still must obtain the financing -- a concern for utility-plant owners who need an assured supply of fuel. The plant will use a type of high-speed centrifuges that haven't been commercially proven in the U.S. Currently USEC operates a plant near Paducah, Ky., built in the 1950s. "If anything happens to that, where do you go?" asks Jim Tramuto, a vice president of PG&E Corp., a San Francisco utility, and a leader of the Ad Hoc Utility Group.

"You want to have as many suppliers in the market as you can have," adds Mr. Tramuto, noting that most non-Russian suppliers already have promised their supplies of enriched uranium to buyers.

The Russians say they could supply more enriched uranium to the U.S., but they are blocked by an agreement with the Commerce Department that restricts their imports to the current levels managed by USEC. While the Russians have some additional near-term capacity, they say they will cut shipments to the U.S. in half after 2013, when the current agreement to use fuel derived from nuclear weapons ends.

DOJ_NMG_0102458

"We're having our own nuclear renaissance," says Vladimir I. Rybachenkov, a counselor at the Russian embassy in Washington. He notes Russia recently announced plans to increase its use of nuclear power to generate electricity to 25% from 15%, which means it will need more of its uranium and enrichment facilities.

Still, Mr. Rybachenkov says, Russia is willing to help the U.S. if the limits on its near-term imports of enriched fuel are lifted. "If nothing happens by 2013, there will be a black hole in deliveries of enriched fuel for the U.S. from Russia," he predicts.

Clay Sell, deputy secretary of the U.S. Department of Energy and an architect of U.S. plans for more use of nuclear power, admits that there are near-term problems with both uranium and enrichment services, but adds: "We think it can all be managed."

His department is circulating a draft plan among U.S. power-plant owners that suggests that more enriched uranium fuel could be provided by "blending down" highly enriched uranium from retired U.S. nuclear warheads and by reprocessing uranium tails, or wastes from the process of enriching uranium for U.S. nuclear weapons.

"The higher uranium prices go, the more these tails look like money instead of trash," Mr. Sell says.

Getting more fuel from U.S. enrichment wastes, however, might require the Russians to enrich them, another option under discussion. Mr. Sell says the future U.S. supply picture may not be as bleak as the "black hole" described by Mr. Rybachenkov. "You've got to understand that a lot of what they're saying right now has to do with bargaining," he noted.

Media climate

Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican and chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, will hold a full committee hearing tomorrow on "Climate Change and the Media."

The hearing will look at how the media has presented scientific evidence regarding predictions of human-caused catastrophic global warming, the senator's office said.

"Senator Inhofe believes that poorly conceived policy decisions will result from the media's nonstop hyping of 'extreme scenarios' and dire climate predictions," said committee Communications Director Marc Morano. "This hearing will serve to advance the interests of sound science and encourage rational policy decisions."

Among those who are scheduled to testify at the hearing are geologist David Deming of the University of Oklahoma; paleoclimate researcher Bob Carter of Australia's James Cook University; Dan Gainor of the Business & Media Institute; Naomi Oreskes of the University of California at San Diego and professor Daniel Schrag of Harvard University.

The hearing will be held at 9:30 a.m. in 406 Dirksen Senate Office Building. It can be watched live on the Internet at http://epw.senate.gov/epwmultimedia/epwmultimedia.htm.

Brownback's step

Republican Sen. Sam Brownback said yesterday he is taking the first step toward a bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

A vigorous abortion opponent, the Kansas senator pledged to make "issues of life," fiscal restraint and tax reform key components of his effort to woo supporters.

"I have decided, after much prayerful consideration, to consider a bid for the Republican nomination for the presidency," Mr. Brownback said. "There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture, and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion."

Mr. Brownback said he has formed a presidential exploratory committee, which will allow him to travel the country and raise money while gauging support for the Republican nomination, the Associated Press reports.

Thomas returns

Sen. Craig Thomas returned to work yesterday, about a month earlier than originally planned, after undergoing treatment for leukemia.

"I'm glad to be back," the Wyoming Republican told the Associated Press in a telephone interview from his office in Washington.

Mr. Thomas, 73, was released Saturday from Bethesda National Naval Medical Center. He began treatment for leukemia on Nov. 9.

He had said previously he didn't expect to return to the Senate until January.

Mr. Thomas won re-election last month to a third term while he was in the hospital, easily beating Democrat Dale Groutage with 70 percent of the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0102459

Mr. Thomas said he continues taking medication and undergoing tests. "I think I'm through with the major treatment," he said.

The senator was diagnosed with acute myeloid leukemia, the most common form the cancer of the blood and bone marrow.

Dr. Brian Monahan, director of Hematology and Medical Oncology at the National Naval Medical Center, has said that most people with Mr. Thomas' physical condition and general health survive the cancer.

Amazing letter

"Washington has no shortage of bullies, but even we can't quite believe an October 27 letter that Sens. Jay Rockefeller and Olympia Snowe sent to ExxonMobil CEO Rex Tillerson. Its message: Start toeing the senators' line on climate change, or else," the Wall Street Journal says in an editorial.

The letter's essential point, the newspaper said, "is that the two senators believe global warming is a fact, and therefore all debate about the issue must stop and ExxonMobil should 'end its dangerous support of the [global warming] "deniers." ' Not only that, the company 'should repudiate its climate change denial campaign and make public its funding history.' And in extra penance for being 'one of the world's largest carbon emitters,' Exxon should spend that money on 'global remediation efforts.'

"The senators aren't dumb enough to risk an ethics inquiry by threatening specific consequences if Mr. Tillerson declines this offer he can't refuse. But in case the CEO doesn't understand his company's jeopardy, they add that 'ExxonMobil and its partners in denial have manufactured controversy, sown doubt, and impeded progress with strategies all-too-reminiscent of those used by the tobacco industry for so many years.' (Our emphasis.) The senators also graciously copied the Exxon board on their missive.

"This is amazing stuff. On the one hand, the senators say that everyone agrees on the facts and consequences of climate change. But at the same time they are so afraid of debate that they want Exxon to stop financing a doughty band of dissenters who can barely get their name in the paper. We respect the folks at the Competitive Enterprise Institute, but we didn't know until reading the Rockefeller-Snowe letter that they ran U.S. climate policy and led the mainstream media around by the nose, too. Congratulations."

Sebelius chosen

Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius will assume the chairmanship of the Democratic Governors' Association next year as the party enjoys its first gubernatorial majority in 12 years, officials said yesterday.

Mrs. Sebelius, who was elected to a second term last month, will succeed New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, said the officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to avoid upstaging an official announcement tomorrow.

Mrs. Sebelius, 58, prevailed in her Republican-leaning state with 58 percent of the vote on Nov. 7. Her vice chairman will be West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin III, who was elected in 2004, the Associated Press reports.

Civil rights award

The Congress of Racial Equality, one of the nation's oldest civil rights groups, has announced it will present an achievement award to Bishop Robert Morlino of the Catholic Diocese of Madison, Wis.

The award recognizes Bishop Morlino for exercising his free speech and religious free-exercise rights in the face of intense pressure designed to silence him -- and thereby chill the rights of others -- in the weeks preceding the recent marriage state constitutional amendment vote in Wisconsin. Bishop Morlino was targeted because he was the most visible proponent of the amendment measure banning same-sex "marriage" in Wisconsin, the group said.

For years, those seeking to invalidate America's marriage laws in court have attempted to advance their cause by invoking analogies to civil rights, the group said. This award is the first time that a major civil rights organization has publicly acknowledged the reality that the basic civil liberties of groups and individuals in America who believe in the protection of marriage are increasingly being challenged.

The award ceremony will take place Friday afternoon at St. Patrick's Cathedral in Madison.

Crude Awakening As Alternative Energy Heats Up, Environmental Concerns Grow (WSJ)

By Patrick Barta And Jane Spencer

Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

PONTIANAK, Indonesia -- Investors are pouring billions of dollars into "renewable" energy sources such as ethanol, biodiesel and solar power that promise to reduce the world's reliance on petroleum. But exploiting these alternatives may produce unintended environmental and economic consequences that offset the expected benefits.

Here on the island of Borneo, a thick haze often encloses this city of 500,000 people. The cause: forest fires that have blazed across the island. Many of them were set to clear land to produce palm oil -- a key ingredient in biodiesel, a clean-burning diesel fuel alternative.

The bluish smoke is at times so dense that it leaves the city dark and gloomy even at midday. The haze has sometimes closed Pontianak's airport and prompted local volunteers to distribute face-masks on city streets. From July through mid-October, Indonesian health officials reported 28,762 smog-related cases of respiratory illness across the country.

"I feel it in my breath when I breathe," said Imanuel Patasik, a 26-year-old delivery man, as he sat in one of Pontianak's many open-air coffee shops on a recent evening. When the smoke is really bad, he wears a mask to work, but still wakes up the next morning feeling sick. "It's part of life here," he sighed.

Seasonal rains have helped quell the fires over the past few weeks. But the miasma of smoke from Borneo and the island of Sumatra -- an annual phenomenon that blankets large parts of Southeast Asia in smog -- underscores a troubling dark side of the world's alternative-energy boom. Among other problems, the fires in Indonesia spew millions of tons of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, experts say. In doing so, they exacerbate the very global-warming concerns biofuels are meant to alleviate.

Such side effects are not an isolated problem. In Indonesia, Malaysia, Canada and elsewhere, forests are being slashed for new energy-yielding crops or other unconventional fuels. In India, environmental activists say, water tables are dropping as farmers try to boost production of ethanol-yielding sugar.

"Let's be brutally frank: [The push for alternative fuels] is going to cause significant changes for the environment," says Sean Darby, an equities analyst and expert on alternative energy companies at Nomura International in Hong Kong. He is most worried about the strain on water resources caused by accelerated crop production. Water, he says, is "just as precious" as oil.

Some experts are also concerned that crops for biofuels will compete with other farmland, possibly driving up global costs of basic food production.

It's not clear how serious these problems will become -- or whether they eventually will be resolved through new technologies and stricter environmental measures. Proponents of alternative energy, including some palm oil industry executives, say the dangers are exaggerated and are outweighed by the benefits new fuels promise.

"We're unfairly targeted," says M.R. Chandran, former chief executive of the Malaysian Palm Oil Association. He contends that the timber industry and local farmers are much to blame for destroying Indonesia's forests.

The alternative energy field "is almost like the Internet in terms of the pace of how fast all this is changing," says Chris Flavin, president of Worldwatch Institute, an environmental organization. He believes that new technologies could help resolve some concerns over collateral damage. One of the hottest, for example, is called cellulosic ethanol, which uses different kinds of waste -- including municipal garbage -- to create fuel.

In the U.S., questions about corn-based ethanol are swirling in academic and agricultural circles, in part because of the work of a Cornell University professor. David Pimentel, who teaches environmental policy, has long held doubts about the fuel's value. He argues that expanding corn production for biofuels would deplete water resources and pollute soils with added fertilizer and chemicals. It would also require huge volumes of traditional energy for farming equipment and ethanol-conversion facilities -- a toll that could nullify gains from the less-polluting fuel produced.

Other studies, including reports by researchers at the U.S. Department of Agriculture, have reached much more optimistic conclusions and have criticized Mr. Pimentel's methodology.

Big Implications for Business

Critiques of alternative energy -- even if they prove to be exaggerated -- could have big implications for business. Last year, investors globally poured a record $49 billion into energies such as solar power, ethanol and biodiesel, according to New Energy Finance, a London-based firm that specializes in analyzing renewable energies. That was a 60% increase from the previous year.

But commercializing many alternative fuels relies on political support in the form of government subsidies or tax incentives. So the rise of local resistance could jeopardize the new fuels' economic viability.

This is particularly true for palm oil, a once-mundane commodity whose price has climbed about 31% so far this year. The spike is partly attributable to demand for biofuels.

In October, a European Parliament committee recommended a ban on all biofuel made from palm oil, citing fears that the crop encourages deforestation in tropical countries. In Indonesia, activists helped block an $8 billion Chinese-backed project that would have created one of the world's largest palm-oil plantations.

And last month, one of Britain's largest power companies, RWE npower, a subsidiary of the German power giant RWE AG, said it would abandon a project that was to use several hundred thousand tons of palm oil a year to generate power. An environmental group, Friends of the Earth, had complained that the project would contribute to unsustainable global demand for palm oil, contributing to rain-forest destruction in South East Asia. RWE npower said it dropped the project because it couldn't secure an adequate supply of sustainably grown palm oil.

Most consumers still think of palm oil mainly as a source of cooking oil. The oil is squeezed from bunches of red fruit that grow on oil palms, primarily in Malaysia and Indonesia. But the oil can also be processed to make fuel. Then it's mixed with conventional diesel to form a hybrid energy source -- for instance, 80% regular diesel and 20% biofuel -- that can be pumped directly into fuel tanks.

Biodiesel offers lots of upsides. Renewable crops such as palm oil reduce the need for fossil fuels such as petroleum whose supplies are finite. It also burns more cleanly than carbon-based liquid fuel, releasing fewer of the gases thought to cause global warming.

As oil prices have surged, a number of companies, including Chevron Corp., have announced plans to build or invest in biodiesel plants. In a recent report, Credit Suisse analysts said there's enough refining capacity under development to produce as much as 20 million metric tons of fuel annually by late 2008. That capacity, more than twice that of today's levels, would "easily soak up" all the world's available palm oil -- creating even more demand for plantations.

Indonesian authorities hope to capitalize on such demand to bring economic growth to impoverished regions. The government is offering low-interest loans for plantation companies, with a goal of adding 3.7 million acres of new plantations over the next five years, an area more than half the size of New Hampshire. Officials maintain this can be done on designated land areas without causing widespread environmental damage.

Different Outcome

But what's happening on the ground in Borneo suggests a different outcome. Among the world's most fabled islands, Borneo -- which is divided between Indonesia and Malaysia -- is considered by environmentalists to be one of the last great tropical wildernesses. It's home to rare and unusual species, including the wild orangutan, the clouded leopard and the Sumatran rhinoceros.

It's also home to some of the world's last headhunters. The indigenous Dayaks resurrected the grisly practice as recently as the late 1990s in interethnic clashes. Some Dayaks still live in villages that can only be reached by river, and sleep in wooden "longhouse" buildings on stilts.

In the 1800s, Dutch and British traders began carving up parts of the island to produce rubber and other commodities. Later, Malaysian and Indonesian timber barons devastated millions of acres of forest logging tropical hardwoods. Today, only a little more than half of Borneo's once-ubiquitous forest cover remains, according to WWF, the global conservation organization.

Now, the palm-oil boom threatens what's left. In West Kalimantan, a province along the western coast, the palms cover about 988,000 acres or more, up from less than 37,000 acres in 1984. Fleets of orange and mustard-colored trucks ply the province's few paved roads, ferrying the oil to river ports.

The plantations have meant jobs and opportunities for many Dayak families. Some have even taken ownership stakes in the operations.

As residents are discovering, though, the spreading plantations have deleterious effects. They can alter water-catchment areas, destroy animal habitats and contribute to the months-long bouts of haze that spreads hundreds of kilometers across Southeast Asia.

As fires burn deep into the dry peat soil beneath Indonesia's forests, centuries of carbon trapped in the biomass are released into the atmosphere. A study presented last month at a U.N. Climate Change Conference in Nairobi showed that Indonesia is the world's third-biggest carbon emitter behind the U.S. and China, when emissions from fires and other factors are considered.

"Stopping these fires could be one way of getting rid of some significant carbon emissions to the atmosphere," says Susan Page, a senior lecturer at Britain's University of Leicester who studies carbon emissions in Southeast Asia.

To be sure, palm-oil plantations aren't the only cause of deforestation and smoke on Borneo. Loggers have degraded huge swathes of forest. And indigenous residents have long practiced their own form of slash-and-burn agriculture that involves setting fires to clear fields for planting.

But Indonesian environmental officials say plantation companies are exacerbating the problem, and some palm-oil executives concede their industry is partly to blame. Often, companies hack down the trees, leaving behind a mass of debris that must be removed before they can plant oil palms. The cheapest and easiest way is simply to torch it.

One new oil-palm plantation, four hours by dirt road from Pontianak, offers a glimpse of the fallout from the flames.

The plantation stretches across some 2,740 acres and features a series of blackened and largely bare hills. Charred stumps stick up from the soil and blistered tree trunks litter the ground. In the distance, a wall of misty jungle marks the border of the property.

Villagers nearby say smoke and flames from fires at the site destroyed fruit and rubber trees on which they relied. They also made many people in the area sick. One villager began acting like he was possessed and was placed in a cage where he remained for weeks, the village chief says.

DOJ_NMG_0102462

Nearby, on a ridge overlooking the property, a man in a floppy sun hat who identifies himself as the plantation manager says he didn't know who started the fires. "We are one of the victims," says the man, Kong Tamcheng.

Mr. Kong says his employer, an Indonesian company called Incasi Raya Group, has a strict no-burning policy. He suggests the fire might have been started by a careless worker flicking cigarette butts, or by "interested parties" out to "smear" the company's reputation.

But Untad Dharmawan, director of environmental impact assessment for West Kalimantan, says Indonesian authorities are investigating nine palm-oil companies for illegal burning, including Incasi Raya Group and its manager, Mr. Kong. He displays a dossier of photos of the Incasi Raya site, adding that his department has witnesses with evidence the company started the fires.

Phone calls to Incasi Raya's office in Padang, Indonesia went unanswered.

Indonesian officials say they're doing the best they can to fight the fires and prevent illegal forest-clearing. Among other tactics, they hired two giant Russian planes to drop "water bombs" and launched projects to hand out water pumps to local villagers.

But they're hamstrung by tight budgets and the logistical difficulties of policing such a vast area with few roads. At best, "we can just minimize the spread" of fires, laments Mr. Dharmawan, the provincial environmental official.

Palm-oil companies, meanwhile, have joined with environment organizations, energy companies and others to set up a group known as the Roundtable on Sustainable Palm Oil that plans to certify plantation companies that follow guidelines to minimize ecological damage.

Back in Borneo, Tony Hartono, head of a local plantation association in West Kalimantan, says he still believes biodiesel derived from palm oil will play a big role in solving the world's energy problems. After all, "it's a renewable energy," he says. "It's our future."

Signs Of Energy (NYT)

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

It seemed to take forever, but the Bush administration has finally agreed to a strict timetable for establishing new energy efficiency standards for nearly two dozen commercial and residential appliances over the next five years. The agreement is good news for the environment. It is also a tribute to the persistence of 15 states, the Natural Resources Defense Council and various consumer groups that sued the Energy Department for failing to comply with longstanding Congressional mandates.

By some estimates, the new standards — covering items like dishwashers, ovens, clothes dryers, and heating and air-conditioning systems — could eventually save the amount of energy used by 12 million households, eliminate the need to build dozens of power plants and significantly cut emissions of carbon dioxide, the main global warming gas.

Congress ordered the Energy Department to make periodic updates in efficiency standards for appliances as part of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act of 1975. The Clinton administration strengthened standards for 10 appliances. But no new standards have been issued since 2001. In 2004, under pressure from manufacturers, the Bush administration actually tried to weaken standards for commercial air-conditioners, only to be rebuked by the courts.

In some cases, the technology already exists to meet stronger standards; the trick is to get manufacturers to incorporate them across the board. In other cases, the new standards would drive technology forward. The benefits are obvious, and Samuel Bodman, in his second year as secretary of energy, is to be commended for recognizing them.

FBI Computer System Faces Funding Gap (NSDY/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

Long Island Newsday, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The FBI faces a $56.7 million funding gap as it builds a new computer system to replace a problem-riddled database of investigation files, Justice Department auditors said Monday.

With careful oversight, the Sentinel program still could be successful, auditors from the department's inspector general's office concluded. Even so, the Bush administration's funding request for this year's share of the $425 million system, set for completion in 2009, falls short of what the bureau said it needs keep it on track.

The FBI asked for an estimated $150 million in the fiscal year that began Oct. 1; the White House approved spending $100 million. Congress is not expected to approve the FBI's funding until next year.

A 112-page audit of the Sentinel system's progress "found that the FBI faces uncertainty" over how to meet the funding needs to continue building it.

DOJ_NMG_0102463

Although the FBI expects to have about $50 million left over from earlier work on Sentinel and other bureau projects, auditors warned that pulling money from other programs "may have an adverse affect on the FBI's mission capabilities," the auditors said.

Responding, the FBI in a statement said the money needed "has long been identified from existing FBI balances, and will not impact operational programs."

The total cost for the computer program remains the same, the statement noted, adding that "at this time, Sentinel is within cost and schedule."

The funding concerns over Sentinel follow the FBI's decision last year to scrap a botched $170 million project to build a paperless case management system. FBI Director Robert Mueller abandoned the project, called Virtual Case File, after consultants said it was obsolete and riddled with problems.

Incoming Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., questioning whether the funding gap would bring cuts to the FBI's counterterrorism programs, said "mismanagement of this project seems to know no bounds."

"I remain seriously concerned about the handling of this project," Leahy said. "The American people cannot afford another fiasco."

Mueller is set to testify Wednesday at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on FBI oversight.

Sentinel is being built by Lockheed Martin contractors in four phases. Its designers currently are building an electronic records repository and a security network to limit its access.

FBI Computer Funding Is Uncertain (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

The Justice Department's inspector general warned yesterday that funding for the FBI's new Sentinel computer system is uncertain and that the program's final price tag could exceed its $425 million budget.

A 112-page audit by Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said that a current White House budget request includes only $100 million for Sentinel in fiscal 2007, although the FBI says it needs $57 million more to keep it going.

The FBI plans to make up the difference with leftover funds from other areas, but the audit warns that moving too much money "could erode the FBI's mission capability in counterterrorism, cybercrime and other important operational areas." Congress has yet to act on a budget for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1.

Sentinel is designed to give agents the ability to manage case files from computers at their desks. The audit is the second in a series of planned reviews by Fine's office; it warned in March that the FBI was at risk of repeating many of the same mistakes with Sentinel that it made with a failed attempt to build a computerized case management system, the Virtual Case File (VCF), to replace the FBI's antiquated paper-based system. VCF was abandoned in 2005 after costing the government $170 million.

Previous audits and reviews found that the FBI did a poor job of overseeing and managing VCF, and that the main contractor delivered a product that was incomplete and unusable.

In contrast to VCF, which was built from scratch, Sentinel will rely primarily on off-the-shelf commercial software adapted for the FBI. Lockheed Martin Corp. is slated to receive $305 million as the main contractor on the project, which is supposed to be begin operating by 2009.

Yesterday's audit also raised questions about the assumptions underlying the FBI's overall cost estimate, which is based on rough calculations and does not include $25 million in related improvements.

The FBI said in a statement that the extra money needed for the current fiscal year "has long been identified from existing FBI balances and will not impact operational programs." The bureau played down concerns about Sentinel's cost, saying the project "is within cost and schedule."

The newest report says the FBI has made "significant progress" in several key areas, including improving management controls and finding ways to ensure that the software will work as intended.

Fine made five specific recommendations to overcome various problems. FBI officials said they agreed with the ideas and had begun implementing them.

F.B.I. Overhaul Of Computers Is Facing A Gap Of $57 Million (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — The latest effort to overhaul the Federal Bureau of Investigation's antiquated computer system, still in its early stages, is already coming up short by $57 million, a Justice Department audit report concluded Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0102464

The budget gap could force the F.B.I. to take money from law enforcement and other areas, the report by the Justice Department inspector general's office determined. It concluded that while the bureau had taken steps in the management of the project that provided a "reasonable assurance" of success, crucial financing and operational questions lingered.

The F.B.I. has struggled for more than a decade to modernize its computer systems and replace a record-keeping system that is still largely paper-driven — a task considered critical to strengthening antiterrorism operations. Widespread design and management problems last year forced the bureau to scrap the final phase of its case-automation system, known as Trilogy, after spending $170 million on the project.

Democrats said they planned to press Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., about the computer project when he appears before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday.

"After watching the F.B.I. waste five years and more than 170 million of taxpayer dollars on the Trilogy program, I remain seriously concerned about the handling of this project," Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who will take over next month as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said Monday.

"The American people cannot afford another fiasco," Mr. Leahy said.

The findings by the inspector general came in the first status report that office has issued since March when the F.B.I. awarded the latest version of the project to Lockheed Martin. The company's part of the project, known as Sentinel, has an estimated value of $305 million.

For the current fiscal year, the Bush administration has sought $100 million for the Sentinel project, a request still pending in Congress. But the F.B.I. estimates that it actually needs $56.7 million more this year, the inspector general found.

The F.B.I. said in a statement on Monday that "the balance of $57 million has long been identified from existing F.B.I. balances, and will not impact operational programs." It said that "characterizations to the contrary are misleading."

The inspector general's report noted that the Sentinel project was still in its early stages, with the most difficult portions ahead. Nonetheless, it offered a somewhat more optimistic assessment than in the past.

"We believe that the processes the F.B.I. has established to manage and control the Sentinel project if implemented and carefully followed as Sentinel develops can provide reasonable assurance that Sentinel can be successful and that any deviations from cost, schedule, technical or performance baselines can be identified," it said.

In its formal response as part of the report, the F.B.I. said it welcomed the inspector general's findings and would be adopting all of the report's budget, management and staffing recommendations in an effort to keep the computer project on track.

Funding May Be A Sticking Point For FBI Tech Upgrade (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, December 5, 2006

The FBI is exercising more control over its $425 million information technology modernization effort than it did over the project's predecessor, but funding remains uncertain, according to an audit released Monday.

The FBI has made "significant progress" in addressing many initial concerns about the development of the case management system dubbed Sentinel, the Justice Department inspector general's office stated in the audit.

For instance, the FBI has made strides in staffing the project's program management office, auditors said. An October Government Accountability Office review found that the bureau had not properly analyzed its staffing needs.

But uncertainty about funding and cost estimates, and deficient contingency planning, must be addressed if the law enforcement agency is to avoid delays and other problems developing Sentinel, the IG report stated. This is particularly important as the project enters a high-risk second development phase in early 2007, it noted.

The FBI's fiscal 2007 budget request included $100 million for Sentinel, but an additional $56.7 million is needed to bridge the gap between requested funds and the program's requirements, the report stated.

According to the IG, about $50 million remains from the first phase of Sentinel and unspent balances in other accounts. But if the fiscal 2007 appropriation is less than the $100 million requested, reprogramming of other agency funds may be required to keep the project on track, the report stated. Reprogramming could diminish the agency's abilities in counterterrorism and cybercrime, the auditors said.

In a statement on the report, Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said, "I remain seriously concerned about the handling of this project. The American people cannot afford another fiasco."

"Bush administration mismanagement of this project seems to know no bounds," Leahy said.

FBI Director Robert Mueller is scheduled to testify before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday.

Sentinel, a six-year effort to replace the failed Virtual Case File project, is intended to upgrade the FBI's old-fashioned paper-based system for managing investigations and information. Lockheed Martin Corp. won a $57 million task order in March to work on the first stage of the program, with options to earn $248 million for three additional phases.

Costs associated with Sentinel, such as changes to the FBI's National Name Check Program, security costs and employee salaries, were not included in the $425 million estimate for the project's overall costs, the report stated. Auditors estimated that more than $25 million in associated costs are not included in the FBI's estimate. An independent estimate of the project's price tag found that it could range from $329 million to $493 million, and would most likely fall at $438 million.

The IG recommended that the FBI update the project's estimated total cost as actual cost data becomes available, develop contingency plans for identified risks to the project and fill all vacancies in the program management office.

In a response to the report, the FBI agreed with all of the IG's recommendations.

Mollohan, Under FBI Probe, Is Poised To Control Bureau's Budget (BLOOM)

By Brian Faler And Michael Forsythe

Bloomberg, December 5, 2006

Dec. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Representative Alan Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat whose finances are being investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, is in line to take over the House panel that sets the bureau's budget.

Mollohan, 63, is the ranking Democrat on the appropriations subcommittee overseeing the Department of Justice, which includes the FBI. His party has a long-standing practice of awarding appropriations subcommittee chairmanships to senior members, and no other Democrat has announced plans to seek the post when the party assumes control of Congress next month.

The pending appointment poses an ethical dilemma for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, 66, who helped her party take control of Congress for the first time in 12 years by vowing to clean up a ``culture of corruption'' on Capitol Hill.

``If the Democrats want to be taken seriously as the party of ethics reform, then every time one of their members gets into trouble, they're going to have to take it seriously,'' said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington. Her organization is urging Mollohan to recuse himself from any decisions affecting the FBI's budget.

A spokesman for Pelosi, a California Democrat, didn't respond to repeated requests for a comment. Mollohan's office and the Justice Department declined to comment.

Net Worth

Earlier this year, the National Legal and Policy Center, a Falls Church, Virginia-based group that backs smaller government, filed a complaint with the department questioning an increase in Mollohan's net worth. For 2005, Mollohan and his wife reported assets worth $6.8 million to $25.7 million, up from $116,000 to $315,000 in 1999, when he restated financial disclosure forms after the group's complaint.

In May, Mollohan told the Washington Post that the FBI had subpoenaed a Washington-based real-estate company in which he had invested. In April, a nonprofit group set up under Mollohan's leadership, the Vandalia Heritage Foundation, said in a statement that it had been told by the FBI to expect a request for information.

Fairmont, West Virginia-based Vandalia and at least three other nonprofits have benefited from ``earmarks,'' specific projects inserted by lawmakers into spending measures, that Mollohan secured. Mollohan, in turn, received campaign donations and gifts to his family charity from the nonprofits or their employees, according to Federal Election Commission records.

Mollohan, who hasn't been charged with any crime, said in a June statement that his increase in net worth was a result of prudent real-estate investments.

A Rising Market

``We received a sizable inheritance, took on considerable financial risks and had the good fortune to be investing in a rising real-estate market,'' Mollohan said in the statement.

Mollohan stepped down in April from the House Ethics Committee in the wake of the investigation. He remained the ranking Democrat on the appropriations subcommittee, which also has jurisdiction over the Departments of State and Commerce.

Ken Boehm, chairman of the National Legal and Policy Center, urged Democrats to remove Mollohan from the appropriations committee and said appointing him chairman would represent a conflict of interest.

``Somebody who is under investigation should have no leverage over those investigating him, for reasons that are blindingly obvious,'' Boehm said. ``You can't have it both ways if in fact there's going to be a serious effort to root out what's called the `culture of corruption.'''

Backing Murtha

Mollohan's case is the third nettlesome personnel issue to face Pelosi since Democrats won control of Congress in the Nov. 7 midterm elections. Democrats rejected her preferred candidate for the No. 2 leadership job, Pennsylvania Representative John Murtha, in favor of Maryland Democrat Steny Hoyer amid complaints that Murtha had used his position on the defense appropriations subcommittee to direct federal dollars to political donors.

Pelosi later considered naming Representative Alcee Hastings of Florida, a former federal judge who had been impeached and removed from office, as head of the House Intelligence Committee. She ultimately named Silvestre Reyes of Texas to the job.

Drug Dealer Pleads Guilty In Cocaine Case Involving Mayor (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, December 5, 2006

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. (AP) _ A former member of the Bridgeport Democratic Town Committee pleaded guilty Monday to federal cocaine charges, avoiding a trial that could have put pressure on Mayor John Fabrizi to testify.

Shawn Fardy, 36, convicted of conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute, and distribution of cocaine, admitted buying cocaine from drug dealer Juan Marrero and then distributing some of that to others and keeping some for his own use. Marrero pleaded guilty in September.

Fabrizi admitted in June that he had used cocaine while he was in office and was getting treatment.

Fardy's attorney, Francis O'Reilly, has said prosecutors were relying on allegations that Fabrizi made against Fardy. Fabrizi met with the FBI at least twice and gave lengthy interviews that are contained in FBI reports, O'Reilly said.

Prosecutors have declined to comment on whether Fabrizi would be a government witness, but his name was among 41 people whose names may be mentioned during the trial or who may testify.

Jury selection was scheduled to start Tuesday. The trial was moved to New Haven after a judge found most prospective jurors were aware of the high profile case.

Fardy faces up to 20 years in prison and fines of $1 million when he is sentenced on Feb. 22.

Defense Attorney Pleads To Own Guilt (PALMBEACHP)

By Larry Keller, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), December 5, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH — Veteran criminal defense attorney John Garcia pleaded guilty Monday to federal charges of helping a drug dealer and former client conceal financial transactions and lying about it to drug enforcement agents.

U.S. District Court Judge Daniel T. K. Hurley called Garcia's admissions "an intensely sad day." He said Garcia, 45, of Lake Worth has represented many clients in his courtroom. "He has always done so with skill, with dignity. ... He's one of the outstanding members of the criminal bar."

Hurley set sentencing for Feb. 16. Garcia, married and the father of two daughters, will remain free on $100,000 bond until then. Sentencing guidelines call for a prison term of 18 to 24 months, defense attorney Richard Lubin said, but are not binding. Garcia also forfeited $75,000 to the government as a condition of his plea.

Garcia was arrested in September and charged with three counts of illegal money structuring and one count of making false statements to federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents. All are felonies.

His downfall began when agents began investigating drug dealer Joel McDermott in 2003 after learning he had a contract with Minto Homes for a $625,000 home in Wellington's Olympia development, and that he was making down payments with bank checks, not personal checks.

McDermott eventually was charged with and convicted of drug trafficking. He was sentenced to nearly 22 years in prison.

McDermott told federal agents that he gave Garcia $28,000 in drug profits in 2002, which Garcia deposited in his law practice trust account. Garcia then had two cashier's checks of $9,500 each and another for $9,000 issued to Minto Homes, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Carlton.

The next month, Garcia deposited $9,000 in McDermott drug profits into his personal account, which was used for the home, Carlton said. The scenario was repeated in September 2003, the government said.

By pleading guilty, Garcia admitted that he helped McDermott circumvent a law requiring financial institutions to report transactions of more than $10,000, the basis of the illegal money structuring charges. He also admitted lying to investigators about his own financial stake in the Wellington home and about buying cashier's checks.

Federal agents had a wiretap on McDermott's home from December 2003 through March 2004, Carlton disclosed. Garcia "was acting as a front on various business ventures" with McDermott, including renovations of a restaurant and a nightclub. Garcia lost thousands of dollars in those ventures, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0102467

In one phone conversation between McDermott and Garcia that agents listened to, Garcia said his financial dealings, coupled with McDermott's lack of apparent employment, could be construed as money laundering, Carlton said. In return for Garcia's plea, the government agreed not to pursue the more serious money-laundering charges.

Garcia has been practicing law in Florida for more than 18 years. The Florida Bar cited him for "minor misconduct" in 1999.

Now that he's a felon, Garcia's law license will be suspended by the Bar. He faces possible disbarment. "There is a presumption of disbarment with a felony conviction," said Ken Marvin, director of lawyer regulation at the Florida Bar.

"It's a virtual certainty you're going to lose your right to practice law," Hurley told Garcia.

Afterward, defense attorney Lubin said Garcia's crimes weren't entirely motivated by financial gain. "He is generous to a fault," he said. "John is always helping people. He just helped this guy the wrong way."

West Palm Attorney Admits Helping Drug Trafficker, And Lying About It (FLSUNSEN)

By Missy Diaz, Sun-sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, December 5, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH -- Before the plea conference even got under way Monday morning, emotion overcame criminal defense attorney John Anthony Garcia.

At first Garcia sat stoically beside his attorney, Richard Lubin, as U.S. District Court Judge Daniel T. K. Hurley lauded Garcia's good work over the years representing his clients with "skill and dignity, " before acknowledging that Monday was "an intensely sad day."

Then, as he prepared to accept guilt on three counts of illegal money structuring and a count of lying to federal investigators, Garcia quietly choked back tears for a couple of minutes before regaining his composure and proceeding with the 90-minute hearing.

The charges against Garcia stem from his dealings with former client and convicted drug trafficker Joel McDermott, 32.

Garcia admitted to depositing $18,000 into his personal checking account -- once in 2002 and again in 2003 -- and $28,000 into his law firm's trust account to help McDermott buy a five-bedroom, $630,000 home in the Olympia community in Wellington. Garcia purchased Bank of America cashier's checks for McDermott, who's serving a 21-year federal prison sentence.

In early 2003, the Drug Enforcement Administration began investigating McDermott, who it suspected of trafficking in cocaine, ecstasy and marijuana, Prosecutor Stephen Carlton said. During that investigation, DEA agents came across records detailing the Olympia home, built by developer Minto Homes. McDermott made payments to Minto Homes with bank checks not from his own bank account. McDermott began cooperating with the DEA following his arrest for cocaine trafficking, telling agents that he gave drug-related profits to Garcia, who then bought the cashier's checks. The cash transactions were always under $10,000. Anything above that amount is required to be reported to the federal government.

The government has telephone wiretaps of conversations between Garcia and McDermott that show the men partnered in a "variety of business ventures," Carlton told the judge, adding that Garcia signed leases for a restaurant and a nightclub, though none of the ventures between the two turned a profit. The men can be heard commiserating over their financial losses in some of the phone conversations, the prosecutor said.

"John Garcia lost thousands," Carlton said.

The DEA gave McDermott $5,000 and had him ask Garcia to help him pay off a car loan. During the wiretapped conversation, Garcia can be heard willing to launder the funds, according to Carlton.

"For one thing, you don't have a job," Garcia explains to McDermott when asked how it could be considered money laundering.

The government eventually searched Garcia's West Palm Beach office and learned that he had used his firm's trust account to help McDermott. During a February interview by the feds, Garcia denied buying the cashier's checks for the Olympia home or having any financial interest in the property.

Garcia, a tall and handsome 45-year-old father of two, hung his head during much of Monday's colloquy. His wife Karen and a handful of the criminal defense bar showed their support from the gallery.

Garcia remains free on $100,000 bond. As part of his plea deal, he forfeited $75,000 to the government. Federal guidelines call for a prison term of 18 to 24 months, Lubin said, though Hurley will make the ultimate decision.

Sentencing has been set for Feb. 16. Garcia, who has represented many high-profile clients, included accused nanny killer Jerry Wiggins, is expected to lose his license to practice law as a result of the plea.

Outside court, Lubin said Garcia's renowned generosity led to his current troubles.

"John is always helping people and he just helped this guy in the wrong way this time," Lubin said.

Attorney Bert Winkler, who has known Garcia for nearly 20 years, dating back to their days as assistant public defenders, described him as a "generous individual and a genuinely good guy."

DOJ_NMG_0102468

Colleague Franklin Prince recalled Garcia's quiet generosity in a variety of ways, from representing indigent clients to sponsoring youth soccer leagues and helping mentor young lawyers. He hopes the judge will consider those attributes when handing down a sentence.

"He's such a good friend, a hard-working lawyer and generous with his time and has helped many people over the past 18 years," Prince said. "John has a lot of friends that are supporting him and will be able to help in any way that is possible."

Supreme Court Lets Stand 55 - Year Term (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Filed at 10:30 a.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Supreme Court on Monday let stand a mandatory 55-year prison sentence, condemned as excessive by the federal judge who imposed it, for a man convicted of carrying a handgun during three marijuana deals.

Record producer Weldon Angelos received the minimum sentence under the law -- a harsher sentence than a child rapist or a terrorist who detonates a bomb aboard an aircraft would receive, according to his attorneys. The justices, without comment, left the prison term undisturbed.

Angelos was convicted of 16 counts of violating federal firearms, drug and money laundering laws in 2003. The charges stemmed from his sale of three 8-ounce bags of marijuana to an undercover informant.

He had a gun but never brandished or used it. Nevertheless, the three counts of possession of a firearm in a drug transaction required the mandatory minimum sentence.

Four former attorneys general and 145 former prosecutors and judges wrote in support of a lighter sentence for Angelos. Even the sentencing judge, U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell, an appointee of President Bush, called the sentence "unjust, cruel and irrational." But he said the law left him no choice.

Prosecutors said the sentence was appropriate and an appeals court agreed.

The case is Angelos v. U.S., 06-26.

Pentagon Resists Pleas For Help In Afghan Opium Fight (LAT)

By Josh Meyer, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

The DEA wants the military to take a larger role in stopping the drug trade, which experts say finances the insurgency.

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon, engaged in a difficult fight to defeat a resurgent Taliban in Afghanistan, has resisted entreaties from U.S. anti-narcotics officials to play an aggressive role in the faltering campaign to curb the country's opium trade.

Military units in Afghanistan largely overlook drug bazaars, rebuff some requests to take U.S. drug agents on raids and do little to counter the organized crime syndicates shipping the drug to Europe, Asia and, increasingly, the United States, according to officials and documents.

While the Pentagon and the Drug Enforcement Administration, or the DEA, have been at odds, poppy cultivation has exploded, increasing by more than half this year. Afghanistan supplies about 92% of the world's opium, and traffickers reap an estimated $2.3 billion in annual profits.

"It is surprising to me that we have allowed things to get to the point that they have," said Robert B. Charles, a former top State Department counter-narcotics official. "It we do not act aggressively against the narcotics threat now, all gains made to date will be washed out to sea."

The bumper crop of opium poppies, much of it from Taliban strongholds in southern Afghanistan, finances the insurgency the U.S. is trying to dismantle.

The DEA's advocates in Congress argue that the Pentagon could undermine the insurgency by combating the drugs that help finance it. Military officials say they can spare no resources from the task of fighting the Taliban and its allies.

Outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has said that Afghanistan's flourishing opium trade is a law enforcement problem, not a military one. It would be "mission creep" if the 21,000 U.S. troops in Afghanistan were to turn their attention to opium, and it would also set a precedent for future combat operations, military officials say.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Afghanistan's police forces and British troops in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization peacekeeping operation have the primary responsibility for fighting the Afghan drug problem.

Military officials also fear that cracking down on opium traffickers could alienate the Afghan people and warlords who profit from the trade. An estimated one-eighth of the population is involved in poppy cultivation, and the opium trade is one-third of the country's economy.

DOJ_NMG_0102469

The Pentagon has cooperated some with the DEA, but its resistance to doing more has drawn criticism from prominent congressmen, including Rep. Henry J. Hyde (R-Ill.), chairman of the International Relations Committee.

Hyde and other lawmakers say the Bush administration is making a crucial mistake in not directing U.S. forces to collaborate with the DEA to take down those supplying the Taliban with cash, high-tech weapons and trucks.

"If we don't change the policy soon, and fight both drugs and terrorism simultaneously, Afghanistan may well fall into a failed narcotics state status," Hyde said in a statement.

Hyde has urged the White House and the Pentagon to look to Colombia as a model. Anti-narcotics agents there work closely with the military to target terrorism and drug trafficking.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai and other officials have asked for more help from the Pentagon, especially stronger support for the DEA.

"We are disappointed that there isn't more and closer cooperation between these two," said M. Ashraf Haidari, Afghanistan's Washington liaison to U.S. military and law enforcement agencies. "We have been saying this since 2003."

Haidari said the DEA and Afghan authorities needed "maximum military support both from ground and air." He complained that there was little coordination between the U.S. and international anti-drug efforts in Afghanistan.

The DEA has about 10 agents in Kabul, the Afghan capital, and rotates small teams of agents and intelligence analysts into the country, two at a time. The teams train and work with Afghan narcotics police, but also do their own investigations.

But DEA agents can't move about the mountainous terrain without helicopters and, in many cases, can't infiltrate well-protected drug operations without backup from troops.

Several dozen kingpins have emerged in the Afghan drug trade who are allied with the Taliban and Al Qaeda, current and former U.S. and Afghan officials said. In the last year, the drug bosses have become more brazen, richer and powerful.

U.S. and Afghan officials say the major traffickers and their hundreds of criminal associates prey on poor Afghan poppy farmers, openly run huge opium bazaars and labs that turn opium into heroin, and truck vast quantities of drugs into neighboring countries. They often return with night-vision goggles, land mines, sniper rifles and other high-tech weapons to use against U.S. and NATO forces.

Antonio Maria Costa, head of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, said in a recent interview that the location of major drug operations were "well-known to us and to the authorities." He said he recently watched a video of a heavily armed drug convoy of about 20 vehicles crossing into Iran.

"When you see narcotics trafficking that has the connotation of military operations, I am afraid we can only cope with them with military muscle," he said.

U.S. efforts have largely focused on small drug arrests and the State Department's program to eradicate poppy fields.

Publicly, DEA officials praise the Pentagon for its help and say coordination has improved. But two senior congressional aides said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy had been quietly campaigning for more Pentagon assistance.

"Behind closed doors she has been very adamant about how we need this stuff over there," a DEA official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Without the helicopters, we can't move. We're sure not going to go out in caravans with a couple of pistols."

Tandy testified in June that although DEA agents had developed leads in Afghanistan, the agency had "no operational infrastructure, assets or support to conduct operations" in Helmand province, where as much as half of Afghan heroin is grown and processed.

The Pentagon has promised as many as eight MI-17 helicopters for Afghan authorities to use in collaboration with U.S. military and law enforcement officials. But only two have arrived and are being used solely for training, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said. DEA officials cannot say when helicopters will be available for drug operations, he said.

Pentagon spokesman Lt. Col. Todd Vician said that in the last two years U.S. troops had worked to support DEA efforts to combat the drug trade in Afghanistan "in the form of intelligence, planning, transportation of interdiction forces, medical evacuation and close air support if needed."

He also said Rumsfeld had authorized federal authorities, including DEA agents, to go on military operations in areas of known or suspected drug activity.

But in many cases the Pentagon has balked at drug interdiction efforts even when it had the resources, said a former senior U.S. anti-drug official, who declined to give details of what he said were classified operations.

"There were [drug] convoys where military people looked the other way, and situations where DEA sought [Pentagon] intelligence and it wasn't given to them," the former official said.

"DEA would identify a lab to go hit or a storage facility and [the Pentagon] would find a reason to ground the helicopters," the former official added. "They would say we don't want you to create a disturbance in an area where we're trying to chase down terrorists and the Taliban."

DOJ_NMG_0102470

A recent congressional report said the DEA asked the Pentagon for airlifts on 26 occasions in 2005, and the requests were denied in all but three cases. The Pentagon said it had done better in 2006, approving 12 of 14 DEA requests for air support.

Several current and former DEA officials said the Pentagon efforts were mostly administrative and not related to raids and other enforcement efforts.

Hyde and Rep. Mark Steven Kirk (R-Ill.), a former naval intelligence officer, told Rumsfeld in an Oct. 12 letter that they wanted the Pentagon to allow DEA agents to ride along on more military missions in Afghanistan and to call them in when soldiers found a large drug stash or operation.

Eight days later, Rumsfeld wrote that he had asked one of his undersecretaries, Eric S. Edelman, "to look into this matter."

"We will get back to you as soon as possible," Rumsfeld wrote.

Hyde's aides say the congressman hasn't heard back.

60% Leap In Opium Production In 2006 (AN)

Asia News, December 4, 2006

Kabul (AsiaNews/Agencies) – Opium production in Afghanistan reached record highs this year despite international efforts to strangle it. This was recently revealed by the US government, in confirmation of a report by the UN Office on Drugs and Crime and the World Bank. In 2006, production is estimated to have grown by 61% after a 26% increase in 2005, for a total product of around 5,600 tons. This is 17 times more than the world's second producer: Myanmar. In the two main production provinces, Helmand in the southwest and Oruzgan in central Afghanistan, cultivation went up by 132%. Opium poppy covers only about 4% of cultivable land, but the crop is becoming more popular because it needs minimal care and irrigation. President Karzai declared opium as "Afghanistan's major enemy", worse than terrorism.

More than 90% of the world's heroin comes from Afghan opium. John Walters, White House drug policy chief, said the main causes for the failure to eradicate production were the resurgence of Taliban forces, which oppose US operations, and limited funds available for anti-narcotic and development programs.

But military sources believe the problem is more pervasive, with drug traffickers that have their own armies to pit against the force of 30,000 NATO soldiers deployed in the country. General James L. Jones, the supreme allied commander for NATO, said: "It would be wrong to say that this is just the Taliban… They [drug cartels] are buying their protection by funding other organizations, from criminal gangs to tribes, to inciting any kind of resistance to keep the government off of their back… They have their own capability to inflict damage, to make sure that the roads and the passages stay open and they get to where they want to go, even through Pakistan, Iran and Russia."

In Afghanistan, drugs fuel an industry of 2.6 billion dollars per year, a sum that equalled one-third of the country's GDP (Gross Domestic Product) in 2006. Although farmers who cultivate opium poppies receive only a small percentage of the profits, it is estimated that they earn 12 times as much income than for any other crop. So any attempts to eradicate cultivation meet violent local resistance.

This is one of the reasons why the Afghan government has prohibited aerial herbicide spraying, used by US anti-narcotic programs in Latin America. Instead, opium poppy plants in Afghanistan are destroyed by tractors. But only 38,500 of nearly 430,000 acres under cultivation were eradicated in 2006.

Panel Faults U.S.-Trained Afghan Police (NYT)

By James Glanz And David Rohde

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Five years after the fall of the Taliban, a joint report by the Pentagon and the State Department has found that the American-trained police force in Afghanistan is largely incapable of carrying out routine law enforcement work, and that managers of the $1.1 billion training program cannot say how many officers are actually on duty or where thousands of trucks and other equipment issued to police units have gone.

In fact, most police units had less than 50 percent of their authorized equipment on hand as of June, says the report, which was issued two weeks ago but is only now circulating among members of relevant Congressional committees.

In its most significant finding, the report said that no effective field training program had been established in Afghanistan, at least in part because of a slow, ineffectual start and understaffing.

Police training experts who have studied or had first-hand experience with the American effort in Afghanistan said they agreed with the report's findings, and some said they had warned for years that field training was the backbone of a strong program. But they said additional problems needed to be investigated, including the quality of private contractors and the cost and effectiveness of relying on them to train the police officers. In particular, the experts questioned why the report focused on United States government managers and only glancingly analyzed the performance of the principal contractor in Afghanistan, DynCorp International of Virginia.

Considering the state of the police force, an estimated $600 million per year will be needed indefinitely to sustain it, says the report, undertaken by the offices of the inspectors general at the Pentagon and the State Department. Howard J. Krongard is the inspector general at State, which led the work on the 97-page report, and Thomas F. Gimble holds the office at the Pentagon.

American advisers will also have to combat endemic corruption in the force, the report says.

Efforts to respond to some of the issues that the report identifies are already under way. Afghan and American officials recently announced that they had instituted an "auxiliary police" program at the end of the summer, which aims to hire 11,200 officers in parts of the country beset by Taliban attacks, primarily in the south.

But those officers receive only two of the standard eight weeks of training, and the police training experts say the program could worsen the situation. They say the new hastily created program could place ill-trained and poorly vetted officers in the field and allow militias and criminals to infiltrate the force.

An American official involved in the new effort said the program became necessary after southern governors besieged by Taliban attacks began hiring police officers on their own. American officials feared they were seeing the beginnings of de facto private militias.

"This was designed to avoid the creation of the militias," said the official, who was not authorized to comment publicly.

The training experts say the United States made some of the same mistakes in training police forces in Afghanistan that it made in Iraq, including offering far too little field training, tracking equipment poorly and relying on private contractors for the actual training. At the same time, those experts say, the failure to create viable police forces to keep order and enforce the law on a local level has played a pivotal role in undermining the American efforts to stabilize both countries.

In Afghanistan, the failure has contributed to the explosion in opium production, government corruption and the resurgence of the Taliban.

In Iraq, the challenge is even larger: Sectarian death squads have infiltrated the police force and helped push the country to what many are now calling a civil war.

"In both places we were extraordinarily late getting started," said Robert M. Perito, a policing expert at the United States Institute of Peace and a former National Security Council, State Department and Justice Department official. "In both places you have a dysfunctional Interior Ministry in control, and in both places the United States has tried to stand up a ministry advisory group to bring order out of chaos."

In an interview this fall, the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, said the violence in the country's south was partly a result of the lack of a viable force. He called for "much more support" from the United States and for an expansion of the country's force of roughly 70,000 officers.

"It is not that they are strong," he said, referring to the Taliban. "It is that we are not strong enough to defend ourselves."

Most of the $1.1 billion the United States has spent on the training program in Afghanistan has gone to DynCorp, a technical services company based in Falls Church, Va., with 14,000 employees in about 33 countries. DynCorp also won the largest part of the training work in Iraq; it received a total of $1.6 billion for its training and security work in Iraq and Afghanistan in the 2004, 2005 and 2006 fiscal years, according to Gregory Lagana, a company spokesman. The work accounted for roughly 30 percent of the company's revenue during those years. In May, the company raised $375 million in an initial public offering of its stock.

Under orders from the Defense Department, the company has deployed 377 police advisers to Afghanistan, roughly half the number the United States has deployed in Iraq. Police training experts say far more police advisers are needed in Afghanistan, which is roughly the same size as Iraq. The report says that management of the DynCorp contract by United States government officials in Afghanistan has fallen into a state of disarray; conflicting military and civilian bureaucracies could not even find a copy of the contract to clarify for auditors exactly what it called for.

The report does not suggest that DynCorp held any responsibility for the program's failures, but former Afghan officials and several American policing experts who have examined DynCorp's training on the ground say that the company is partly to blame for long delays and that the use of private contractors for training should be reviewed. Afghan officials have complained about the high cost of the advisers and have said that some have too little experience.

Ali Jalali, an Afghan-American military historian who served as interior minister from 2002 to 2005, said the expertise level of some DynCorp advisers sent to his ministry was mixed. He said he rejected the first group he was offered because their résumés were unimpressive. When a second group arrived, some were retired officers not up to the demands of working in Afghanistan, he said. Others knew virtually nothing about the country.

DOJ_NMG_0102472

"They were good on patrols in Oklahoma City, Houston or Miami," said Mr. Jalali, now a professor at the National Defense University in Washington. "But not in a country where you faced rebuilding the police force."

Mr. Lagana defended the company's work and said State Department officials closely monitored their activities. He said the Interior Ministry advisers who drew complaints regarding their experience level were removed.

"We filled positions based on the requirements and salary levels authorized by the State Department," Mr. Lagana said. "As we went along, everyone realized we needed people with experience at higher levels in law enforcement."

Seth Jones, an Afghanistan expert at the RAND Corporation who has made eight trips to Afghanistan since 2003 to study army and police training, called for a review of the company's performance. He said he had repeatedly heard complaints from both Western and Afghan officials in Afghanistan about the quality and experience of DynCorp's advisers.

"I was surprised, based on what I have seen on the ground, that DynCorp was let off the hook so easily," he said of the report. "I think a very frank assessment of DynCorp needs to be done."

Mr. Krongard, the State Department inspector general, acknowledged the seriousness of the report's criticisms. But he said in a statement in answer to questions about the report that in the face of obstacles like largely illiterate recruits, low pay and corruption, the program was "generally well conceived and well executed," but that for the police force to be self-sustaining, "long-term U.S. and international assistance and funding will be required at least beyond 2010."

The report concluded that the official figure of 70,000 trained police officers was inflated and that only where American advisers were present was the counting reliable to some degree.

As a best estimate, the report said that 30,395 Afghan officers — fewer than half the official total — were "trained and equipped to carry out their police functions."

The report also says that the vetting process for recruits, intended to keep the Taliban and people with powerful sectarian or tribal loyalties out of police ranks, has not been effective. After recruits are trained, they are often assigned by local police commanders to menial tasks like guard duty.

The international effort lost critical time when it initially mounted a token effort to train officers in Afghanistan, according to Afghan officials and policing experts. For the first two and a half years after the fall of the Taliban, no systematic police training program existed outside of Afghanistan's capital, according to American and Afghan officials. The United States focused on training a new multiethnic army and paid little attention to the need for policemen. Germany pledged to train a new force but sent only 40 police advisers to Kabul.

Then, in 2004, the State Department issued a contract to DynCorp to deploy 30 police advisers across Afghanistan and construct seven regional training centers.

The United States spent $164 million building and running the training centers; recruits received two to four weeks of training. The effort was poorly monitored and achieved mixed results, according to a June 2005 report by the Government Accountability Office.

In April 2005, the Defense Department took over police training in Afghanistan and drastically expanded the number of American police advisers; the number is 377 today. Still, police training experts said the Afghanistan effort remained far too small, with small teams of advisers each expected to field train thousands of Afghan policemen.

The small corps of advisers also makes it more difficult to track equipment, and the report said that just 3,000 of 5,000 vehicles issued to the police nationwide could be accounted for. Although the report does not explicitly connect its warnings on corruption to the loss of equipment, the two appear to be closely related.

The weakness of the police has contributed to Afghanistan becoming the world's largest producer of opium, accounting for 92 percent of the world's supply, experts said. A report issued by the United Nations Office of Drug Control and the World Bank on Tuesday found that corruption had stymied efforts to counter opium production and that a handful of politically connected traffickers increasingly dominated the drug trade.

"The drug industry in Afghanistan is becoming increasingly consolidated," the report says. "At the top level, around 25-30 key traffickers, the majority of them in southern Afghanistan, control major transactions and transfers, working closely with sponsors in top government and political positions."

The report on police training strongly recommends expanding the advising program to take care of some of those problems but points out that an expansion would cost the United States much more money "as well as increasing the risk to U.S. personnel."

Outside View: Russia And Afghan Drugs (UPI)

By Pyotr Goncharov, Upi Outside View Commenatator
United Press International, December 5, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 4 (UPI) -- It will take more than two or three years to fight drug trafficking from Afghanistan, according to a joint report of the World Bank and the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime published recently.

"History teaches us that it will take a generation to render Afghanistan opium-free," the report reads. To eradicate this evil, "support to farmers, the arrest of corrupt officials and eradication measures must be concentrated in half a dozen provinces ... so as to free them from the scourge of opium."

Not a very optimistic forecast. Especially for Russia, which is the main target of Afghan drug trafficking, standing in its way to Europe. By November this year, the Russian Federal Service for Control of Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Circulation alone confiscated over 80 tons of drugs from Afghanistan, including two tons of heroin.

Moscow, however, was not too upbeat about the outlook for fighting Afghan drugs even before the release of the report. The Service's director, Viktor Cherkesov, says that measures taken in Afghanistan by the international community and the Afghan government, are insufficient and their efficiency is extremely low. International programs for financing alternative crops (such as cotton instead of opium poppy) have failed.

Moreover, criminal structures that control heroin production in the country are often close to the Afghan regional authorities. This means that those who are responsible for fighting drugs are most interested in the industry's prosperity. So it would be ridiculous to make any optimistic predictions.

Hopes vested in the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force in Afghanistan are also ungrounded. The coalition can do little when the Afghan authorities have almost no control over the situation outside Kabul, so it is difficult to launch programs that would cover the whole country.

Moscow is still quite critical about ISAF and NATO's stance on fighting drugs. Anatoly Safonov, the Russian president's envoy on counter-terrorism, said he disagreed with NATO commanders that destruction of opium poppy crops by ISAF would only aggravate relations with the local population. "We believe that this is a deadlock," he said when commenting on these statements.

A voice in the wilderness. What does NATO have to do with it if the U.N. Security Council does not give ISAF the go-ahead to destroy opium crops? The United States, whose troops are the backbone of the anti-insurgent coalition, is not going to do it either, justifying its refusal with impressive statements. Former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld said once that as Afghan drugs were planted on Russian and European money, it was Russia and Europe that should address the problem. What he meant was that the United States did not care.

There are serious objections as well. The above-mentioned UNODC report says that destruction of opium poppy crops, planted by the poorest Afghan farmers, should be done with extreme caution in order not to aggravate the situation.

What is Russia to do then? Is there a way out of this vicious cycle?

Maj. Gen. Alexander Yanevsky, head of the Drugs Control Service's department for inter-department preventive interaction, says that Russia has 342,000 people officially diagnosed as drug addicts. Overall, the country has up to six million drug addicts. The situation in Europe is no better, although addicts there prefer cocaine and marijuana to Afghan opium.

Perhaps, it is worth considering a proposal made by the Senlis Council, an international drug policy think tank based in Europe. It believes that Western countries should officially buy opium poppy from Afghanistan and then license it to produce pain killers. The Afghan state would benefit and establish at least partial control over the poppy fields. More importantly, this would be a severe blow to illegal drug trafficking.

This year, opium poppy crops in Afghanistan have surged 60 percent against last year, according to the United Nations, and production of opium -- used to produce heroin -- will be up at least 50 percent by year's end. This means that Afghanistan can export over 600 tons of premium quality heroin to Europe this year. Russia has already confiscated about two tons. There's some tough work still left in store.

Colombian Drug Czar's Brother Arrested On Cocaine Charge (CNN)

CNN, December 5, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- Colombia's drug czar said police arrested his brother over the weekend with six grams (0.2 ounces) of cocaine.

DOJ_NMG_0102474

Carlos Albornoz, head of the National Drug Directorate responsible for Colombia's drug-control policies, said in a news conference Sunday his brother Ivan Albornoz was arrested shortly after buying the drugs Saturday night in southern Bogota.

The anti-drug official said President Alvaro Uribe asked him to continue in his job.

"My family and myself are obligated to confront a situation that we never foresaw," said Albornoz, a former Senator. "The curse of drugs, which I've dedicated myself to combat aggressively, is among us."

Albornoz said he was unaware of his brother's drug use and expected him to be treated with the same severity as any other Colombian citizen.

The six grams (0.2 ounces) of cocaine found on Albornoz, a 49-year old architect, was more than the maximum amount permitted by a controversial 1994 court ruling that decriminalized small amounts of cocaine, heroin and other drugs for personal usage.

Uribe, whose government receives about $500 million a year in anti-narcotic aid from the United States, has vowed to change that ruling with a constitutional amendment.

Colombia is the world's largest producer of cocaine and almost every family in the country has in one way or another been touched by the drug trade, including other top anti-drug officials.

In May, the brother of Gen. Oscar Naranjo, head of judicial police responsible for pursuing Colombia's drug cartels, was arrested in southwestern Germany in possession of 100 kilograms (220 pounds) of drugs.

IMMIGRATION:

Ga. Senator's Wife Fights Deportation (AP)

By Giovanna Dell'orto

AP, December 5, 2006

State Sen. Curt Thompson has been a strong advocate of immigration rights, once speaking in Spanish from the steps of the Georgia Capitol against the adoption of some of the nation's strictest immigration controls.

Now Thompson's Colombia-born wife is in hiding as federal immigration officials try to deport her.

Sascha Herrera, 28, has been in hiding since Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers arrived at her home Nov. 28 with an order to remove her from the U.S. She was not home at the time.

Her attorney, Charles Kuck, claims she was duped by a man handling her immigration requests and that she never received the immigration notices that triggered her deportation order. While Kuck says neither he nor her husband know where Herrera is, he said that she will turn herself in Tuesday.

"It's the right thing to do. She needs to get the law to work for her," Kuck said.

Kuck filed a petition Monday to halt her deportation order and reopen her case, arguing that a man filed an asylum petition on her behalf without her knowledge and before her husband sponsored her green card application based on their April marriage.

The deportation order stems from Herrera's repeated failure to appear before a judge on the asylum application, which Kuck said she did not know had been filed.

The case hinges on whether Herrera received a notice to appear in court, and whether the asylum application could have been filed without her knowledge, said Victor Cerda, former general counsel for Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

According to Kuck, Herrera came to the U.S. — where her parents have been living — on a visitor visa in 2003. She applied for an extension to the visa through a "notario" — a man who claimed he was qualified to handle legal immigration matters — but did not get it until 20 days before the extension was due to expire.

The notario then suggested an asylum application, which Herrera signed, but she got a "bad vibe" from the man and decided not to proceed, Kuck said.

Later in 2004, she was accepted as a student at Kennesaw State University, which got a student visa for her. She then told the notario she did not want anything to do with him.

She met Thompson last year and they got married in April, when he applied for her to become a permanent resident. Kuck said Herrera's husband, a Democrat and attorney, would not comment on the case.

But in the meantime, the notario filed the asylum application, listing his address as hers. A telephone number listed for the notario, identified as Tomas Vilela, was being answered Monday by a fax machine.

Cerda said the deportation order in the asylum case would trump any pending green card application and trigger mandatory detention.

DOJ_NMG_0102475

Her decision to hide could hurt her request for a judge's stay on deportation, Cerda said. If she turns herself in, she could remain in the U.S. while her petition is pending, either in jail or released on bond.

Minuteman Consulting Charity Fined (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

One of the charitable organizations cited by Minuteman Civil Defense Corps boss Chris Simcox on why financial accountability concerns raised by some corps members were unfounded has been fined for failing to keep its own financial records in order, The Washington Times has learned.

The Declaration Foundation, a tax-exempt charity created by conservative activist Alan Keyes, who has vigorously supported the Minuteman movement, was fined $6,500 in August and prohibited by the Pennsylvania Bureau of Charitable Organizations from soliciting donations until it becomes "properly registered."

The Aug. 18 "agreement and order," signed by Declaration Foundation Executive Director Mary Parker Lewis, a top Minuteman adviser, acknowledged that the charity made false statements in seeking to solicit donations, failed to properly administer money it had collected, and withheld documents sought as part of an "investigative subpoena."

According to the bureau, the Declaration Foundation failed over a four-year period to submit audited financial statements, gave false information when it said it did not share revenue with other nonprofit or tax-exempt groups, and misstated the truth when it said none of its officers or employees was tied to any vendor providing services or goods.

The bureau said the Declaration Foundation improperly shared revenue with the Declaration Alliance, another tax-exempt charity founded by Mr. Keyes, which also has been active in overseeing the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps (MCDC).

The Declaration Foundation is at the center of an intricate weave of conservative organizations founded by Mr. Keyes or tied to longtime Keyes associates now working with MCDC. They have served as mentors for Mr. Simcox and provided consulting and financial services for the group's fundraising and media activities.

According to Internal Revenue Service records, the Declaration Foundation reported more than $600,000 in contributions over the past two years and the Declaration Alliance, in its 2004 IRS filing, the latest available, reported more than $1.7 million in donations. The two organizations list the same Reston, Va., address as its place of business.

MCDC describes itself as a "project" of the Declaration Alliance. The Minuteman political action committee, which raised hundreds of thousands of dollars in political contributions this year, is formally known as the Declaration Alliance Minuteman Civil Defense Corps Political Action Committee, according to Federal Election Commission records.

Connie Hair, spokeswoman for MCDC and Mr. Keyes, said she had been asked not to talk with The Times.

Mr. Simcox did not respond to e-mails concerning the Pennsylvania order.

But Mr. Simcox, who co-founded the Minuteman movement in April 2005, has told The Times and said on the Minuteman Web page that the Declaration groups offered "an experienced organization for mass mailings, advertising and public relations" and the ability to conduct a "fully accredited and independent audit" of MCDC finances.

He said he had "complete confidence in the professional firms we have retained to perform fiduciary responsibility and accounting for the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps" and that he had "checked these people out very carefully before agreeing to work with them." In a July interview, he accused his critics of being racists and disgruntled former MCDC members.

Mr. Keyes and his supporters have been tagged in the past on suspected violations involving contributions, including a December 2002 finding by the Federal Election Commission that said his 2000 presidential campaign owed the government more than $220,000 for questionable contributions, nonqualified expenses, improperly handled checks and other ineligible expenses.

Mrs. Lewis, who signed off on the Pennsylvania agreement and order, served as chief of staff to the Keyes 2000 campaign.

Several current and former MCDC members have questioned the whereabouts of hundreds of thousands of dollars in donations collected since the Minuteman movement began in April 2005.

In interviews this week, they said the organization's first IRS filing as a 501(c)4 tax-exempt charity on Nov. 15 failed to answer many of their concerns. They said, for example, there was no accounting in the new filing for at least $150,000 in the $50 registration fees required of the 4,000 Minuteman volunteers.

Others questioned why the IRS financial statement included mention of the construction of a border fence, since the filing listed MCDC contributions and expenditures only for 2005. They noted that Mr. Simcox began the fence project in April 2006.

In a statement posted on the MCDC Web site, the group's board of directors, which Mr. Simcox heads, decided that "this year and this year only" it would make public the organization's financial records. The statement did not address the fact nonprofit organizations such as MCDC are required to file annual financial statements, which are available to the public.

TAX:

Westminster Man Told To Stop Running Tax Scheme (BSUN/AP)

The Associated Press

The Baltimore Sun, December 5, 2006

He falsely advised clients that they did not need to pay taxes

A Westminster man has been barred by a federal judge from running a scheme in which he promised to help members avoid paying federal taxes, the U.S. Department of Justice announced today.

The "Save-A-Patriot Fellowship" run by John Baptist Kotmair Jr. falsely advised that clients didn't have to pay taxes and could legally withdraw from the Social Security system, U.S. District Judge William Nickerson said in his ruling. Despite legal action by the U.S. Justice Department, Kotmair's organization continued to file frivolous protest letters with the Internal Revenue Service on behalf of more than 800 clients and showed "no inclination ... to cease their activities," Nickerson noted.

Nickerson's order, issued last week, permanently bars Kotmair and his organization from representing or assisting anyone in corresponding with the IRS, or preparing court filings relating to income taxes. Kotmair and his organization must also notify all individuals involved in the scheme of the injunction and provide the Justice Department with the names of the customers, their e-mail addresses and telephone and Social Security numbers.

The injunction also must be posted prominently on the organization's Web sites for a year, and fraudulent promotional materials must be removed from the sites.

How The IRS Failed To Stop $200M In Bogus Refunds (USAT)

By Kevin McCoy

USA Today, December 5, 2006

At least two months before the IRS mistakenly began paying an estimated $200 million in fraudulent or erroneous 2006 tax season refunds, the agency was warned about potentially “catastrophic” problems in a new computer being developed to avert such a blunder.

A USA TODAY examination of the IRS Electronic Fraud Detection System project found the previously unpublicized November 2005 warning, along with other warnings and new details of missteps that culminated in one of the most costly and embarrassing episodes in the tax agency's recent history.

As the peak of the 2006 tax season approached last spring, the IRS discovered that a planned upgrade of the agency computer that red-flags potentially fraudulent tax refunds had failed. The discovery came after the IRS had shut down the older computer. The failure forced the agency to continue processing 2006 tax season returns — and issuing refunds — without its first line of electronic defense against fraud.

USA TODAY's review found that the IRS lacks a comprehensive plan to recover the $200 million, which the agency said represents far less than 1% of all 2006 tax season refunds. That means most fraudulent filers who got federal checks in 2006 will likely never be caught.

Today, as the 2007 tax season looms, the IRS is restarting the older computer, because the nearly $21 million planned successor still isn't operable.

“I would say it is one of the more significant disappointments of my tenure,” IRS Commissioner Mark Everson said in a recent interview. The blame, he said, “lies both within the IRS and at the contractor,” because both “totally misjudged the complexity and the difficulty of this system.”

The IRS managed to identify and stop some fraudulent 2006 tax returns without the computer. But Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said the agency's failure to see beyond rosy projections on the computer project and act on the warnings had hurt millions of Americans.

“There's a lot of fraudulent tax returns that are filed … and for at least last year, they're all going to get off scot-free,” says Grassley. “And it's not just that they're getting off scot-free — it's that the honest taxpayers become the suckers.”

The Electronic Fraud Detection System is the IRS' second-largest repository of taxpayer data. Every tax return that claims a refund is run through the computer, which is designed to flag potentially suspicious claims for additional review under the agency's Questionable Refund Program.

The IRS decided to upgrade the then-6-year-old computer in 2001 to keep pace with new refund fraud schemes and to enable investigators to use the system via the Internet. Nine companies bid on the upgrade, the IRS said. DynCorp, a computer firm based in Reston, Va., won. In 2003, California-headquartered Computer Sciences Corp. (CSC) acquired DynCorp, and became the main contractor.

DOJ_NMG_0102477

The IRS planned to switch to the upgraded computer in time for the 2005 tax season. But multiple problems arose, delaying the planned start-up to early 2006. IRS officials said the agency's own personnel and CSC representatives repeatedly voiced confidence the new computer would start on schedule.

During a Jan. 17 meeting at Everson's Washington office, IRS Deputy Commissioner John Dalrymple said, CSC projected a mid-February start date. The timing was crucial, Dalrymple said, because the IRS had shut down the older computer months earlier. By autumn 2005, he said, it couldn't be restarted for 2006.

But the promised February date came and went. By late March or early April, "It was clear to us that we were not going to be able to bring the Web-based system up at all," said Dalrymple.

Everson said he and other top IRS officials relied on repeated assurances in which the agency's managers on the computer project and CSC personnel said the new computer would be up and running as scheduled.

However, internal IRS documents obtained by USA TODAY, including a $400,000 post-failure assessment of the project, show the agency received multiple warnings about serious problems.

In a Nov. 10, 2005, memo, CSC personnel who worked on the project outlined "10 most critical EFDS (Electronic Fraud Detection System) risks" they said had to be resolved by the company and the IRS "before they become catastrophic." The problems included:

·"Extremely slow" communication between IRS computers and those used by CSC. The problems, chronic since June 21, made the communication so slow that at times, it's like using a "dial-up connection from home" that requires "2-3 minutes to do even the simplest of tasks, such as sending an e-mail."

Unless the problem was addressed, the memo warned, the IRS risked "putting the entire EFDS project in jeopardy."

·Repeated delays in setting up a large Oracle-manufactured computer network capable of handling massive volumes of data. Failure to rectify the problem by Dec. 9, 2005, the memo warned, raised the prospect that the new IRS computer "may not be ready to go into production" as scheduled.

·Computer servers that the contractor used for data conversion shut down frequently, halting work. The company wasn't alerted to a weekend shutdown on Oct. 15, 2005, until two days later.

CSC has not been fined or sanctioned by the IRS, and continues to work on restarting the older Electronic Fraud Detection System. The firm declined to discuss specifics of either the warning memo or the project.

James Sheaffer, president of the firm's federal contracts sector, issued a statement that said: "We are contractually obligated to address any current or anticipated issues or problems that could, in our best judgment, interfere with our scheduled performance. That is exactly what we were doing in the '10 critical issues' document."

Dalrymple said the problems in the memo had all been addressed before top IRS officials learned the new computer would not start on time and did not "have anything to do with what the problem was with the root cause of the failure." The key problem, which Dalrymple said was only determined during a March 2006, test, was that the new computer "couldn't load a full day's worth of data in one day. And when you can't do that … you just fall further and further behind."

Yet, the IRS' post-failure assessment, obtained by USA TODAY under the Freedom of Information Act, found that some of the problems in the CSC warning memo "contributed to the delay" of the project.

The assessment also said "multiple warning signs calling for more formal oversight reviews were missed by multiple organizations." It cited a mistaken IRS designation of the project as low-risk and low-complexity, the "inexperience of key personnel and questionable judgment and decision-making by key IRS and Computer Sciences Corp. management," plus IRS budget and staffing cuts and turnover in CSC personnel.

"Many of the most critical issues were entirely preventable," concluded the assessment, which also reported the new computer could eventually be implemented with additional work.

A recent audit by the Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration identified other warnings. As early as April 20, 2005, an e-mail from workers on the project reported problems with computer data loads, the audit found. That was the same issue Dalrymple identified as the most critical.

On Dec. 22, 2005, an IRS information technology specialist found "significant inaccuracies" in reports submitted by CSC, the auditors found. Although the firm said annual data loads were 50% complete by Dec. 20, "the IRS was advised by the contractor's technical staff that the data loads had never been started."

"We were told the IRS advised the contractor of this situation, but did not pursue the matter," the auditors wrote.

The computer project "was a perfect example of where anything can go wrong, it did," said Michael Phillips, the Treasury deputy inspector general who led the audit. Signaling the depth of the IRS' embarrassment, the agency took the rare step of proposing to fire two administrators who oversaw the computer project, and suspend a third. One manager has retired, and administrative appeals for the others are pending, the IRS said.

DOJ_NMG_0102478

In all, the Treasury audit concluded the IRS "inefficiently used" at least $20.5 million in development costs on the computer project. That comes on top of the $200 million in estimated fraudulent refunds. The audit also estimated that the IRS could have mistakenly paid as much as $318.3 million in fraudulent refunds during the 2006 tax season.

The IRS, however, pegged the loss at roughly $200 million after nearly all 2006 federal tax season returns were processed. Everson said there's little chance IRS will collect the bulk of the erroneously issued checks.

"We're not going to go back. … That's gone," he said. "If you look at stopping frauds on refunds, you either stop it upfront, or it's very hard to get that money."

The IRS said it was able to freeze 84,000 questionable refunds using other safeguards. All tax data filed in 2006 has been loaded into the old Electronic Fraud Detection System, Everson said, as the agency prepares for the approaching tax season. Any 2006 tax returns flagged as potentially suspicious could prompt the IRS to check those filers' 2005 returns, Everson said.

While acknowledging the enormity of the $200 million loss, Everson said the total is outweighed by $2.3 trillion the IRS collects in tax revenue, and millions more saved in modernization efforts. He also voiced confidence that the older computer would be successfully restarted for the 2007 tax season set to start next month.

"I have every reason to believe that we'll be successful," said Everson.

At least one federal official isn't quite as sanguine. Nina Olson, head of the IRS National Taxpayer Advocate's office, criticized the agency earlier this year for failing to notify filers whose tax refunds were frozen while investigators checked for potential fraud. Olson said many of those taxpayers were blameless.

"The fact that the old computer system is going back on line for 2007 raises questions for me about whether it will continue to freeze refunds that should not be frozen," said Olson.

"We could have the same problem again."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Votes In Doubt, Bolton Resigns As Ambassador (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — President Bush reluctantly accepted the resignation of the United Nations ambassador, John R. Bolton, on Monday, conceding that the envoy could not win Senate confirmation and signaling that the administration was unwilling to make another end run around Congressional opponents in order to keep Mr. Bolton in his job.

Ending more than a year of controversy surrounding the blunt-spoken ambassador, Mr. Bush issued a strongly worded statement excoriating Mr. Bolton's opponents on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for refusing to send his nomination to the Senate floor for a vote.

"They chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time," Mr. Bush said. "This stubborn obstructionism ill serves our country, and discourages men and women of talent from serving their nation."

Mr. Bush went on to praise Mr. Bolton, a fiery conservative and longtime critic of the United Nations, thanking him for his "advocacy of human rights and human dignity."

Despite the president's strong words, administration officials had largely given up on Mr. Bolton's confirmation last month, after Sen. Lincoln Chafee, a Rhode Island Republican and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, said he would not support it.

It was not immediately clear who would replace Mr. Bolton. The leading candidate appeared to be the American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, who has told colleagues he is ready to leave Baghdad. Others said to be in the running are Richard S. Williamson, former ambassador to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, Sen. Mike DeWine, the Ohio Republican who lost his re-election bid, and R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs.

Mr. Bolton's decision to step down brings to an end the stormy and controversial tenure of an ambassador whose confrontational style often conflicted with the understated ways of the United Nations.

To his critics, he was an abrasive proponent of a hard-line, conservative ideology at odds with the multilateral approach at the United Nations. But his supporters pointed to numerous successes: several Security Council resolutions, including measures seeking to slow or halt the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea and another ending the war in Lebanon and establishing a United Nations peacekeeping force there.

Mr. Chafee, who lost his Senate seat in last month's elections, perhaps best captured the political reality that has engulfed Mr. Bolton since he took office in a recess appointment last year.

"The American people have spoken out against the president's agenda on a number of fronts, and presumably one of those is on foreign policy," Mr. Chafee said last month.

Mr. Chafee's decision might have been the end of the matter. But White House officials began exploring whether the president could somehow bypass the Senate to keep Mr. Bolton at the United Nations, perhaps by naming him to be Mr. Bush's special envoy or to some other post that would not require Senate confirmation.

Mr. Bolton wanted very much to stay at the world body, administration officials said, and Vice President Dick Cheney backed exploration of some way to bypass the Senate. But that course was almost certain to inflame tensions between Congress and the White House, and in the end, Mr. Cheney and Mr. Bolton gave up.

Lea Anne McBride, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, said that Mr. Bolton came to Washington on Thursday and met with the vice president. At the meeting, the two men decided not to press the issue any further. On Friday, Mr. Bolton sent a resignation letter to President Bush.

"After careful consideration, I have concluded that my service in your administration should end when the current recess appointment ends," Mr. Bolton wrote.

President Bush initially appointed Mr. Bolton during a Congressional recess last year after the Foreign Relations Committee sent his nomination to the floor without a recommendation. That term expires at the end of this year. Mr. Bush could give Mr. Bolton a second recess appointment, but under the law he could not be paid for his work.

Administration officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about their internal deliberations, said that they dropped the idea of circumventing the Senate by appointing him to a special position at the United Nations because they did not want another fight.

"That would have been too much for the Senate," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond. "I suppose it could have been done, but it would have undermined Bolton's authority at the U.N."

Mr. Bolton's resignation leaves President Bush with three holes in his national security team: at the United Nations; the State Department, where Ms. Rice's deputy, Robert B. Zoellick, resigned in June; and at the office of the director of National Intelligence, where the job of deputy has been vacant since Michael V. Hayden was named C.I.A. director in May.

How Mr. Bush chooses to fill those jobs could indicate which direction the administration will tilt during its last two years, administration officials and United Nations diplomats said. Since the midterm elections, foreign policy realists have appeared to be ascendant at the expense of more ideological conservatives.

Of those said to be under consideration, Mr. Burns has expressed interest in the job, administration officials said, but he is also Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's most trusted deputy, and she may be unwilling to relinquish him. Administration officials said that an appointment of Mr. Burns, who served under President Clinton as well, might further alienate conservatives who are already unhappy about Mr. Bolton's departure.

United Nations officials sent out a dictate that the official statement would be "no comment" on Mr. Bolton's departure. Secretary General Kofi Annan, buttonholed by reporters after the announcement, was restrained in his remarks. "I think Ambassador Bolton did the job he was expected to do," he said, adding that it is important for ambassadors to "understand that to get concessions, they have to make concessions." <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

U.N. Ambassador Bolton Won't Stay (WP)

By Peter Baker And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

President Bush surrendered to congressional foes yesterday in his fight to install John R. Bolton as permanent ambassador to the United Nations, a harbinger of how the political world has changed since Democrats captured both houses of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0102480

Bush circumvented Senate opposition last year, sending Bolton to the United Nations on a recess appointment, and administration lawyers in recent weeks had developed options to keep him there after that appointment expires this month. But officials said Bolton and the White House decided against provoking an early confrontation with Democrats as they take over Congress next month.

As Bolton's resignation was announced, the White House deliberated on a new nominee, with attention focusing on Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq. The White House also has a crop of Republican lawmakers who lost reelection to consider. A number of senior ambassadors from around the world have expressed interest, but administration officials said Bolton's successor will be a political nominee.

Bolton became the second high-profile member of Bush's national security team, after Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, to announce his departure since the Nov. 7 elections. Bush appeared aggravated at having to abandon Bolton, whose bare-knuckle diplomacy and skepticism of multilateralism made him a favorite of conservatives and a lightning rod for many in the Washington and international establishments.

"I'm not happy about it," Bush said in a one-minute appearance with Bolton before cameras in the Oval Office. "I think he deserved to be confirmed. And the reason why I think he deserved to be confirmed is because I know he did a fabulous job for the country."

In a separate interview with Fox News Channel, Bush said: "On issue after issue, Bolton delivered. And so you're looking at a man who is deeply disappointed, and I would call it shallow politics of the Senate in this case."

Bolton's departure leaves another hole in Bush's foreign policy team at a time when the U.N. ambassador is heavily involved in diplomacy involving the nuclear activities of Iran and North Korea and the ongoing crisis in Lebanon. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been without a deputy since July, when Robert B. Zoellick resigned, and her counselor, Philip D. Zelikow, announced last week that he will depart at the end of the year.

Bolton recast the role of ambassador to the United Nations, a post traditionally filled by prominent Americans who helped explain the organization to Washington. Instead, Bolton relished the role of the body's chief critic, playing down its achievements and regaling congressional committees with its failings.

Still, his encyclopedic knowledge of the United Nations and his tough negotiating style earned him grudging admiration from peers on the Security Council, who credited him with helping pass resolutions demanding that North Korea and Iran restrain their nuclear programs and ending the war between Israel and Hezbollah. Bolton also persuaded the Security Council for the first time to add Burma to its permanent agenda, a long-sought goal of human rights activists.

Edward Luck, director of the Center on International Organization at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs, said Bolton was effective at the 15-member council but faltered trying to build consensus in the much larger General Assembly, particularly in favor of reforms he long advocated. "He's been a strong American ambassador to the Security Council, but unfortunately the Security Council is just one piece of the puzzle up here," Luck said.

Some U.N. officials privately blamed Bolton for sabotaging the organization's reform initiative by stirring differences between poor and rich countries. "He sometimes makes it very difficult to build bridges because he is a very honest and blunt person," said South Africa's ambassador, Dumisani Shadrack Kumalo, chairman of a coalition of developing nations. He said it sometimes appears that "Ambassador Bolton wants to prove nothing works at the United Nations."

Secretary General Kofi Annan reacted coolly to Bolton's announcement: "As a representative of the U.S. government he pressed ahead with the instructions that he had been given, and tried to work as effectively as he could with the other ambassadors."

Bolton's fate was sealed when Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) decided to block his nomination in the Foreign Relations Committee, joining with all Democrats on the panel. Administration lawyers explored ways of keeping him in the job by appointing him to a position that does not require Senate confirmation and then making him "acting ambassador."

Friends said Bolton decided not to put Bush in that position. "More importantly, he felt he had done a very good job, he defended policies he didn't always agree with and he did so ably, and so now he can go out on top," said William Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard, who spoke with Bolton several times in recent weeks.

A senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter, said the White House was eager to avoid a fight as well: "The thought was, 'Okay, at a time we're going to need help from a Democratic Congress on too many things, this is not worth it.' "

Khalilzad, an Afghan American who has served as Bush's envoy in both Kabul and Baghdad, is generally well liked by Democrats. Deputy Chief of Mission Alejandro D. Wolff will fill in until a replacement is confirmed.

Bolton's Exit May Signal A Shift To The Center (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The departure of United Nations Ambassador John Bolton marked another concession by President Bush to the new political realities facing him, and likely pushes his administration more to the center as he heads into his final two years in office.

After last month's Democratic congressional election victories, Mr. Bush ousted hawkish Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and nominated as his successor Robert Gates, a former U.S. intelligence director who served both Republican and Democratic administrations. Mr. Gates's Senate confirmation hearings begin today, and he is expected to be approved without major opposition.

Speculation on Mr. Bolton's successor has focused on the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, who is widely expected to leave his post soon; Andrew Natsios, the special envoy to Sudan; and the undersecretary of state, Paula Dobriansky. It also is possible the White House may figure it is easier to win confirmation for a current or departing member of Congress. Rep. Jim Leach (R., Iowa), who was defeated for re-election last month, once served as a foreign-service officer and was being mentioned by Republicans.

Yesterday, the White House said Mr. Bolton had decided to drop his bid for the U.N. post, after an unsuccessful last-ditch effort to save the nomination. A sometimes cantankerous conservative with strong views on the need to overhaul the U.N., Mr. Bolton received a temporary recess appointment in August 2005, after his nomination stalled. The White House resubmitted his name earlier this year and hoped to win enough votes to advance the nomination.

Political observers say the administration considered putting Mr. Bolton in another post and then making him acting U.N. ambassador, which would allow Mr. Bolton to continue in the job with a salary. With a second recess appointment, Mr. Bolton wouldn't be paid. However, such maneuvering would likely have provoked outrage among critics. In his resignation letter to Mr. Bush, Mr. Bolton said, "I have concluded that my service in your administration should end" when his recess appointment expires at the end of the current Congress.

Alejandro Wolff, Mr. Bolton's deputy, is expected to serve as acting ambassador until a successor is confirmed.

In a brief appearance with Mr. Bolton, Mr. Bush said he is "not happy" about the resignation. "I think he deserved to be confirmed...because I know he did a fabulous job for the country." In a statement, he blamed "a handful of United States senators" for blocking a vote on the nomination. Press Secretary Tony Snow went further, saying the defeat was due to "partisanship and not performance."

At least one former Republican critic, Ohio Sen. George Voinovich, had decided based on Mr. Bolton's performance to support him. Mr. Voinovich said Mr. Bolton has "done a good job under the harshest of circumstances," adding that he is concerned about losing Mr. Bolton's expertise and contacts on such issues as Iran, North Korea and Lebanon.

But many Democrats -- and at least a few Republicans -- raised questions about the nomination. The incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Joseph Biden (D., Del.), said the president "now has an opportunity to nominate an ambassador who can garner strong bipartisan and international support."

Mr. Bolton's nomination initially drew opposition not only because of his conservative foreign-policy philosophy and his views on the U.N., but also because the administration declined to turn over secret National Security Agency intercepts that Mr. Bolton had sought to review. At least some of the concern over his positions and personality softened during his tenure, and Sen. Biden yesterday praised his "intellect, hard work, dedication."

White House officials credit Mr. Bolton with pulling together the often-unwieldy coalitions that must be built at the U.N. over issues such as North Korea's nuclear-weapons program. "He ... has been a highly capable, competent and effective and sometimes very creative diplomat working with other countries, building large coalitions, as well as coalitions within the U.N. Security Council," Mr. Snow said.

Mr. Bolton's resignation suggests the Bush White House is "being forced into the center," said Danielle Pletka of the American Enterprise Institute. "This confirms an inevitable fact of political life, which is that administrations do drift" as they move into the home stretch.

Mr. Bolton's successor could be pivotal in the administration's diplomatic efforts in the Middle East, where the White House is facing pressure to convene an international summit on Iraq that includes Iran and Syria, but that would require heavy U.N. involvement.

The new ambassador will also have to maintain the shaky international consensus on Iran's nuclear program as the administration's high-stakes showdown with Tehran enters a critical phase. The Security Council has been deadlocked for months over Iran, with powerful nations like Russia and China making clear they won't support U.S. language imposing sanctions on Iran. That means the U.S. may be forced to accept a weaker resolution than it initially wanted, complicating the administration's efforts to build a coalition to disarm Iran if necessary.

Bolton Resigns From U.N. Post (LAT)

By Maggie Farley And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

The diplomat knew he couldn't get votes in Senate. Colleagues praise his tenacity but won't miss his rigidity.

UNITED NATIONS — John R. Bolton, the pugnacious U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, is known for not giving up. But after meeting with his mentor Vice President Dick Cheney on Thursday to discuss ways to stay at the U.N. without a Senate confirmation, he decided it was time to quit.

In a letter to President Bush that the White House made public Monday morning, Bolton said: "After careful consideration, I have concluded that my service in your administration should end when the current recess appointment expires."

Bolton's resignation, along with the election of a Democrat-dominated Congress and selection of a new secretary-general, may provide a fresh start for U.N.-U.S. relations that have been tense since the Iraq war began, diplomats said. It also signals that the Bush administration is less willing, or less able, to go around Congress to push through an unpopular agenda.

Bush accepted the resignation Monday with "deep regret."

"I'm not happy about it," the president said in the Oval Office as he thanked Bolton for his service. "I think he deserved to be confirmed. And the reason why I think he deserved to be confirmed is because I know he did a fabulous job for the country."

Bush criticized key senators on the Foreign Relations Committee for blocking Bolton's confirmation, "even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time."

"This stubborn obstructionism ill-serves our country and discourages men and women of talent from serving their nation," Bush said.

In August 2005, Bush installed Bolton at the U.N. during a congressional recess because he couldn't get enough support in the Senate.

Until Thursday, U.S. officials said, the White House was exploring ways to appoint Bolton to a position that would allow him to continue his U.N. duties without facing a confirmation hearing. His term will end with this term of Congress, probably later this month.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Monday that it had "become pretty obvious" that there were insufficient votes in the Senate to confirm Bolton.

The president singled out Bolton's efforts to obtain unanimous Security Council support for resolutions on North Korea's military and nuclear activities. He also praised him for helping bring pressure on Iran to suspend uranium enrichment and for working to bring peace to Darfur.

At the United Nations, where most of his colleagues maintain a grudging respect for Bolton's tenacity, intellect and clear positions, there were mixed reactions to word of his resignation. His style alienated European nations that have typically been allies, and other colleagues said that he might have accomplished more if he were less rigid and abrasive.

When Bolton took over the rotating Security Council presidency in February, he declared that things would be different: The council would start on time, and diplomats would abandon their set speeches and engage in unscripted discussion of the issues. His fellow ambassadors started calling him "the schoolmarm," reflecting thinly veiled resentment.

"Starting on time is a form of discipline," he said at the time. "I brought the gavel down at 10. I was the only one in the room, though."

"His absence will be conspicuous," said Tanzanian Ambassador Augustine Mahiga, who sits near Bolton in the Security Council. "He leaves the U.N. with the reputation as someone not easy to deal with. His style tended to be quite imposing, maybe well-intentioned, but creating difficulties in developing consensus."

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya has often been on the opposite side of issues, such as Darfur and Iran, but said he respected Bolton's diligence and command of the facts. "He is serious about the American objectives here in reforming the United Nations, and he pushed hard," Wang told reporters. "But of course sometimes in order to achieve the objective you have to work together with others."

Another ambassador said that when he couldn't work with Bolton, he would work around him. "When he was blocking the way, we would just call Condi," he said, referring to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. "Many times, Condi was much more cooperative."

There was near celebration on the 38th floor, where Kofi Annan and his Cabinet sit. Annan and Bolton have a prickly relationship, and Annan, in a rare show of indignation, recently accused the U.S. ambassador of "intimidation." Deputy Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown, a vocal critic who has engaged in public arguments with Bolton, was restrained Monday.

"John Bolton's problem is last month's election, not the U.N. But obviously, while one admired his skillful use of the media, we longed for an American partner who could really work with us to achieve reform here. And when he couldn't, we often had to work around him with others."

"He certainly enjoyed a significant amount of respect for the clarity and firmness of his analysis, for being innovative, for being willing to do things differently," said Colin Keating, executive director of the Security Council Report, a think tank based at Columbia University.

Keating said that Bolton could not be blamed for the lack of progress on Iran and Sudan, nor could he be credited solely for obtaining unanimous support for resolutions on North Korea sanctions and a cease-fire in Lebanon.

But even his critics acknowledge that getting the council to discuss human rights and drug trafficking in Myanmar, formerly Burma, was a major accomplishment in the face of opposition from China.

"The process of getting that on the agenda is quite a significant achievement," Keating said. "It took a high degree of professionalism."

Bolton's successor will walk into the middle of sensitive discussions on Iran's nuclear program, the Sudanese government's resistance to peacekeepers in Darfur, security issues in Lebanon and Somalia, and the U.N.'s involvement in Iraq.

That makes Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq who has just announced his departure, a much-talked-about candidate to replace Bolton. Some U.N. officials, however, worry that choosing him would signal a U.S. desire to use the U.N. to facilitate a hasty exit from Iraq.

Former U.S. Deputy Ambassador to the United Nations Richard Williamson also has been approached for the job. Other names mentioned are George J. Mitchell, a former Democratic senator from Maine; Paula J. Dobriansky, the undersecretary of State for global affairs; and Jim Leach, a former Republican congressman from Iowa who has good relations with Democrats.

Bolton Resigns As US Ambassador To UN (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Mark Turner

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

The White House on Monday bowed to the political realities imposed by the new Democratic Congress when it accepted John Bolton's resignation as Ambassador to the United Nations, ending his combative, controversial tenure.

His departure marks the second high profile resignation of Mr Bush's long serving foreign policy team after the November mid-term elections. Tony Snow, White House spokesman, admitted defeat saying, it was "pretty obvious" he wasn't going to get the votes from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr Bolton had become to his critics an unpopular symbol of an aggressive, unilateralist style of US foreign policy. President George W. Bush on Monday hailed his record and his "extraordinary dedication and skill, assembling coalitions that addressed some of the most consequential issues facing the international community," such as the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea.

The White House decision last month to re-nominate Mr Bolton – who had needed to be imposed in a recess appointment – was seen by some political analysts as a strategic mistake, undermining Mr Bush's immediate rhetoric of bi-partisanship and was always doomed to fail. Joe Biden, the incoming Democrat chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, warned he saw no point in reconsidering it.

"The administration made a minor mistake over John Bolton," said Vin Weber, a Republican strategist. "His resignation is a recognition of the fact the administration is in the process of sorting out what its new relationship with Capital Hill looks like."

However, Norm Ornstein, resident scholar fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, said it had made sense to pursue it, even if failure was inevitable. "It was a balancing act with his conservative base, and an effort to show some loyalty."

The White House was reluctant to present it as a conciliatory move for Democrats. Mr Bush blamed "stubborn obstructionism," while Mr Snow said the "appointments process is broken," and charged that "for reasons of partisanship a handful of senators prevented him remaining UN ambassador."

Opposition to Mr Bolton was not just confined to Democrats. Lincoln Chafee, a Republican moderate who lost his Senate seat, also blocked Mr Bolton's nomination. Democrats, such as Senator John Kerry, were quick to claim a scalp. "Like Secretary Rumsfeld's departure, Ambassador Bolton's resignation offers a chance to turn the page at a critical period." He called for a new ambassador "who has the full support of Congress," and "who can put results ahead of ideology."

Mr Bolton will leave at the end of lame duck congressional session. The announcement comes at a difficult time for the UN. While Mr Bolton saw through several important UN resolutions on Lebanon, Iran and other trouble spots over recent months, the permanent five are once more struggling to make policy on the fast-evolving situation around the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0102484

Talks on Iran are currently being held by political directors, not ambassadors, but the dossier is expected to return to the UN before Christmas. Serious challenges remain in Darfur, Somalia and Lebanon; and the UN is still struggling to find a way through on internal reforms.

Bolton's Goodbye: Bowing To The Inevitable (TIME)

By Adam Zagorin

Time, December 5, 2006

The resignation of John Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations marks another acknowledgement by the White House of the political consequences of the Nov. 7 Congressional elections.

A longtime critic of the U.N. and its bureaucracy, Bolton was opposed by Democrats, and even a few Republicans, who regarded him as too confrontational for the job, and he was unable to win support in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee when Bush first nominated him last year. Rather than accept that rejection, however, the President gave Bolton a "recess" appointment in August 2005, allowing him to take up the high-profile U.N. post without Senate approval.

But with that appointment set to expire at the end of the current Congress and a new Democratic majority about to take control, Bolton announced his resignation Monday. President Bush, in a statement, continued to express support. "I am deeply disappointed that a handful of United States Senators prevented Ambassador Bolton from receiving the up or down vote he deserved in the Senate," Bush said. "They chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time. This stubborn obstructionism ill serves our country, and discourages men and women of talent from serving their nation."

But the White House had essentially acknowledged the futility of keeping Bolton in the post by resubmitting his nomination at the worst possible moment — on the morning of Nov. 9, just as the Democrats were celebrating their election victory. Sen. Richard Lugar, the Indiana Republican who chairs the Senate Foreign Relations committee , said he would not even put the matter to a committee vote during the last days of GOP control, since all of the Democrats on the committee, plus Sen. Lincoln Chaffee, the Rhode Island Republican who also opposed him, would still vote no.

Chafee, who was defeated for reelection, issued a statement reiterating his opposition. " Mr. Bolton did not demonstrate the kind of collaborative approach that I believe will be called for if we are to restore the United States ' position as the strongest country in a peaceful world," he said. "This would be an appropriate time to choose a nominee who has a proven ability to work with both sides of the political aisle, a history of building strong international relationships and a reputation of respect for the institution of the United Nations. The names Brent Scowcroft and George Mitchell come to mind immediately as outstanding candidates. " There's no word from White House yet on whom it might nominate as Bolton's replacement.

Even without Senate confirmation, Bush could have put Bolton's name up for a new recess appointment when his current one expires in early January, but Bolton would have been prohibited by law from drawing a salary. More important, such an attempt by the White House to again override the Senate by sending Bolton back to the U.N. risked infuriating Democrats and undermining Bush's professed intention to seek consensus and political compromise.

Bolton was known as a vitriolic critic of the UN, who once famously announced that no one would notice if the world body lost the top 10 floors of its Secretariat building in New York. After he became ambassador, however, colleagues accorded him grudging respect for his professionalism in helping to win unanimous Security Council resolutions on North Korea, and in fostering consensus on tough issues like Iran's nuclear program and the conflict in Sudan.

One former critic, Sen. George V. Voinovich, the Ohio Republican whose initial opposition to Bolton doomed his Senate approval last year, revealed a change of heart on Bolton a few months ago. " I am very disappointed that John Bolton will not continue in his role as ambassador to the United Nations," Voinivich said in a statement after the resignation. "Given the fragile nature of the world situation, and the critical task of reforming the U.N., he should have been given an up-or-down vote on the Senate floor."

Another Senator offering support was John McCain, a frontrunner for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. "His resignation today is less a commentary on Mr. Bolton than on the state of affairs in the U.S. Senate," said McCain. "For over a year, Democrats blocked his nomination in the Foreign Relations Committee, preventing an up or down vote on the Senate floor. In so doing, they have deprived America of the right man at the right time at the U.N.

Bolton Quits Fight For U.N. Nomination (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

President Bush yesterday accepted John R. Bolton's resignation as U.N. ambassador, giving in to the objections of Senate Democrats and one Republican a month after the White House pledged to push to confirm him.

DOJ_NMG_0102485

Mr. Bolton had been serving as a temporary "recess appointment" since August 2005, but his busy term was not enough to persuade Senate critics to give him full approval for the top U.S. job at the United Nations.

"I'm not happy about it. I think he deserved to be confirmed," Mr. Bush said at the White House yesterday after accepting Mr. Bolton's resignation in person in the Oval Office.

Republican leaders had wanted to force another vote on Mr. Bolton's nomination before the end of the year, when Democrats assume control of Congress. But in Mr. Bolton's Dec. 1 resignation letter, he said the fight was over and he would end his service in the Bush administration when his temporary post expires, when Congress adjourns this year.

The White House said Mr. Bolton's letter also ended the possibility of keeping him on the job, which they could have done by creating another similar position and giving him a recess appointment to it.

His departure will leave Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with three major vacancies to fill. Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, the department's second-in-command, left for Wall Street in July, and Philip Zelikow, the department counselor and a top confidant of the secretary, announced last month he plans to return to his teaching job at the University of Virginia in January.

The Bloomberg News service reported yesterday that U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad may soon be leaving Baghdad and is a leading candidate to fill one of the top vacancies.

White House press secretary Tony Snow said Mr. Bolton's departure showed the confirmation process was broken, and he blamed partisan obstruction.

But lawmakers on Capitol Hill said Mr. Bolton couldn't have even gotten out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee under Republican control because one Republican committee member, Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, opposed him, denying him majority support to proceed for a floor vote.

"It basically fell because of the fact that Lincoln Chafee changed his mind and [Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard G.] Lugar couldn't bring it to committee because he wouldn't have the votes to get it out of the committee," said Sen. George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican.

Mr. Voinovich, an early opponent of Mr. Bolton's who later became his champion, said in an interview yesterday that Mr. Bolton had become "a team player" who didn't stray from the Bush administration's policy during his time as ambassador.

Mr. Bolton's departure comes as the United Nations is grappling with developing nuclear weapons programs in North Korea and Iran and upheaval in Lebanon.

Mr. Bolton worked on U.N. agreements on each of those issues, and Mr. Voinovich said he fears the loss of continuity. He said on the Lebanon resolution in particular, he doubts Israel would have signed off without Mr. Bolton's firm assurances.

Outgoing U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Mr. Bolton "did the job he was expected to do."

"He came at a time when we had lots of tough issues. As a representative of the U.S. government, he pressed ahead with the instructions that he had been given, and tried to work as effectively with the other ambassadors," he said.

But Democrats said the resignation gives Mr. Bush a chance to show he can be bipartisan and respond to the needs of the international community.

"This is an opportunity for the president to appoint a United Nations ambassador who enjoys the support necessary to unite our country and the world and who can put results ahead of ideology," said Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat.

Mr. Bolton's nomination had previously passed out of committee but had been blocked by a Democratic filibuster, failing on May 26, 2005, by a 56-42 vote and on June 20, 2005, by a 54-38 vote.

At The U.N., A Mixed View Of Bolton's Tenure (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 4 — The announcement on Monday of John R. Bolton's decision to step down was greeted by United Nations officials with relief, while diplomats from other nations offered mixed assessments of his effectiveness during his 17 months as the American envoy.

" 'No comment,' he said with a smile," Mark Malloch Brown, the deputy secretary general, said over his shoulder to reporters as he hustled to a meeting.

Mr. Malloch Brown had angered Mr. Bolton during the summer by accusing the United States of "stealth diplomacy" — turning to the United Nations when Washington needed it while showing public disdain for the institution.

At the time, Mr. Bolton demanded that Secretary General Kofi Annan "personally and publicly" repudiate Mr. Malloch Brown's remarks, but Mr. Annan stood by them.

Mr. Bolton's relationship with Mr. Annan was also marked by testiness, with the American repeatedly ducking opportunities to commend Mr. Annan by declining comment or saying, as he did last month, "I'll pass."

DOJ_NMG_0102486

A year ago, at a monthly lunch for Security Council ambassadors, Mr. Annan signaled how deep the divide had become by chastising Mr. Bolton for trying to “intimidate” him.

Security Council ambassadors said they respected Mr. Bolton’s professionalism and command of the subject matter, and thought he had represented the Bush administration’s foreign policy goals well.

On the other hand, they said his manner, often described as abrupt, unyielding and confrontational, had alienated traditional American allies and undercut American influence.

They said that in areas where he was clearly taking his instructions from Washington, he performed well, but that in pursuing the objective on which he planted his personal stamp — overhauling the sclerotic United Nations management — he had been unsuccessful.

But even Mr. Bolton’s success in championing the administration’s policy represented a problem for him: At the United Nations, that policy is perceived as disdainful of diplomacy and single-minded in its assertion of American interests.

“I think he was serious about the American objective here of reforming the United Nations, and he pushed hard,” said Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador. “But of course, sometimes in order to achieve the objective, you have to work together with others.”

Another Council envoy, Adamantios Vassilakis of Greece, said, “Sometimes it was not easy, but we managed to find a solution whenever I dealt with him.”

Augustine P. Mahiga, the ambassador of Tanzania, also a Council member, said Mr. Bolton’s style, which he described as “abrasive and not very helpful to amenable consensus,” had deepened the divisions between the developing world and the great powers.

“He will be remembered, of course, for his principled stand on various issues,” Mr. Mahiga said, “but at the same time, he was the person who could have done it differently in order to minimize the negative perceptions of the positions of the United States.”

Mr. Vassilakis said he thought Mr. Bolton had been particularly effective in obtaining backing for resolutions condemning North Korea’s nuclear program, but less so in gaining support for joint action against Iran’s nuclear program. “But then, Iran is more complicated,” he said.

Mr. Bolton is leaving his post just weeks before Mr. Annan, who completes his second five-year term on Dec. 31, leaves his. “Yes,” Mr. Annan said Monday, “we are both graduating together.” <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Bush Accepts Bolton's U.N. Resignation (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, December 5, 2006

Lacking the votes to keep his job, embattled U.N. Ambassador John Bolton said Monday he would resign, a defeat for a chagrined President Bush who had clung to hopes of Senate confirmation.

Bolton got the position in August 2005, appointed by Bush when Congress was in recess. With that temporary assignment about to expire, and his long fight for confirmation going nowhere, Bolton made it official.

He handed in a resignation letter that did not mention the political fight behind it. It said simply: "I have concluded that my service in your administration should end when the current recess appointment expires."

"I accepted. I'm not happy about it," Bush said Monday afternoon in the Oval Office, with Bolton at his side. Bush did not name a replacement, and officials offered no timetable for an announcement.

The setback for the White House seemed to put a hold on the postelection talk of bipartisanship.

Bush considered Bolton a strong voice as the U.N. dealt with crises in Iraq, Lebanon, North Korea and other complex matters around the world. Bolton also pushed the administration's effort to reform the United Nations.

But Democrats opposed Bolton, whom they viewed as a brusque, ill-suited diplomat. Some Republicans helped scuttle his nomination, including moderate Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island.

The president had stinging words for them.

"They chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time," Bush said in a statement. "This stubborn obstructionism ill serves our country."

Democrats, though, said Bolton's resignation signaled a fresh start.

"Hopefully this change marks a shift from the failed go-it-alone strategies that have left America less safe," said the incoming Senate majority leader, Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada.

DOJ_NMG_0102487

"With the Middle East on the verge of chaos and the nuclear threats from Iran and North Korea increasing, we need a United Nations ambassador who has the full support of Congress and can help rally the international community to tackle the serious threats we face," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass.

Bolton's nomination had languished in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for more than a year. The White House made a renewed push for him after Democrats won control of Congress in November.

But it became clear that "there were not going to be the votes" to get the nomination out of committee, said White House spokesman Tony Snow. He suggested the entire confirmation process was broken.

"If bipartisanship is to succeed, perhaps we ought to make sure that people who serve their country ably and well are sent the signal that 'Your services will be treasured,'" Snow said.

Bolton, a 57-year-old arms control expert, came to the job with a reputation for brilliance, obstinacy and speaking his mind — and with a mission to reform the 61-year-old world body born in the ashes of World War II.

By his own account, Bolton remains frustrated that "precious little" reform has been accomplished so far by the U.N. General Assembly, though some diplomats would at least partly blame Bolton's blunt tactics.

But Bolton did play a key role in major U.S. foreign policy initiatives — getting U.N. Security Council approval of resolutions imposing sanctions on North Korea for conducting a nuclear test, joining with France to promote Lebanon's democratic government, pushing for a U.N. peacekeeping force in Sudan's conflict-wracked Darfur region and putting Myanmar's repressive military regime on the council's agenda.

Bolton has had strained relations with many in the U.N. Secretariat, led by Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

"I think Ambassador Bolton did the job he was expected to do," Annan said Monday. "He came at a time when we had lots of tough issues from reform to issues on Iran and North Korea. I think as a representative of the U.S. government, he pressed ahead with the instructions he had been given."

Republicans blamed the Democrats for Bolton's ouster.

"It also unfairly undermines President Bush's prerogative to appoint his own people to his team," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C. "There's no doubt Bolton is extremely qualified and has done tremendous work."

Bush gave Bolton the job temporarily, circumventing a Congress in recess in 2005. Under that process, the appointment expires when Congress formally adjourns, no later than early January.

While Bush could not give Bolton another recess appointment, the White House was believed to be exploring other ways of keeping him in the job, perhaps by giving him a title other than ambassador. But Bolton told the White House he intended to leave, period.

Chafee Going Down Swining (PTC)

By Jim Baron

Pawtucket Times Chafee, Bolton, December 5, 2006

In what may be his last significant action as a U.S. Senator, Republican Lincoln Chafee has withheld his support from United Nations Ambassador John Bolton, killing the controversial delegate's chances to be permanently confirmed in the job and prompting Bolton to resign from the post, perhaps as early as the end of this week.

President George W. Bush named Bolton as a "recess appointment" when Congress was out of session in August, 2005, meaning his commission would expire with the end of the the current Congressional session, tentatively scheduled for Friday. Bush said Monday that he accepted Bolton's resignation with "deep regret," adding, "All Americans owe John Bolton their gratitude for a job well done."

Chafee's opposition to Bolton as a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee "was what made it not happen," said Chafee spokesman Steven Hourahan. "Without his vote in committee, it wasn't going to go."

Hourahan said Chafee was "very comfortable" with his decision to effectively remove Bolton as ambassador. He said it was "clear that the the American people sent a message," in the November election that they were unhappy with Bolton's confrontational style and the Bush administration's foreign policy.

He said Chafee hopes the president will use this opportunity "to put someone in there who is more of a uniter."

In a written statement issued Monday, Chafee said: ""I have long believed that the go-it-alone philosophy that has driven this administration's approach to international relations has damaged our leadership position in the world.

"Mr. Bolton did not demonstrate the kind of collaborative approach that I believe will be called for if we are to restore the United States' position as the strongest country in a peaceful world," the senator said. "This would be an appropriate time to choose a nominee who has a proven ability to work with both sides of the political aisle, a history of building strong international relationships and a reputation of respect for the institution of the United Nations."

That sentiment was echoed by the Democratic members of Rhode Island's congressional delegation.

Sen. Jack Reed said, "A bipartisan group of Senators in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee refused to confirm John Bolton because he wasn't the right person to represent American interests at the U.N.

"Ambassador Bolton's resignation should signal the end of this President's unilateral approach to foreign policy," Reed asserted. "This is a chance for the United States to diplomatically reengage at the U.N. and work with our allies and other member nations to confront global security challenges, especially in Iraq and Afghanistan. I hope the President will use this opportunity to nominate a candidate who can garner broad bipartisan support and who can help build consensus and protect our national interests."

Rep. Patrick Kennedy allowed that, "John Bolton should be commended for his many years of public service."

But, Kennedy added, "now more than ever, this country needs a more pragmatic, more effective, and more consensus-oriented Ambassador, who can build bipartisan and international support while effectively representing the interests of the United States at the United Nations."

Rep. James Langevin believes Bolton's decision to resign "was the right one," said spokeswoman Joy Fox. Pointing to geopolitical crises in places such as Darfur, North Korea, Lebanon and Iraq, Fox said Langevin "hopes the president will take this opportunity to nominate someone who can work cooperatively in the United Nations."

In a statement made after meeting with Bolton on Monday, Bush blasted the appointee's opponents in no uncertain terms.

"I am deeply disappointed that a handful of United States Senators prevented Ambassador Bolton from receiving the up or down vote he deserved in the Senate," the president said. "They chose to obstruct his confirmation, even though he enjoys majority support in the Senate, and even though their tactics will disrupt our diplomatic work at a sensitive and important time. This stubborn obstructionism ill serves our country, and discourages men and women of talent from serving their nation.

Bush said Bolton "served his country with extraordinary dedication and skill, assembling coalitions that addressed some of the most consequential issues facing the international community. During his tenure, he articulately advocated the positions and values of the United States and advanced the expansion of democracy and liberty. I appointed Ambassador Bolton because I knew he would represent America's values and effectively confront difficult problems at the United Nations."

Ben Chang, deputy spokesman for the United States Mission to the United Nations, declined to comment on Bolton's resignation or Chafee's part in it, and referred to Bush's statement after meeting with Bolton.

Asked about reports that former Democratic Sen. George Mitchell of Maine was being considered as a possible replacement for Bolton, Hourahan said Chafee thinks "Mitchell did a good job in Ireland" negotiating peace in that troubled land. "He has experience bringing allies together. He would be a good choice."

His Confirmation In Doubt, John Bolton Exits The UN (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON

US Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton isn't known for being diplomatic.

Last week, when the UN Human Rights Council declined to criticize the Sudanese government's complicity in Darfur atrocities, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan issued a carefully worded critical statement. Mr. Bolton issued a thunderbolt.

The action was "another example of the poor performance of the Human Rights Council, another reason why those who advocated going ahead with this council will have a heavy burden to bear," said Bolton.

Whether these words were deserved or not, they were reflective of a style which in the end undid his UN posting. With his path to Senate confirmation appearing blocked, Bolton announced Monday that he will step down when his temporary appointment expires within weeks.

President Bush said he accepted Bolton's decision with deep regret. "He served his country with extraordinary dedication and skill, assembling coalitions that addressed some of the most consequential issues facing the international community," Mr. Bush said in a statement.

Critics claimed that Bolton's brusqueness made him counterproductive. At the UN, he alienated US allies, both real and potential, according to his critics. Many Senate Democrats - and a few Republicans - charged that his hard-line ideology and penchant for confrontation was at odds with the UN's multilateral nature.

Bolton's defenders insist that he has done well at the UN headquarters in New York, pushing through tough Security Council resolutions on North Korea's nuclear activities, building consensus among allies on the need for Iran to suspend its enrichment of uranium, and pressing for peace in Darfur.

"US participation at the United Nations is not about winning popularity contests or engaging in feel-good, back-slapping exercises. It is about steadfast leadership and the advancement of clear principles and ideals," writes Heritage Foundation foreign policy expert Nile Gardiner in an examination of Bolton's record.

DOJ_NMG_0102489

As recently as November the administration appeared intent on fighting to keep Bolton in his current position.

The incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. Joe Biden (D) of Delaware recently said he saw "no point" in bringing Bolton's nomination before the panel, given the opposition in the chamber to confirming him in the post.

Administration officials were searching for ways to possibly circumvent the Senate, perhaps by giving him a title other than ambassador or by again giving him a temporary, recess appointment.

In the end, Bolton may have decided to simply take himself out of the running.

His letter of resignation to Bush, dated Dec. 1, was brief and to the point. "I have concluded that my service in your [administration] should end when the current recess appointment expires," Bolton wrote.

Mr. Bolton Resigns (NYT)

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

John Bolton's decision to resign as America's envoy to the United Nations was a wise move. He averted a distracting and divisive fight at a time when both Congress and the Bush administration have better things to do. He has also provided President Bush with an opportunity to show the kind of bipartisan leadership he talks about so frequently and exercises so seldom.

This page opposed Mr. Bolton's nomination in the first place, arguing that at the very minimum, an ambassador to the United Nations should be someone who believed the organization deserved to exist. Mr. Bolton has always been hostile to the U.N., and to the whole spirit of consensus-seeking diplomacy it embodies. When Democrats and moderate Republicans kept the nomination tied up in the Senate, Mr. Bush characteristically insisted on having his own way by giving Mr. Bolton an interim appointment while Congress was out of session.

But the interim appointment was about to expire, and the battle would have had to begin all over again once the new Congress arrived. Attempts to get the lame duck Senate to confirm Mr. Bolton ran aground when Lincoln Chafee, the Republican senator from Rhode Island, refused to support the nomination in the Foreign Relations Committee, leaving Mr. Bolton's fate hung up on a tie vote.

Mr. Chafee is the prime example of a moderate Republican who was popular with his constituents but who lost his seat because of Mr. Bush's hard-edge partisanship and insistence on having his own way in Iraq. The White House was left contemplating schemes to keep Mr. Bolton at work without Senate confirmation — like making him deputy ambassador and leaving the top job unfilled.

The United Nations doesn't need any further proof of how little the Bush administration thinks of it. And the Bush administration doesn't need to insult the world at a time when it is becoming increasingly clear how much help the United States needs to stabilize Afghanistan, extricate itself from Iraq, and curb the nuclear appetites of North Korea and Iran. Mr. Bolton's withdrawal gives the president a chance to improve his relationship with both the U.N. and Congress. There are plenty of experienced, internationalist Republicans who could get near-unanimous support in the Senate and send a signal to the world that Mr. Bush understands that the United States is not the only nation on the planet whose opinion matters.

Bolton Departs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

If one measure of a man is his enemies, then John Bolton must have done something right during his six years in the Bush Administration. Yesterday's announcement that Mr. Bolton will resign as U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations when his recess appointment ends with this Congress was no doubt cheered in Tehran, Damascus, Caracas, Pyongyang, and Christopher Dodd's Senate office.

Mr. Bolton served with exemplary tact at Turtle Bay, notwithstanding critics who said he wouldn't. More important, he has stood forcefully for American interests despite the leaks and sniping from the office of Secretary General Kofi Annan. He helped to corral votes for resolutions isolating Iran and North Korea for their nuclear programs. He was assailed for leading the fight against Mr. Annan's "reformed" Human Rights Council, but he and the U.S. are now looking prescient as that Council descends into one more Israel-bashing cabal. He also fought harder for U.N. reform than have his critics who claim to want that corrupt institution to lead the world in providing collective security.

"Realism" is back in foreign policy fashion (see the editorial on Iran1), and we only wish some of that school's alleged practitioners were as realistic as Mr. Bolton. He has understood that the essence of realism is, or ought to be, to see the world as it is and speak with moral clarity about it. He offended America's enemies because he looked at their behavior and refused to excuse it. This is discomfiting to those who prefer to believe that every enemy can be appeased with talk, and that every dispute can be settled with a treaty.

It is no small diplomatic irony that, as an Undersecretary at the State Department in President Bush's first term, Mr. Bolton organized the Proliferation Security Initiative that is the one effective multilateral restraint against the spread of WMD. And it does not speak well for the American political system that it can't find a place in government at this dangerous moment in history for one of the world's leading anti-proliferation experts.

The decision by newly ascendant Democrats -- Mr. Dodd in particular -- to deny Mr. Bolton a confirmation vote on the Senate floor shows that they value partisan animosity above having a seasoned negotiator at the U.N. Mr. Bolton's graceful exit yesterday is further evidence that he deserved better, but so did American interests.

The Second Time Around For Bob Gates (TIME)

By Doug Waller

Time, December 5, 2006

Robert Gates, who begins his confirmation hearing Tuesday as President Bush's choice to replace Donald Rumsfeld as Secretary of Defense, is expected to have little trouble winning Senate approval. Even Democrats who have had issues with Gates in the past are anxious to begin course corrections in the Pentagon's troubled Iraq war strategy. And means the hearings will most likely be a far cry from the last ones Gates faced — when George Herbert Walker Bush picked Gates to be CIA director in 1991.

Gatess came to that hearing with baggage, having withdrawn his nomination to be CIA director four years earlier because of questions raised about his role in the Iran-contra affair. By 1991, the Berlin Wall had fallen, but Gates's nomination to be the nation's top spy reopened an intense debate that had been festering within U.S. intelligence since the dawn of the Cold War: How big a threat was the Soviet Union?

Ironically, his second nomination to be CIA director was almost sunk by the same accusation the current Bush administration has faced on Iraq — that intelligence was slanted to suit hard-line policies toward an enemy. During highly charged confirmation hearings in the fall of 1991, which were unprecedented for an agency that usually keeps its bureaucratic battles shrouded in secrecy, past and current CIA employees accused Gates of cooking the books on the Soviet threat. As then-Director William Casey's intelligence analysis chief and later deputy director in the 1980s, Gates had shaped intelligence reports to suit Casey's and Ronald Reagan's anti-Soviet agenda, agency critics charged.

The Defense Intelligence Agency under Reagan routinely inflated Soviet threat assessments to bolster the Pentagon's case for a military buildup. But a debate had been long running within the CIA's Office of Soviet Analysis (SOVA) over whether the Russian military was ahead of the U.S. Many CIA analysts were convinced Moscow was actually lagging behind. Melvin Goodman, a former division chief in SOVA, testified at Gates's hearing that "Casey seized on every opportunity to exaggerate the Soviet threat... Gates's role in this activity was to corrupt the process and the ethics of intelligence on all of these issues... He pandered to Casey's agenda." Goodman accused Gates of trying to change SOVA reports stating that the Soviet empire was in decline. Two other CIA analysts who were still in the agency at the time also sent in sworn affidavits to the Senate Intelligence Committee accusing Gates of politicizing intelligence.

Goodman also charged that Gates personally rewrote a 1985 CIA report on the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II so it would prove Casey's belief that Moscow was behind the shooting, even though agency analysts had no conclusive evidence establishing Soviet complicity in the plot. A later internal CIA review panel report concluded that there had in fact been "serious shortcomings" in how the reports were produced and charged that "alternate explanations" that disproved a Soviet conspiracy "were not adequately examined."

Gates had his defenders at the hearing, such as Lawrence Gershwin (the CIA's national intelligence officer for strategic programs) and Douglas MacEachin (head of the agency's arms control intelligence staff), who insisted that Gates never biased intelligence. Graham Fuller, a Gates colleague at the CIA, contended that many of the analysts in SOVA were themselves guilty of liberal bias, painting the Soviet Union as too benign, to compensate for Casey's conservative views. Gates's defenders, who also included then-Sen. Warren Rudman, claimed Gates was a victim of character assassination by the left. Armed with his own set of documents, an angry Gates marched into the committee room with a detailed 20-point rebuttal of the politicization charges. He accused critics from the agency of being malcontents who mistook professional editing of their reports for political pressure.

Gates also could be a ruthless manager, and he admitted during the hearing that in a popularity contest, "I sure as hell wouldn't win one at CIA." Gates's vigorous rebuttal saved his nomination, although 31 Democrats voted against him on the floor — an unprecedented number for a CIA nominee. But the Gates furor soon died down, and during his three years as CIA director he was widely praised inside and out of the agency for being an effective and fair manager. "I never saw him or anyone around him trying to cook the intelligence on Iraq," says Judith Yaphe, who served under Gates as the agency's senior analyst on Iraq and now teaches at the National Defense University. "Gates was just the opposite. You were told this is what we need and look ahead. I never was told what to write."

Goodman, who is now a senior fellow with the Center for International Policy, a foreign affairs think tank in Washington, says he was " shocked" when he learned of Gates's nomination to be defense chief. "He's a terrible micromanager and I just can't see him existing in that Pentagon structure." But Gates, 63, has won friends among both Republican and Democratic foreign policy gurus. "Bob Gates is a pragmatist and problem solver," says Richard Holbrooke, U.N. ambassador during the Clinton Administration.

Senate Democrats appear willing to let bygones be bygones. One of the senators who voted against Gates in 1991 was Carl Levin, who takes over as Armed Services Committee chairman next year. "Fifteen years have passed since that vote," Levin says. "I'm going to want to consider what his record has been since then — his thinking and writing since then. And I'm going to give it a fair and fresh look."

Only 10 senators who voted against Gates in 1991 remain in the Senate. And Democratic senators who weren't in the chamber back in 1991 don't seem inclined to dredge up an old dispute. "I've gotten to know him over the last several years," says Jack Reed, an influential Armed Services Committee member. "And he strikes me as someone who's a pragmatist. He strikes me also as somebody who will listen, particularly to the uniformed services. In that respect, he'll be a very pleasant change from Secretary Rumsfeld." —with reporting by Massimo Calabresi

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

SO UNPOPULAR IS Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, and such is Washington's eagerness to be rid of him, that the Senate Armed Services Committee is expected to take no more than a day to question his anointed successor, Robert M. Gates.

A former CIA director, Gates is a shoo-in. But senators should nevertheless use his confirmation hearings, slated to begin today, to put Gates on notice that he will have to reestablish the trust of Congress and the American people about whether to believe what the military — and other agencies — say about intelligence matters.

Allegations that Gates has in the past edited intelligence to suit his political superiors are certainly disturbing. Particularly worrisome is his alleged pattern of misjudging the capabilities of enemy states — the former Soviet Union and Iran — in precisely the ways that his political masters were bound to find most pleasing.

But the point of these hearings is not to rehash Gates' past. It is to establish what he has learned from his mistakes and how he intends to prevent the Pentagon from repeating them.

Not long ago, such questions would have been better addressed to the director of the Central Intelligence Agency. But under Rumsfeld, the Pentagon's intelligence operations have become extensive while congressional oversight has not kept pace. And the GOP-dominated Senate Intelligence Committee failed to challenge CIA Director Michael V. Hayden when he gave superficial answers during his confirmation hearings last May.

The struggle against Islamic terrorism requires intelligence that is not corrupted by politics. Senators should ask Gates questions designed to ensure that the intelligence the nation's leaders will use to make tactical and strategic decisions be as untainted as possible.

How, for instance, does he plan to reassure the military and civilian intelligence collectors and analysts in the Defense Department that their findings will be welcomed, even when they disagree with his own conclusions? How will he discourage the common practice of "stovepiping," by which officials pass on — or retrieve — raw intelligence and use it without subjecting it to sufficient scrutiny? What will he do to minimize bureaucratic duplication and competition among the various defense intelligence agencies, the CIA and the National Security Agency? What lessons from the intelligence failures and successes of Iraq would he bring to the Pentagon, and how?

Senators might also ask Gates about reports that a unit sounding extraordinarily similar to the one accused of manipulating the intelligence on Iraq has been set up inside the Pentagon to coordinate intelligence on Iran.

Gates has the requisite background for the job and the brains to do it well. Senators should use his answers to these and similar questions to judge his fitness for office and his performance when he gets there.

Wage Bill Set For Fast Track In January (USAT)

USA Today, December 5, 2006

Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi wants to fast-track efforts to boost the federal minimum wage and could seek to bring a bill directly to the House floor in January, her spokesman said Monday. Pelosi's preference is for a “stand alone” minimum-wage bill that is not tied to other legislative endeavors.

The bill probably will go straight to the floor for consideration, bypassing the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly, lobbyists and others involved in the process.

The legislation is likely to call for a phased-in increase in the current federal minimum wage of $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour along the lines of a proposal written by Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., the incoming chairman of the committee.

DOJ_NMG_0102492

Pelosi, D-Calif., has made it clear that raising the federal minimum wage is a top priority in the first 100 hours of legislative business when the Democratic-controlled House convenes Jan. 4.

Kansas Gov. Sebeliusto head Democratic group

Kansas Gov. Kathleen Sebelius will assume the chairmanship of the Democratic Governors Association next year as the party enjoys its first gubernatorial majority in 12 years, officials said.

Sebelius, who was elected to a second term last month, will succeed New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, officials told the Associated Press. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid upstaging an official announcement Wednesday.

Michigan's Levin to seeksixth term in Senate

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said he will seek re-election in 2008. Levin, 72, was first elected to the Senate in 1978. He will lead the Armed Services Committee when Democrats take control of the Senate in January.

Levin said he was in a good position to change "both the security policy and the economic policy of this country." He has called for U.S. troop withdrawals from Iraq beginning within four to six months.

Sen. Thomas back at workafter leukemia treatment

Sen. Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., returned to work about a month earlier than planned after undergoing treatment for leukemia. Thomas, 73, was released Saturday from Bethesda National Naval Medical Center in Maryland. He had acute myeloid leukemia, the most common form of the cancer of the blood and bone marrow.

Last month, Thomas won re-election with 70% of the vote while he was in the hospital.

With The Democratic Congress, Groups Gear Up For Fight Over Paid Sick Days (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

With the Democratic Congress expected to move quickly to raise the minimum wage, many Democrats, women's organizations and liberal groups are gearing up for a fight on another workplace issue: paid sick days.

Supporters point to studies showing that nearly half of American workers do not receive paid sick days. But many Republicans and businesses complain that such legislation would impose another mandate on companies, driving up their costs.

Advocates of paid sick leave cite workers like Naomi Nakamura, who lost a week's pay when her 103-degree fever forced her to miss five days from her job at a video rental store in San Francisco.

Ms. Nakamura said, "Some employees didn't want to lose their pay, so they showed up for work even though they had strep throat, and they just spread it to other people."

Last month, San Francisco voters approved a measure requiring all employers to provide paid sick days, making it the first jurisdiction in the nation with such a requirement. The vote was 61 percent to 39 percent.

Now supporters are planning a big push for sick day legislation not just in Congress, but in Maine, Maryland, Montana and several other states. Senator Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat, introduced a bill last year to require companies with at least 15 employees to provide seven paid sick days a year, but that bill languished in the Republican-led Congress.

Now that Democrats have won control of Congress, Mr. Kennedy, the incoming chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, is more optimistic.

"It has a wildfire of support across the country," he said. "When you talk to workers, this is, besides an increase in the minimum wage, the most important issue for these families. This is a families issue. This is a values issue."

Mr. Kennedy's bill, like a House bill sponsored by Rosa DeLauro, a Connecticut Democrat, would provide a total of seven paid sick days not just when workers are ill, but when members of their families are ill — or need to go to the doctor for checkups and tests.

A big problem with not having paid sick days, Mr. Kennedy said, is that many parents, not wanting to miss work, let their sick children go to school, spreading their illnesses. Mr. Kennedy said his bill would guarantee paid sick days to 66 million who do not now have them.

Business lobbyists plan to fight the effort.

"Supporters of legislation like this complain about unfunded mandates in education when it comes to No Child Left Behind, but they don't hesitate to impose unfunded mandates on employers," said Randel Johnson, vice president for labor, immigration and employee benefits at the United States Chamber of Commerce. "The employer community is not going to roll over on this issue."

Susan Eckerly, vice president for federal policy at the National Federation of Independent Business, said, "I could see where this would pass the House, but if you put this on the floor of the Senate, it would be a good candidate for a filibuster."

Mr. Kennedy acknowledged that possibility. "We'll need some of our Republican colleagues," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0102493

Advocates plan to build a coalition like the one that won passage of the Families and Medical Leave Act in 1993 after a long struggle — including two vetoes by the first President Bush. The coalition backing paid sick days includes the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, the National Partnership for Women and Families, and Acorn, an association of community organizations that helped win passage of a minimum wage increase in six states on Election Day.

"These kinds of policies that create flexibility in the workplace are important to make families be healthy and economically secure," said Debra Ness, president of the National Partnership. "You'd be hard-pressed to talk to a woman today at any point of the economic spectrum who isn't struggling with this issue."

Jody Heymann, a professor of social policy at McGill University, pointed to studies showing that children get well sooner when their parents take time off to care for them. She said the United States was the only industrial nation not to require paid sick days when workers are ill.

"Enough firms do this to show that companies can provide this and compete economically," Professor Heymann said.

But many business owners complain that mandates like paid sick days require lots of paperwork and take a one-size-fits-all approach.

Steve Caughran, owner of a printing shop outside Fresno, Calif., said, "Any time the government is mandating something and creates an extra burden on business, it becomes another regulatory tax and raises costs."

He said that to attract workers most companies needed to provide good benefits, including sick days. He said he offered most employees about 14 paid days off each year, to be taken as vacation or sick days.

The Institute for Women's Policy Research found that 77 percent of workers in the lowest quarter by wages did not have paid sick days, while 43 percent of middle-class workers did not and 31 percent of workers in the top quarter did not.

Leonardo Prado, a restaurant worker in San Francisco, said not having paid sick days was a financial and emotional strain. Mr. Prado, who is divorced, said that last June when his 4-year-old, Antonio, got sick for two days, he had to hire a baby sitter for $10 an hour, even though he earned $8.82 an hour as a waiter, not counting tips.

"It really hurt in the wallet," Mr. Prado said. "You didn't have the option to say: 'I can't work this day. I have to take care of my son.' "

A community group in San Francisco, Young Workers United, sponsored the referendum, after many workers had complained about the issue.

Businesses hardly fought the measure, considering it a lost cause. "San Franciscans have a history of voting their social conscience as long as someone else writes the check," said Kevin Westlye, executive director of the Golden Gate Restaurant Association, which opposed the referendum.

He said consumers would be hurt, predicting that restaurants would raise prices because of the sick days mandate and a mandate for employers to contribute toward health insurance. The higher prices, he said, might cause some restaurants to lose business — and perhaps close.

"There's no such thing as a free lunch on something like this," he said. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Liberal Groups Target 86 Districts For '100 Hours' Campaign Blitz (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, December 5, 2006

Change America Now, a coalition of 40 liberal groups set to push the House Democrats' economic agenda, is targeting 86 districts around the country for press events and possibly television advertising, according to a list obtained by The Hill.

The groups will focus their efforts on 54 Republican and 32 Democratic districts, most represented by moderates, hoping to build support for four parts of the Democrats' "100 Hours" agenda: raising the minimum wage, allowing Medicare to negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies, cutting student-loan interest rates and repealing tax breaks for oil companies.

"It is basically about branding a progressive agenda," said Brad Woodhouse, a spokesman for Americans United, a liberal group that led the 2005 campaign against adding private accounts to Social Security. Other groups taking a lead role in the effort include the Campaign for America's Future, USAction, the Service Employees International Union (SEIU), the Sierra Club and the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME).

Woodhouse said the groups would start as early as next week meeting with members in the targeted districts, then holding press events to talk about their findings.

The coalition will hold a series of "high-intensity press events" in January when Democrats take formal control of the House, Woodhouse said, and could venture into paid advertising later.

The groups have no central budget but their individual expenditures on press events, websites, phone and e-mail campaigns would rate in the "low seven figures," Woodhouse said.

The groups first met last Tuesday and adopted the name Change America Now earlier this week.

Risk And Reward (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall
The New York Times, December 5, 2006
Washington

The G.O.P. is the party of risk, aggression, military assertion and dominance — an approach that led to the implosion in Iraq and the Republicans' defeat in November. Now the Democrats have a chance to demonstrate a core difference in how the two parties calculate and manage risk.

In "Fiasco," Thomas Ricks describes the results of the Republican approach: "Bush's decision to invade Iraq ... ultimately may come to be seen as one of the most profligate actions in the history of American foreign policy. ... The U.S.-led invasion was launched recklessly, with a flawed plan for war and a worse approach to occupation."

While inflicting destruction on the Iraqis, Bush multiplied America's enemies and endangered this nation's military, economic health and international stature. Courting risk without managing it, Bush repeatedly and remorselessly failed to accurately evaluate the consequences of his actions.

The embroilment in Iraq is not an aberration. It stems from core party principles equally evident on the domestic front. For a quarter-century, the Republican temper — its reckless drive to jettison the social safety net; its support of violence in law enforcement and in national defense; its advocacy of regressive taxation, environmental hazard and pro-business deregulation; its 'remoralizing' of the pursuit of wealth — has been judged by many voters as essential to America's position in the world, producing more benefit than cost.

While some Republican long shots have paid off handsomely (the Reagan administration's accelerated arms race arguably drove the former Soviet Union into bankruptcy), now the dice are turning up snake eyes. In November, voters concluded that the Bush administration had run one risk too many. After 40 years of ascendancy, the G.O.P. has provided Democrats with an opening. Will the Democratic Party, often insufficiently authoritative and bold, manage risk better? Democrats arguably suffer from their own impaired judgment: utopian faith in the power of negotiation and compromise — naïve, perhaps, in a world where the threat of bloodshed is endemic.

In this election campaign, the Democratic leadership offered pallid, nonspecific policy initiatives — in the House, a "bipartisan solution to strengthen Social Security," and in the Senate, a call to "work together to strengthen Social Security and Medicare."

Nonetheless, buried in a morass of campaign-season evasion were the outlines of a potentially salable political program. Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Democratic Caucus chairman, pointed out that 16 of the seats the party won in November were suburban or exurban. He contended that the election marked the emergence of a new "metropolitan" populism, "a revolt of the center against the Rovian model of polarization politics." In Emanuel's view, "Prescription drugs, gas prices and economic populism are no longer associated with blue-collar downscale voters. Office park workers can be just as populist as industrial workers — they are struggling under rising college and health care costs too. They resent giveaways to H.M.O.s; they don't want subsidies to oil companies when oil is 68 bucks a barrel. We are going to deal with the oil royalty issue, and we can cut the interest rates for student loans."

Serious Democratic policy makers are beginning to rigorously assess and quantify risk with an eye toward generating growth, calculating "second-, third- and fourth-order effects," while aiming to avoid, for example, the "silent trade-offs" that the economic strategist Gene Sperling writes about, which occur when "well-intentioned policies to protect certain workers or communities impose burdens on similarly situated or worse-off workers who were not included in the immediate cost-benefit calculations."

The morass in Iraq has created a Democratic moment. As the party struggles to forge a working majority, it must strike a delicate balance, argue Jason Bordoff and colleagues at the Brookings Institution's Hamilton Project. Allocating excessive economic risk to individuals can harm economic growth as well as family well-being, they note. Conversely, "poorly designed programs to protect against risks can distort economic incentives and impair overall economic performance."

For the Democrats to thread this needle will take a steady hand. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Coming Soon: Dem Chairmen (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn
The Hill, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102495

House Democratic leaders hope to have nearly all their committee chairmen named by week's end, a House Democratic leadership aide said yesterday.

The House Democratic Steering and Policy Committee, a group that makes recommendations on committee chairmen, is scheduled to meet today at 2:30 p.m. in HC-5 to consider the nominations for the chairmen of five "exclusive" committees: Rep. David Obey (Wis.) for Appropriations, Rep. Charles Rangel (N.Y.) for Ways and Means, Rep. John Dingell (Mich.) for Energy and Commerce, Rep. Barney Frank (Mass.) for Financial Services and Rep. Louise Slaughter (N.Y.) for Rules, the aide said.

The panel's recommendations will then come before the full caucus at a meeting scheduled for noon on Wednesday. The steering committee will meet two more times later in the week to handle non-exclusive committees, at 1:30 p.m. on Wednesday in HC-9 and 2 p.m. on Thursday in HC-5. Among those chairmanships, only the Veterans Affairs Committee is disputed.

Although chairmen may be decided soon, it will still be another few weeks before committees and leadership staff will move offices.

A second Democratic leadership aide said leadership offices in the Capitol and elsewhere would begin their move on Dec. 21, while committee staffs will wait until Dec. 26.

Democrats To Restructure Hill Appropriations Panels (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

When Democrats take over Congress next year, they will restructure the appropriations panels of both chambers, seeking to restore the alignment between the Senate and House subcommittees and ease a budgeting process that has failed for 12 years in a row to deliver spending bills on time.

Democrats said that the details on the changes had not been finalized, but confirmed that the aim was to bring the two chambers' structures into alignment by adding two subcommittees on the House side.

"The objective is to have the subcommittees (in the two chambers) mirror each other," said one senior Democratic Senate appropriations staffer. "That is the key."

The staffer said that before a series of changes enacted by the Republican House leadership two years ago, the structure of the two chambers' subcommittees had been "identical, except for some very minor technical differences."

The last time Congress managed to complete all its spending bills before the start of the fiscal year was 1994, also the last year when both incoming appropriations committee chairmen Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, and Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat, were leading their respective panels.

Aides said the two were determined to try to get the budgeting process back on track next year, though they acknowledged it would be challenging. With the fiscal year already a month old, Congress has passed only two of the required 12 appropriations bills and plans to adjourn this week after passing a long-term "continuing resolution" -- essentially permission for the government to go on spending at current budget levels.

Democrats maintain that by eliminating two subcommittees on the House side, responsible for funding the legislative branch and the District of Columbia, and moving other elements of jurisdiction around among the remaining 10, Republicans made the complex job of reconciling the House and Senate versions of spending bills that much more complicated, because the two-chamber conferences doing the work had to involve lawmakers from as many as four different subcommittees.

"Those changes created some difficulties when [appropriations] bills were conferenced," said Ronald Platt, a Washington Democratic veteran who chairs the federal government practice of the law firm Buchanan Ingersoll, and follows appropriations matters.

A spokesman for the Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee denied that.

Jurisdictional difficulties were "not insurmountable ... not a substantive problem," spokesman John Scofield said.

Conservatives argued that doing away with two of the powerful appropriations subcommittee chairmen, known as "cardinals," helped reduce earmarks and keep spending under control. Mr. Scofield said it was inefficient to have an entire subcommittee devoted to a small spending bill for the District of Columbia.

Mr. Platt said that Mr. Obey has the support of Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, for the changes.

"She and Obey have worked it out," he said.

In the Senate, staffers said members of the committee would meet tomorrow with Mr. Byrd to thrash out the details of the changes there.

"Some restructuring will be on the table," another Democratic aide said.

In addition to abolishing two subcommittees, GOP House leaders also made a series of other changes two years ago, moving oversight of about $40 billion of defense spending, mainly on health and basic housing, into the subcommittee that deals with theVeterans Affairs Department and military-construction spending bill.

Mr. Scofield said that the change made sense and was supported by veterans groups and military families.

Congress Expected To Adjourn This Week (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, December 5, 2006

A Republican-led Congress criticized for producing little but political rancor is likely to end its term this week with at best a grade of "Incomplete."

The House and Senate return Tuesday having already decided to dump an unfinished budget on next year's Democratic-controlled Congress. Passing grades are problematic for a host of other issues on lawmakers' plates.

The main task this week will be approval of continued funding for most federal programs at fiscal 2006 levels through Feb. 15. That's necessary because the House and Senate have not come together on any of the new spending bills for the fiscal year that started in October except those covering defense and homeland security.

In other action this final week:

· The Senate is likely to move quickly to confirm former CIA Director Robert Gates as Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's successor. The Senate Armed Services Committee holds a hearing with Gates on Tuesday.

· The House on Tuesday will vote on a Senate bill that would open 8.3 million acres in the eastern Gulf of Mexico to new oil and gas drilling. The bill's chances rose after House leaders last week abandoned the more ambitious House-passed bill, which would have ended drilling moratoriums along much of the nation's coast.

· Congress will also probably send the president a package of targeted tax breaks, most which expired at the beginning of the year. Those breaks include deductions for research and development, for higher education costs, for teachers' classroom expenses and for employers who hire people coming off welfare.

Efforts to move the popular tax package have been thwarted several times this year because of maneuvers to link it to more controversial legislation. This time, too, passage could be complicated by proposals to tie it to several pending bills, including one to stop a scheduled cut of Medicare payments to physicians and another to extend trade benefits for sub-Saharan Africa and other developing nations.

· Also possibly in the mix for an end-of-year combo package are an abandoned mine cleanup bill and a bill to permanently normalize trade relations with Vietnam.

The office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said Monday it will take up the Vietnam bill if the House acts first. The House failed to pass the measure last month with a procedure requiring a two-thirds majority, and GOP House leaders have not announced plans for revisiting the issue.

Frist said Monday that House and Senate negotiators would meet to iron out a compromise on another major foreign policy initiative that would allow the United States to ship civilian nuclear fuel and technology to India.

Also on Frist's agenda is legislation to improve the nation's ability to react to bioterror attacks.

Frist had originally talked of keeping the Senate working right up to Christmas, but motivation to stay in Washington was deflated by the Republican losses of both the House and Senate in the election.

The House this week is scheduled to dispose of several dozen mostly minor bills including naming a Capitol room after retiring Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill.

The House is also to take up a bill requiring abortion providers to inform a woman 20 weeks into a pregnancy that the fetus may experience pain during an abortion. It's unlikely that the Senate would consider it this year.

Congress did approve significant measures this year, including a pension overhaul bill and the renewal of the Patriot Act. Other security-related measures sent to the White House included a port security bill and endorsement of President Bush's plans to create military commissions to prosecute terror suspects.

However, Congress was unable to come up with a plan creating a path to legal status for illegal immigrants, instead approving a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border. It couldn't pass a lobbying and ethics bill generated by lobbying scandals at the beginning of the year, and failed to reach a consensus on the administration's warrantless eavesdropping program.

By postponing action on the spending bills, Republicans will be leaving to the newly empowered Democrats the job of meeting the many demands for spending on health, education, veterans and transportation as well as doing something about the budget deficit.

Congress Not In A Spending Mood As The Holidays Near (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102497

A pile of unfinished business awaits the Republican-led Congress when it returns today, and a pile of unfinished business is likely to remain when lawmakers adjourn for the year, presumably on Friday.

Lawmakers have all but given up on completing any of the nine remaining spending bills and will instead leave it to the new Democratic leaders to work out the new government spending levels when they take charge in January.

Republican leaders will try, however, to pass a package of tax breaks, including several provisions that have expired or are scheduled to die Dec. 31. The list includes a research-and-development credit that is popular with manufacturing companies, individual deductions that benefit parents of college students and teachers who spend their own money on classroom supplies, and a sales-tax deduction for people who reside in states with no income taxes.

One urgent task before the Senate this week is confirming President Bush's choice of Robert M. Gates as the new defense secretary. Gates, a former CIA director, would succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld, who resigned Nov. 8, the day after Republicans lost control of Congress. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said he expects Gates to be approved no later than Friday.

Frist also announced yesterday that final House-Senate negotiations would begin immediately on the U.S.-India Civil Nuclear Cooperation bill, hailed as a cornerstone of a broader strategic initiative between the two countries. The bill would allow American companies to export nuclear technology, equipment and fuel to India, which is vastly expanding its nuclear energy program.

But the Senate version of the bill contains restrictions that reflect an unease among some lawmakers that the India agreement would weaken international nuclear nonproliferation rules. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has urged that the Senate language be removed, warning that it could jeopardize support for the bill by the Indian government. Supporters believe chances for passage would plummet in a Democratic-led Congress, with lawmakers likely to insist on tougher nonproliferation terms.

Republicans hope to deliver a long-promised expansion of domestic oil and gas drilling, and the House will attempt today to pass an offshore-drilling bill allowing limited increases in oil and gas production in the Gulf of Mexico. The House had sought new access to waters along the East and West coasts, but Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) warned that Democrats will filibuster a final bill unless expansion is restricted to the relatively small slice of the eastern Gulf that the Senate bill identified.

The future of a Vietnam trade-liberalization bill looks bleak. One possibility is attaching it to the tax-break package, but that high-priority measure has become a magnet for all sorts of straggler provisions. One is a Frist favorite that would block a scheduled Jan. 1 reduction in Medicare physician payments.

Another is a Medicaid provision backed by a coalition of long-term health-care providers and state government officials. They want to force Bush to rescind an August order that would reduce the amount of Medicaid funding available to public hospitals and nursing homes. Currently, state governments can charge providers a 6 percent tax, which is matched by federal funds and then returned to hospitals and nursing homes as government payments. The administration said the federal matching grants were too costly and ordered the maximum tax cut in half. Congress had earlier rejected such a plan.

The Vietnam legislation, which would establish permanent normal trade relations with the Asian country, ran into unexpected trouble last month in the House from lawmakers concerned that it would further damage the U.S. textile industry. Frist said the Senate would consider the bill "if the House can act," but House leadership aides said yesterday that the bill is a long shot.

Democrats have lambasted the GOP Congress for months about its skimpy list of accomplishments this year, including its failure to complete work on most of the annual spending bills to operate the government. Just two of the 11 fiscal 2006 appropriation bills have been completed. The nine remaining measures would fund about $460 billion of government programs and have been hung up by internal Republican feuds, in addition to the usual partisan squabbling.

Incoming House Appropriations Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.) said that if Republicans, as expected, seek to pass a resolution that would continue current funding levels through Feb. 15, Democrats will face two choices. They may seek to pass the remaining bills when they take over in January -- a daunting exercise that would coincide with the writing of next year's budget -- or pass a long-term continuing funding resolution.

"Either of those scenarios would represent lousy outcomes, but they would have been made unavoidable by Republican inaction today," Obey said.

Blunt, Cantor Fall Out (HILL)

By Patrick O'connor

The Hill, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102498

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) met yesterday with his chief deputy to quell simmering tension between the two of them that boiled over during the recent leadership contest.

Blunt and Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.) sat down in the whip's Capitol office for the second time in a week in an attempt to repair lingering damage that occurred during the Missouri Republican's successful drive to retain his leadership post when Republicans assume the minority next year, GOP aides said.

The dustup between Blunt and his chief deputy is largely the result of staff tension, which has been mounting for years but rarely affects the two lawmakers' close working relationship, members and aides cautioned.

The friction came to a head during the recent leadership races even though Cantor was assisting Blunt in turning back a challenge from Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.), a conservative stalwart.

During that campaign, some Republican members and staff frequently suggested that Cantor was the more popular candidate to perform the whip duties even though Blunt eventually beat Shadegg by a wide margin.

A steady stream of stories and member comments fed that perception during the week and a half between the midterm election and the leadership race, creating tension between the two offices that was further fueled by inconsistent communication between the two staffs, the sources said.

That tension erupted during a phone call between the Blunt and Cantor before the race itself when Blunt expressed concern that Cantor's staff had not gone far enough to discredit a story that members wanted to "draft" the affable Virginian despite his commitment to build support for Blunt, aides said.

Blunt and Cantor spoke frequently during the race, and Cantor worked the phones and his contacts with other members to help Blunt hold onto the post. But the regular communications between the two members did nothing to dispel a growing perception in the conference that many members wanted Cantor to have a chance to run for the whip post as well.

At one point, the Cantor factor in the race was so influential that Shadegg sent a letter to his Republican colleagues reminding them of his pledge to retain Cantor as chief deputy if he could successfully unseat Blunt.

That dynamic spurred tension between Blunt's and Cantor's offices that became increasingly evident among members and staff on the Hill as Blunt fought for the No. 2 spot at the GOP leadership table.

In a staff meeting last month convened to discuss the rules and procedures for each of the seven leadership races, Blunt Chief of Staff Brian Gaston alarmed a number of those present by asking a question about whether write-in votes would be counted to determine the total number of votes after a Rules Committee staffer explained those votes would not count in the race itself.

Many of those present, which included one staff member for each lawmaker running, interpreted Gaston's question as a sign of concern that the Virginia Republican would somehow challenge Blunt during the closed-door election session. Gaston asked the question to determine whether or not write-in votes would count against the overall number of votes cast in the race and therefore change the number needed to win, an aide present said.

The overall episode is a brief aberration in a normally cooperative relationship, a Blunt spokeswoman said yesterday.

"Mr. Cantor is Mr. Blunt's closest friend in Congress, and he trusts him completely," Blunt spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger said yesterday. "They talk several times a day and have never had a single discussion that has ended with Mr. Blunt angry."

"The hallmark of Whip Blunt and Rep. Cantor's relationship is friendship and trust," Cantor Chief of Staff Rob Collins said. "Politics is a passionate business, so of course those passions can come out. But to win you have to be passionate."

The tension has eased since the race, and the conversation has turned to the role of the whip in the minority. During the race, Blunt promised Cantor an expanded role in the whip operation, aides said, and the two lawmakers must now define those changes as Republicans adapt to life in the minority.

"We're in the minority, and, as a result, the whip office has to function differently," Boulanger said.

The two lawmakers met over lunch last week to discuss possible changes to their whip operation, but details remain unclear about the particulars of those modifications.

One leadership aide unaffiliated with either lawmaker suggested that Blunt should give Cantor and his staff more access to Blunt's internal whip list. In the past, Blunt and his Floor Director Amy Steinmann have been very reluctant to share the details of those lists with members or leadership staff, a holdover practice from ex-Rep. Tom DeLay's (R-Texas) tenure in the post.

The dustup has stirred questions about Republican unity as the party moves forward, but aides to both members said it would not hamper their working relationship.

DeLay first tapped Blunt as his chief deputy in 1999. At the time, the Missouri Republican was popular among members and the press, but he has struggled occasionally in the intervening years to emerge from the Texan's long shadow. Cantor, meanwhile, has been considered a rising star since Blunt tapped him as his chief deputy in late 2002 after only his second term.

Cantor has since remained as deputy after own presumed rise in the leadership ranks was blocked when Blunt decided to hold onto his job as whip after narrowly losing his bid to become majority leader to Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio).

Despite grumbling that Blunt should make way for Cantor, the two lawmakers worked closely during the Blunt's recent run to retain the whip job and both sides expressed confidence that they can move beyond this rocky episode.

"The Blunt Whip team is the most successful whip team in the history of the House," Collins said. "Based on that past, one could only assume the future will bring more success."

House Ethics Probes May Stay Unresolved (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

The secretive House ethics panel is unlikely to complete several of its investigations during the final month of the 109th Congress, so questions about the conduct of a handful of members will remain unresolved.

The probes began in May but will end when members adjourn this month. A new committee at the convening of the 110th Congress could vote to reauthorize or carry over the investigations, but panel members are not required to do so.

House leaders are mum about whether the panel will keep the same members in the upcoming session, when Democrats will assume majority for the first time since 1994.

The panel, formally named the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, has at least four active investigations, including probes of Rep. William J. Jefferson, Louisiana Democrat, and former Rep. Bob Ney, Ohio Republican.

Ney pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges and to accepting bribes in exchange for legislative favors this fall, then resigned his seat before last month's elections.

Mr. Jefferson faces a runoff Saturday against Democrat Karen Carter, a state representative, in his bid for a ninth term representing a New Orleans district. He has not been charged with a crime, but FBI investigators found $90,000 cash in his freezer after they videotaped him receiving a $100,000 bribe.

Also under investigation is the bribery scandal involving former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham in 2005. The panel is trying to determine whether the California Republican, serving an eight-year prison sentence for accepting at least $2.4 million in bribes for securing defense contracts, was able to influence any other members.

The ethics panel has been investigating the inappropriate computer messages that former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, sent to male teenagers who had served as congressional pages.

Democrats campaigned against a culture of corruption, reminding voters that Republicans in the majority were plagued by scandals and saying special interests influenced legislation on health care and energy.

Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi of California has promised to "drain the swamp" and said yesterday that her party's "first order of business" in January will be ethics reform.

"The people's House should not be an auction house, with legislation being sold to the highest bidder," she said. "Democrats pledge to make this the most honest, ethical and open Congress in history."

Changes could arise in a House rules package passed when the new session convenes Jan. 4.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), said any ethics reform should include creation of an independent office of public integrity. Without outside oversight or enforcement, corrupt members can feel protected by their congressional pals, she said.

"The ethics committee is always viewed as partisan and political, and they need to take investigations away from it," she said, adding that groups such as CREW should be allowed to file ethics complaints.

Hastings Paid Penance And Deserved Better (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, December 5, 2006

What Democrats did to Alcee Hastings is a case of political ethics being taken to an illogical extreme.

The decision by Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., the soon-to-be speaker of the House, not to make the Florida congressman chairman of the Intelligence Committee was a concession to political expediency, not good judgment.

Hastings, the second-ranking Democrat on the committee that oversees the government's intelligence operations, was thought to be the front-runner to head that panel when his party assumes control of the House in January. But last week, Pelosi announced that he would not get the post. In doing so, she caved in to those who say the former federal judge can't be trusted with the nation's secrets because he was impeached for a crime he allegedly committed a quarter century ago.

Never mind that Hastings was acquitted of conspiring to extort a $150,000 bribe in a 1983 criminal trial. His detractors pointed to his impeachment in 1989 on charges that he lied and fabricated evidence in that case as proof of his unfitness to head the committee.

DOJ_NMG_0102500

But in stripping Hastings of his judgeship, the Senate chose not to disqualify him from ever holding another public office — a ban the Constitution allows it to invoke in an impeachment. So in 1992, Hastings sought and won a seat in Congress. He has been a member of the Intelligence Committee since 1999.

"No one has raised any concerns" about whether Hastings can be trusted with the nation's secrets during his time on the committee, says Jamal Ware, the Intelligence Committee's spokesman.

As the committee's chairman, Hastings would have had greater access to the nation's secrets as a member of the Gang of Eight — a group of congressional leaders with whom the president can choose to share limited knowledge of the most tightly held secrets. But to say that Hastings should be disqualified from this inner circle because of something he allegedly did in 1981 ignores what he has done since.

"He's been there (on the Intelligence Committee) too long to make the claim that he is unreliable," says Charles Ogletree, a Harvard law professor who runs the school's Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race & Justice. "Not before 9/11 or after were any arguments made to remove him from that panel. His record of unblemished service has to mean something. To judge him on what happened in the 1980s, and not on what he has done since, seems disingenuous."

But that is exactly what Pelosi seems to have done — or been forced to do.

In backing away from an appointment she was said to once favor, the House's top Democrat seems to be saying that there is nothing Hastings can do to rehabilitate himself. It doesn't matter that in impeaching Hastings, Congress punished him for his alleged offense. Nor does it matter that since being stripped of his federal judgeship, Hastings has been elected seven times to the Congress and has served seven years on the Intelligence Committee.

If she is going to make good on her pledge to rid the House of its "culture of corruption" when Democrats take control of that body next month, Pelosi appears to have decided that she must make a sacrifice of Hastings.

That's a shame. Hastings deserved better. After years of loyal service on the Intelligence Committee, he deserved to hear Pelosi answer his critics rather than give in to them. He deserved to hear her say that ever since Congress meted out its punishment, Hastings has served that body, and the nation, and not reviled it.

She should have said people who pay a price for wrongdoing shouldn't be treated as if they got a life sentence, especially when they follow that penalty with a long record of unassailable public service.

Pelosi should have said that when it comes to bad behavior, she believes in both punishment and redemption.

Lawmakers' Regional Slams Draw Rebukes (USAT)

By Larry Copeland

USA Today, December 5, 2006

The regional insult, a staple of trash-talking sports fans but rarely used these days by national politicians, is making a comeback.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., who is slated to become chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, angered Mississippians when he asked last month, "Who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?"

Last week, Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., a vocal opponent of illegal immigration, said of Miami: "You would never know you're in the United States of America. You would certainly say you're in a Third World country."

George Gonzalez, associate professor of political science at the University of Miami, says regional insults by national politicians are rare. "There are regional rivalries in terms of economy and industry but it rarely spills over into outright insult," he says. "In some ways, it's unpatriotic, because you're just insulting another part of your country. Ideally, we're all one nation."

The Miami and Mississippi slams drew stern rebukes.

"There's been a steady supply of letters to the editor," says Joe Parker, a professor of political science at the University of Southern Mississippi. "The tone has been: Charlie Rangel lives up there in New York where people are killing each other. What does he know?"

Rangel, who has apologized, was simply indulging in an age-old tradition when he insulted Mississippi, which has a long history of poverty, racial inequity and illiteracy, says William Ferris, a Mississippian and now senior associate director of the Center for the Study of the American South at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Rangel was discussing how New York state might keep more of the tax revenue it sends to Washington when he told The New York Times: "Mississippi gets more than its share back in federal money, but who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?" He later apologized.

"There is no excuse for my having said that," Rangel said in a statement. "My love for New York got in the way of my common sense and judgment."

Tancredo's comments, made during a summit of conservative activists in Palm Beach, earned him an admonishment from Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a fellow Republican, who called the remarks "disappointing" and "naive."

DOJ_NMG_0102501

Tancredo was discussing how unchecked immigration has contributed to high crime rates in Miami.

Gonzalez says Tancredo's comments are "overtly racist. You're equating immigration with criminality."

Tancredo "didn't insult anybody," says his spokesman, Carlos Espinosa. "He made an observation. No one's questioning him on the statement itself. They want to discuss their hurt feelings. But they're not willing to fix the problem."

Renewed Worries On Medicare Drug Plans (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — Pharmacists and advocates for older Americans say they are worried that tens of thousands of low-income Medicare beneficiaries will again have trouble getting medications next month, as they did in January of this year.

Many prescription drug plans are changing benefits. Beneficiaries are changing from one plan to another. New plans are entering the market. Some beneficiaries will find they can no longer use the drugstores they have been using.

“There will be surprises and shocks for some beneficiaries,” said Michael J. Negrete, vice president of the California Pharmacists Association.

About 600,000 poor people are losing the guarantee of extra assistance that covered nearly all their drug costs this year.

“Starting Jan. 1, 2007, you will no longer automatically qualify for this extra help,” the Bush administration said in letters sent recently to these beneficiaries.

Some may still be able to obtain extra help. But they need to apply to a federal or state agency, and few have done so.

Pharmacists and insurance counselors say many of the 600,000 beneficiaries will not discover the change in their status until they show up at pharmacies next month. Then they could be charged $25 to $50 or more for drugs that cost them only $3 or $5 this year.

Druggists say they also foresee problems for another group: 300,000 low-income people who will be reassigned to plans chosen at random by the federal government.

Even people who stay in the same plan may face surprises because some of their drugs may no longer be covered. Plans can change the list of covered drugs from one year to the next, dropping some and adding others.

Mark J. Gregory, a vice president of Kerr Drug, which owns 102 pharmacies in North and South Carolina, predicted some snarls and delays for customers next month, but said, “It can’t be as bad as early this year.”

“Some seniors will show up at the pharmacy, unaware they have been reassigned to a different plan,” Mr. Gregory said. “They may find that the new plan no longer covers some of their medications. Others may learn that they no longer have a low-income subsidy, and they cannot afford the new co-payment. In both cases, drug therapy may be interrupted.”

Mr. Gregory offered this advice: “Beneficiaries should be prepared. If you have any doubt, take action now. Ask questions. Call your plan. Don’t wait till Jan. 1.”

Jennifer Mezey, a lawyer at the Legal Aid Society of the District of Columbia, voiced a similar concern. “Come Jan. 1,” she said, “some low-income people will show up at the pharmacy and be charged full price, and they won’t be able to get their medications.”

Even if a drug is still covered, Ms. Mezey said, it may be subject to new restrictions limiting the number of pills or requiring doctors to get advance approval for prescriptions.

Federal officials said they were trying hard to avoid a repetition of the problems that overwhelmed pharmacists 11 months ago.

With a year’s experience, they said, pharmacists, insurers and beneficiaries know what to expect. Medicare has upgraded its computer systems. Insurers have hired more people for telephone call centers.

“Lessons have been learned,” said Kathleen M. Harrington, a spokeswoman for the Medicare agency.

Beneficiaries have until Dec. 31 to pick a plan. The Bush administration is urging people to act by this Friday, to avoid delays on Jan. 1.

E. Timothy Marks, co-owner of Excel Drug, a pharmacy in Waldport, Ore., said beneficiaries should be prepared for “problems somewhat similar” to those they experienced early this year.

“The plans are too complicated for some of the elderly to understand,” Mr. Marks said. “Many low-income beneficiaries eligible for Medicare and Medicaid are unaware of the procedures and changes that will affect their drug coverage.”

In the chaotic first weeks of the drug benefit this year, many pharmacists gave away drugs, and many states established emergency assistance programs for low-income people who could not get the drug coverage promised by Medicare. New York and other states have curtailed those programs.

DOJ_NMG_0102502

William P. Scheer, chairman of the Pharmacists Society of the State of New York, who owns a drugstore in the Bronx, said: “Some people will go cold turkey on Jan. 1. They will go without needed medications that they have been receiving under the state program.”

The New York State Health Department is sending a “reduction of benefits notice” to people who receive both Medicare and Medicaid. It says the state will no longer cover their drugs, with a few exceptions.

New York officials are urging doctors to help patients get coverage through Medicare. Doctors could, for example, rewrite prescriptions or ask Medicare to make an exception for a particular drug and a particular patient.

California is continuing its emergency program through Jan. 31.

“We anticipated that there could be problems in January,” said Stan Rosenstein, the Medicaid director in California. “So we kept the program available as a safety net. The governor and the State Legislature did not want any possibility of disruption.”

Mr. Rosenstein said he was most concerned about 85,000 Californians who were losing automatic eligibility for Medicare’s low-income subsidy. “It could be a surprise when they go from paying $5 co-payments to having a $250 deductible,” he said.

The Bush administration has repeatedly advised beneficiaries that they do not have to take any action if they are satisfied with their current drug coverage.

But insurance counselors and health care lawyers say most people can save money by switching plans in 2007.

Katrina A. Eversole, an insurance counselor at the Washington County Commission on Aging in Hagerstown, Md., said she had helped 50 beneficiaries in the last week.

“In most cases,” Ms. Eversole said, “we are signing them up for new plans and saving them a great deal of money. We can often find a plan whose total annual costs will be just half of what they would have to pay for their current plan in 2007.” <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Medicare's 'Doughnut Hole' Help (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

The federal government is offering seniors a hand figuring out the infamous "doughnut hole" -- the coverage gap in Medicare's prescription-drug benefit that many beneficiaries will encounter during the year.

A new tool on Medicare's Web site, called a cost estimator, offers monthly and annual spending estimates based on the drugs seniors take and the pharmacy they use. Because it includes both the costs to seniors and to their plans -- the two factors that determine when the doughnut hole kicks in -- seniors can get at least a rough idea of when during the year they will reach the gap under each plan in their area.

For 2007, the doughnut hole begins after seniors and their stand-alone drug plan have spent a total of $2,400. The beneficiary then must bear all costs for his or her drugs until the out-of-pocket expenses reach $3,850. After that, seniors pay only 5% of additional drug costs.

Seniors have four weeks left in the current enrollment season to sign up for the Medicare drug benefit or change plans. Especially for seniors who spend a hefty amount on drugs, the new cost estimator can help decide whether they should change plans. All other things being equal, drug plans that negotiated lower prices with drug makers will have coverage gaps that occur later in the year than plans that pay higher prices for drugs. So a plan with a later coverage gap may mean lower out-of-pocket costs for beneficiaries.

The drug benefit, which took effect in January, is subsidized by the federal government and offered through private insurers. This year, an estimated three million to four million seniors hit the gap. While more plans are offering coverage through the gap next year, most don't cover brand-name drugs, so seniors still need to watch their spending.

The cost estimator was launched in October as part of the upgraded Medicare Web site. Previously, most enrollees could figure out how much their plans were spending on drugs only when they bought the drugs at the pharmacy. This year, insurers such as Humana Inc., UnitedHealth Group Inc. and WellPoint Inc. also have updated their Web sites so seniors can compare total drug costs from different plans. But the Medicare tool is the most comprehensive -- if a bit harder to navigate. To use it, seniors need to click the compare-drug-plans link on www.medicare.gov1, followed by "find and compare plans." They then can begin either a personalized or general search for drug costs and enter the lists or drug names they use. The estimates -- shown in a chart followed by a detailed explanation -- are at the very end of the page with the plans' details.

The site is updated every two weeks based on updated information from the plans, and the costs reflect discounted prices each plan has negotiated with drug manufacturers, not including rebates, says Mary Agnes Laureno, director of beneficiary information services at the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. "It should be really close" to what seniors see after each purchase at their pharmacy.

But there's also a caveat: Plans can change their drug prices during the year, so a beneficiary's actual spending may be higher or lower than estimated. "That gives you the best possible estimate, but it's only an estimate," says Tricia Neuman, Medicare policy director at Kaiser Family Foundation.

In addition, seniors can't always predict what drug they will use, and not all seniors are savvy online users. John Rother, policy director at the seniors' group AARP, welcomes the tool but wonders how useful it will be. "Most seniors are not going online for information," he says. A Kaiser survey in April showed that 5% of seniors compare plans themselves on www.medicare.gov, while another 5% had family or friends that did that for them.

In all, 3.6 million seniors enrolled in the drug benefit online in 2006, says Medicare spokesman Jeff Nelligan. The enrollment period ends Dec. 31.

Bill Would Restructure Red Cross (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Senator Charles E. Grassley filed legislation yesterday to overhaul the American Red Cross. It is the first time in almost 60 years that Congress has moved to amend the organization's charter.

The legislation, which has the organization's strong support, would cut the size of the Red Cross's national board by more than half, change the way board members are nominated and mandate the appointment of an independent ombudsman charged with reporting annually to Congress, among other steps.

Mr. Grassley, an Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, has been pushing for change at the organization. A House version of the bill was filed by George P. Radanovich, Republican of California.

Following widespread criticism of its performance after Hurricane Katrina, the Red Cross commissioned a panel of experts to examine its governance and make recommendations. The report suggested many changes that require legislative action because the Red Cross is governed by a Congressional charter.

"The Red Cross views this legislation as vital to modernizing its governance structure to meet the demands of the 21st century and is hopeful that Congress will pass this historic legislation before it adjourns for the year," the organization said in a statement.

The changes would require the Red Cross to reduce its board to at most 20 members by 2012, from the current 50, and change the way board members are nominated in an effort to reduce the influence of Red Cross chapters.

The legislation also seeks to clarify and limit the role of the board. Former senior executives of the organization have long complained about its interference in day-to-day operations.

It also all but eliminates the role of the president of the United States in board appointments. In the past, the president has appointed the chairman and eight board members, typically cabinet secretaries who rarely attended meetings.

Under the proposed legislation, the board would nominate a chairman for approval and appointment by the president. All other presidential appointments to the board would be abolished.

Among other duties, the ombudsman would offer make it easier for whistleblowers. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

NASA Plans Permanent Base On The Moon (NYT)

By Warren E. Leary

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 4 — NASA announced plans on Monday for a permanent base on the Moon, to be started soon after astronauts return there around 2020.

The agency's deputy administrator, Shana Dale, said the United States would develop rockets and spacecraft to get people to the Moon and establish a rudimentary base. There, other countries and commercial enterprises could expand the outpost to develop scientific and other interests, Ms. Dale said.

Ms. Dale and other officials of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration said the agency envisioned a base at one of the lunar poles, to take advantage of the near-constant sunlight for solar power generation. It would have an "open architecture" design to which others could add the capabilities they want.

Scott Horowitz, NASA's associate administrator for exploration, said crews of four astronauts would make weeklong missions to the Moon starting around 2020.

As more equipment was set up, human stays would eventually grow to 180 days, and become permanent by 2024. By 2027, officials said, a pressurized roving vehicle on the surface would take people on expeditions far from the base.

DOJ_NMG_0102504

NASA gave no cost estimate for the program and no design details for the base. Ms. Dale said all plans assumed that the agency would continue operating from a fixed budget of about $17 billion a year.

The space shuttle fleet is to be retired by 2010, and the United States plans to scale back its involvement in the International Space Station. The station is still under construction, with a mission by the shuttle Discovery to lift off on Thursday. Ms. Dale said money would be shifted to the lunar exploration program from the shuttle and the station.

While the Bush administration and NASA have spoken in general terms about plans for a return to the Moon, followed by human spaceflight to Mars, the lunar outpost plan is the first time officials have proposed a permanent presence.

"We're going for a base on the Moon," Mr. Horowitz said. "It's a very, very big decision."

Many gaps in the plan remain to be filled in. NASA called Monday's announcement a baseline concept.

In a televised news conference from the Johnson Space Center in Houston on the eve of an international conference there on space exploration, Ms. Dale said the plan was developed after consultation with space agencies representing 14 countries and more than 1,000 experts in space science and commerce.

"The door is open for international and commercial interests," she said.

The lunar base plan is part of a larger effort to develop an international exploration strategy, one that explains why and how humans are returning to the Moon and what they plan to do when they get there, NASA officials said.

The planning includes an international conference early next year on setting scientific goals for returning to the Moon, including those that private interests might want to pursue.

Doug Cooke, the agency official who led the lunar study group, said the plan called for putting a lander craft down near a polar crater and later adding solar-power generating units and living quarters to establish a base.

A site near the lunar South Pole, like the Shackleton Crater, would provide enough sunlight for power generation. It is also near possible deposits of valuable minerals.

From this site, Mr. Cooke said, other nations could add scientific laboratories or observatories, and commercial concerns might want to process rocket fuel and other products from water and other materials that might be found in the ground nearby.

Mr. Horowitz said having a base did not mean that humans would go there after every lunar landing. The option remains open for some missions to go to equatorial regions, as the Apollo project landers did in the 1970s, or even to the other side of the Moon.

Getting to the Moon and establishing a base will require a versatile, general-purpose lander that could land anywhere and be the core of an outpost, he said.

"The nickname I use for the lander is, it's a pickup truck," Mr. Horowitz said. "You can put whatever you want in the back. You can take it to wherever you want. So you can deliver cargo, crew, do it robotically, do it with humans on board. These are the types of things we're looking for in this system."

Ms. Dale said she and other NASA officials would spend part of next year visiting potential partners in the lunar project, like the space agencies of Europe, Russia and Japan, to see what they might want to contribute. Different aspects of a lunar base might come from many agreements between the United States and other nations, she said, rather than following the model of the space station of having many partners signing one agreement.

While there have been preliminary talks about cooperation in space with China, a growing space power which along with the United States and Russia has the ability to launch humans, it is too early to tell whether the two nations will agree to work together on human space flight projects such as the lunar base, she said.

Howard McCurdy, a NASA expert who is a professor at the school of public affairs at American University in Washington, expressed some skepticism about whether the space agency could make the ambitious plan fit in its budget, even with the winding down of the shuttle program and "throwing the keys to the International Space Station" to the other nations that helped to build it.

By relying on some of the ideas and technologies developed during the Apollo program and beyond, Mr. McCurdy said, NASA planners expect to be able to get back to the Moon for 40 percent to 60 percent of the original cost. There would be savings, too, in not having to reinvent technologies for protecting spacecraft from the heat of re-entry into the atmosphere, and not having to develop new launching facilities from scratch.

But he said he was concerned that the technology for lunar exploration "won't get us beyond the Moon" and on to Mars.

"The fear is that the Moon, which is now viewed as a means to get beyond the Moon, will become its own destination, for hundreds of years," he said. "The easy way to go to the Moon is the hard way to go to Mars."

While NASA has yet to design the permanent camp, last July officials at the Johnson Space Center took reporters on a tour of possible lunar habitats to come.

The mock-ups were built of plywood and plastic, and had the crowded feel of a FEMA trailer. They addressed problems that NASA engineers expected astronauts living on the Moon to encounter.

DOJ_NMG_0102505

Dust, for example, is not just untidy. On the Moon, the particles tend to be jagged and sticky, and so the engineers have designed an airlock to allow dust removal after any trip outside. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

NASA Plans Permanent Moon Base In 20 Years (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

An international team of astronauts will be living and working at a permanent moon base to be built at one of the resource-rich lunar poles within two decades, NASA announced Monday.

Earth's first off-world colonists will cruise the surface in a lunar lander that will function like a low-gravity pickup, possibly journeying to the dark side to build the most ambitious collection of observatories ever constructed, NASA said.

The announcement of NASA's vision to build a permanent scientific research station on the moon represents the space agency's first outline of its plans once it reaches the moon, scheduled no later than 2020.

"We will begin with short missions. Then we will build up to the point where we are staying 180 days, and then we will have a permanent presence," Doug Cooke, deputy associate administrator for exploration systems, said at a news conference at Johnson Space Center in Houston. The base could be operational by 2024, officials said.

In 2004, President Bush announced the Vision for Space Exploration, which proposed a return to the moon by 2020, as the first step to an eventual manned mission to Mars. NASA has since embarked on a $100-billion-plus program to design a new launch system and crew vehicle capable of carrying four astronauts to the lunar surface. To free up money, NASA will mothball the space shuttles by 2010.

Until now, it was unclear what NASA had in mind for the moon.

"We're going to go after a lunar base," said Scott Horowitz, associate administrator for exploration systems. "This is a very, very big decision; one of the few where the science and exploration communities agree."

Space science advocates have complained that money for basic research is being raided to pay for manned spaceflight, which they feel is costly and of questionable benefit when robotic explorers can perform many of the same tasks less expensively.

In choosing to locate the moon base at either the north or south pole, NASA was persuaded by three factors. One, the sites are relatively unexplored. Two, temperatures are more moderate there than in the searing heat of the equatorial bright side and the numbing cold of the dark side. Lastly, previous moon missions detected unusual amounts of hydrogen at both poles. Some scientists have speculated that this could be traced to hidden ice deposits, a potential source of water.

Australia, Canada, China, Europe, Japan, India and Russia have expressed interest in participating, NASA said.

NASA Plans Lunar Outpost (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

NASA unveiled plans yesterday to set up a small and ultimately self-sustaining settlement of astronauts at the south pole of the moon sometime around 2020 -- the first step in an ambitious plan to resume manned exploration of the solar system.

The long-awaited proposal envisions initial stays of a week by four-person crews, followed by gradually longer visits until power and other supplies are in place to make a permanent presence possible by 2024.

The effort was presented as an unprecedented mission to learn about the moon and places beyond, as well as an integral part of a long-range plan to send astronauts to Mars. The moon settlement would ultimately be a way station for space travelers headed onward, and would provide not only a haven but also hydrogen and oxygen mined from the lunar surface to make water and rocket fuel.

NASA officials declined to put a price tag on what will clearly be an extremely expensive venture. But they said that with help from international partners and perhaps space businesses, the agency would have sufficient funds to undertake the plan without any dramatic infusion of new money.

If the project goes ahead as planned, it would return humans to the moon for the first time since 1972.

NASA Deputy Administrator Shana Dale said the agency met with hundreds of scientists, potential international partners and space businesses over the past year to discuss lunar options -- most pressingly, whether the plan should be based around a series of sorties to the moon or a permanent outpost and later settlement. The conclusion, she said, was that an outpost would be the best both for science and to prepare for exploration deeper into space.

Scott Horowitz, chief of lunar exploration, said: "The lunar base will be a central theme in our going forward plan for going back to the moon in preparation to go to Mars and beyond. It's a very, very big decision, and it's one of the few where I've seen the scientific community and the engineering community actually agree on anything."

Dale said that once the team endorsed the concept of an outpost, which would be about the size of the Mall, the next debate was over where to put it, with a focus on either of the moon's poles.

"Conditions at the south pole appear to be more moderate and safer," she said. The south pole is almost constantly bathed in light and would be an ideal place to set up solar-power collectors for an electrical system -- a precondition for achieving the kind of "living off the land" that NASA is aiming for.

Horowitz also said the polar sites are scientifically exciting because "we don't know as much about the lunar poles as we know about Mars." Officials said the area around the south pole has craters that probably hold volatile gases that could be collected for commercial purposes. Highest on the list of possible resources is helium-3, a form of the gas seldom found on Earth that could be well suited for nuclear power fuel.

The rockets and space capsules that will take astronauts back to the moon will be exclusively American, but Dale said the mission envisions and needs the cooperation of other nations. As part of the process, she said, NASA officials met with representatives from the European Space Agency and the national space agencies of Australia, Britain, Canada, China, France, Germany, India, Italy, Russia, South Korea and Ukraine.

Dale said she will travel extensively next year to these nations and others to see how they might participate. One project she mentioned as attractive to NASA and possibly others is the deployment of an array of telescopes on the dark side of the moon to see far into the universe.

The NASA plan grew out of President Bush's Vision for Space Exploration, which was announced in 2004 and calls for sending astronauts back to the moon and later to Mars. Congress almost unanimously embraced the general plan last year in an authorization bill, but questions remain about its funding. NASA is counting on redirecting billions of dollars from the space shuttle and international space station programs to fund development of a new spaceship, but some critics have complained that the agency is already cutting back its science programs to pay for the moon-Mars project.

It seems appropriate that the space agency is aiming for the moon's south pole, because NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin is fond of likening the lunar project to the exploration of Antarctica. Adventurers first reached Earth's South Pole in the early 20th century, but it wasn't until the 1950s that researchers returned and years later before they established permanent, year-round settlements.

NASA plans to send a robot lander to the moon in 2010 to look for good settlement sites. One of the top candidates now is near the Shackleton Crater (named, fittingly, for Antarctic explorer Ernest Shackleton), near the south pole, but NASA officials said their plans will evolve based on what they learn from rovers and satellites.

The new lunar plan harks back to NASA's Apollo era, when six missions landed on the moon between 1969 and 1972. But unlike Apollo's spacecraft, the new space transport being developed -- the Ares I rocket and Orion capsule -- will have a lander designed for reuse and to serve as a kind of "pickup truck," according to Horowitz. The plan also calls for the development of a pressurized rover that would allow astronauts to ride around the moon without wearing cumbersome spacesuits.

The first test flight of the Ares rocket is scheduled for 2009, and the first manned flight of the Orion is scheduled for 2014.

While NASA is counting on international support and funds to make the lunar settlement possible, the track record for international cooperation in space is mixed. The space station -- which was initially conceived and designed by the United States -- has taken far longer to assemble than planned, and at a far greater cost. Some of the 14 international partners have also chafed over American priorities for the station -- a situation that Dale said NASA hopes to avoid in the moon mission by bringing in partners very early in the planning process.

John Logsdon, director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University, commended NASA for undertaking a "bottom-up" assessment of the project. He said the program seems to have broad support in Congress, though it will probably get more scrutiny now with Democrats in charge.

"The basic assumption in Congress," Logsdon said, "is that this is the way to go."

NASA Plans To Put A Base On The Moon By 2020 (USAT)

By Traci Watson

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — NASA plans to surpass the Apollo missions by establishing a base on the moon that could lead to a permanent human presence on the lunar surface, space agency officials said Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0102507

For the first time since President Bush announced in 2004 that U.S. astronauts would return to the moon, NASA has specified what it plans to do once there. No human has set foot on the moon since 1972. That final stay, the longest, lasted three days.

Under the plans outlined Monday, human habitation of the moon would begin in 2020 with four-person crews that would stay for a week. Visits would lengthen until astronauts could live on the base for up to six months at a stretch. This could occur as early as 2024.

The Apollo missions of the 1960s and 1970s “were limited,” said Doug Cooke, NASA's deputy chief of exploration. “We're looking at this more permanent capability that will allow longer stays and a lot of achievements.”

Cooke and other officials declined to say precisely how much the program would cost or how it would be funded. Deputy NASA Administrator Shana Dale said the costs of building a moon colony would not require an increase in the NASA budget, currently $17 billion per year. Part of the money would come from the retirement of the space shuttle, planned for mid-2010, Dale said.

Last year, NASA Administrator Michael Griffin said that the first voyage back to the moon would cost $100 billion. That includes the price for NASA's new Orion spaceship, a pumped-up version of the Apollo capsule, and the Ares rocket to carry the Orion into space.

Skeptics, such as the Congressional Budget Office and the Government Accountability Office, have warned that NASA is unlikely to be able to mount such an ambitious effort with so little money. Already Griffin has cut NASA's funding of space science and aeronautics research to help pay for the moon program and the high costs of the space shuttle and the International Space Station.

A moon base would help NASA decide what's needed to send people to Mars, said David Portree, a former NASA historian. But he warned that the expense could sink the whole project.

“Running a base is going to be very expensive,” Portree said. “It's going to make running a space station look cheap.” The Congressional Research Service estimates that the station's construction cost will exceed $100 billion, more than five times the first estimate, made in the early '90s.

Saving money was foremost in NASA's thinking in choosing the site for a moon base. It will probably be located at the lunar north or south pole, Dale said, in part because the ample sunlight that hits those regions would make it cheaper to provide power.

The south pole is intriguing to scientists because of the possibility that deep, well-shadowed craters there hold ice, which could be used to provide water as well as fuel. A recent study has raised doubts about that theory.

A Flock Of Frocks And One Weepy Warbler (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Can we just start the evening over? Come back out, do it all over again but this time, you know, differently?

So it went at the Kennedy Center Honors on Sunday, not just for Jessica Simpson -- who broke down onstage over some imperceptible flaw in her tribute to Dolly Parton -- but also for Laura Bush, who mysteriously changed dresses right before the gala.

Why? Turns out that earlier in the evening, the first lady walked into the super-exclusive White House reception for the honorees, wearing the exact same red Oscar de la Renta embroidered tulle jacket and floor-length trumpet skirt as three other party guests, including local philanthropist Vicki Sant.

"Evidently Oscar is very popular this season," press secretary Susan Whitson said of the $8,400 ensemble from the designer's fall 2006 collection. "It just goes to show that no one can resist a beautiful red gown."

The first couple laughed about it. "But she didn't want her guests to feel uncomfortable," Whitson said, so FLOTUS dashed upstairs and slipped into a black lace gown before heading to the KenCen.

It was harder to figure out what was going on with Simpson. The 26-year-old pop starlet kept one arm clutched to her midsection while singing "9 to 5." At the end, she blurted, "Dolly, you make me so nervous, I can't even sing the words right," then scuttled awkwardly off the stage.

Witnesses told us she was a wreck before she went on, weeping while the video tribute to Parton played and pacing anxiously during performances by Carrie Underwood, Kenny Rogers, Alison Krauss and Shania Twain.

"She was overcome with emotion performing the song for Dolly because she has idolized Dolly Parton her entire life and she wanted the song to be perfect," her publicist Cindi Berger said yesterday. "When it wasn't, she was upset with herself."

We didn't hear any mistakes. Said Berger: "She did."

DOJ_NMG_0102508

Producer George Stevens told us, "She was very upset, so we said, 'Would you like to have another shot at it?' " Simpson then redid the song for the TV cameras (the show will air on CBS Dec. 26) once the audience had left the Opera House.

But it was all smiles and hugs in the Grand Foyer, as the stars filtered out to be seated for dinner. "What a photo op!" Parton exclaimed. There she was with Simpson, Twain, Krauss, Reese Witherspoon and Reba McEntire, arms wrapped around each other in a Country Girl Power lineup for every digicam and Nokia in the vicinity.

"Everybody, look this way now!" chirped McEntire.

Then Simpson -- after a quick hello with chum Ken Mehlman (who knew?) -- was outta there, showing us the laced-up back of her black dress as she hightailed it down the Hall of Nations. All that was left was the memory, and the photo that Bob Schieffer had captured of himself with her in his digital camera, which he was proudly showing to Karl Rove.

Witherspoon, radiant in a sparkly slip dress, lasted only a few minutes longer. "I have to catch a plane," she was telling a friend. "Gotta get back to my kids."

Fine -- lots of other folks to see. Like Smokey Robinson posing for pics with childhood pal Aretha Franklin, who snagged a seat next to his at dinner . . . And another A-list traffic jam over by Steven Spielberg's table, though once we drew closer we saw the mob was swarming Tom Hanks, while the director ate quietly with wife Kate Capshaw, in her glamorous sideswept bangs. Hanks later took a seat and chatted animatedly with John Williams. Two matrons approached timidly. "Not while they're eating," warned a buzz-cut bodyguard. At a quieter table, Andrew Lloyd Webber talked to the willowy redhead sitting between him and young crooner Josh Groban.

Curvaceous in black lace, Fran Drescher (yes, "The Nanny") was there with Patrick Kennedy, though not with him -- meaning she was his date, but it wasn't a date date . . . And Joan Collins (she's still here!) with grandly oversize frilly white collar and cuffs.

We found McEntire and husband Narvel Blackstock sitting all alone at a table for 12. "Dolly had to leave," McEntire explained. "She's real tired." (Pronounced "tarred.") Seems it's a lot of work schmoozing with all those people. "She had to get back on the bus and leave to go home."

Doesn't a Kennedy Center Honoree get a private jet? "She sleeps better on her bus," McEntire said.

Well after midnight, Spielberg headed toward the door. "We're going back to the hotel," he said, leaning down to kiss his mother, Leah Adler, "but you can stay here. Party on, Mom."

Bush Welcomes Children To White House (AP)

AP, December 5, 2006

Dozens of children cashed in their equivalent of a golden ticket on Monday: a greeting from the president and a private showing of "Willy Wonka" at the White House.

In a yearly tradition, President Bush and first lady Laura Bush welcomed their young guests to the East Room for a holiday performance. The kids all came from military families, and the president had a message for them.

"We wanted to welcome you here to the White House to, first of all, thank you for your strength — and so that you would do me a favor," the president told the children. He asked them to send an e-mail to their parents stationed overseas to say "how much the commander in chief respects them, admires them and supports them."

Bush and his wife sat with the children for an abbreviated performance of "Willy Wonka," a play based on Roald Dahl's book, "Charlie and the Chocolate Factory." It's the story of Charlie Bucket, who finds a golden ticket to Willy Wonka's chocolate factory and is rewarded by Wonka for showing honesty and character.

The president seemed to enjoy the music, often tapping his feet and nodding along. When he went on stage to thank the performers after the show, the children headed the other way — following Santa Claus out of the room.

How's Your War? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

I am of two minds about what Virginia Sen.-elect James Webb did at a White House reception for new members of Congress. After first trying to avoid speaking to George W. Bush altogether, he was forced to respond when the president approached him and asked, "How's your boy?" Webb replied, "I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President." (Webb's son is a Marine serving there.) "That's not what I asked you," Bush said. "How's your boy?"

"That's between me and my boy, Mr. President," Webb said, ending the conversation right there. Bad manners? Yes. Understandable? Yes, again.

For this act of consummate rudeness, Webb was roundly reprimanded. George F. Will offered him a magisterial rebuke, and so, less magisterially, did some editorial pages. (Why did Webb go to the White House in the first place?) Not only is such behavior rude, but it is usually counterproductive. We don't want to get where we were in the late 1960s, when Lyndon Johnson became a virtual prisoner in the White House, avoiding antiwar demonstrators by simply staying home.

Even that sometimes does not work. Eartha Kitt confronted Lady Bird Johnson at a White House reception, telling her, "You send the best of this country off to be shot and maimed." The next day's Post reported that the first lady went pale. Still, the war ended no sooner -- and not, I should note, before an impassioned opponent of the Vietnam War tried to throw Robert McNamara, the Don Rumsfeld of his day, off the Martha's Vineyard ferry. Much as he did while at the Pentagon, McNamara hung on.

Yet the dastardly act, aside from being oh-so-satisfying to the perp, can have its uses. In this case, it might have jarred Bush into appreciating the fact that many of his critics actually feel keenly about the war in Iraq -- that they are not mere political opponents but people who are morally appalled by a war that continues for no apparent reason. Maybe also the incident made him wonder about Webb, who, after all, hardly fits the demagogic antiwar stereotype constructed by Bush, Karl Rove and Fox News. Webb is a pugnacious sort, a former college boxer, Marine officer in Vietnam and secretary of the Navy under, of all people, Ronald Reagan. I would not, to his face, impeach his patriotism or suggest a dreamy liberalism.

Washington is a bad marriage with monuments. Just to get through the day, it's necessary to lower voices, modulate tempers, eschew insults, voice soft lies -- compromise, compromise, compromise. Quaint parliamentary rules have their utility -- no name-calling, please, and lots of grandiloquence about the "eminent gentleman" who in actuality is a skirt chaser who needs to trim his nasal hair. It is all necessary, like the rules of war or journalistic ethics. Sans manners, nothing would get done. Even with them, precious little is accomplished.

Still, there is accumulating evidence that Bush is talking to mirrors and taking instruction from his dog. He makes no sense, saying he's amenable to change one day and digging in his heels the next. "I'm not going to pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," he said recently. Yes. Absolutely. But what is the mission? Please, ask the dog. Lives are being wasted.

That, of course, is the whole point. This imbroglio about Webb and manners is, at bottom, about the (very) premature deaths of young people in Iraq -- the sons and daughters of people much like Webb. Their only hope is that Bush is a liar rather than a fool. There is ample evidence for both propositions. He vowed enduring loyalty to Rumsfeld while interviewing his replacement, and he has overseen the administration of the war with an incompetence that will earn him a special place in American history.

Maybe the president has a plan for disengaging in Iraq. Maybe, though, he is disengaged himself. If that is the case, the thought occurs that it would take a polite version of a Cagneyesque grapefruit in the face to get his attention. If Webb did that, then a medal, not a rebuke, is in order.

Now, Jim, behave yourself.

Report Says VA's Spending Too Slow (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, December 5, 2006

The Department of Veterans Affairs is too slow to spend the money it budgeted to treat the mental health needs of veterans, including those returning from Iraq and Afghanistan, according to a Congressional study released Monday.

The VA budgeted $300 million in fiscal 2005-06 for new mental health initiatives but spent only $200 million, according to the study by the Government Accountability Office, the watchdog arm of Congress.

The study also found that the VA had little or no way of tracking spending for new mental health initiatives during those two years, and that some of the money it spent might not have gone toward mental health programs.

The VA took issue with the findings. "Unfortunately, the GAO chose to look at the plan as an accounting exercise, focusing primarily on how many dollars are spent," said Matt Burns, VA spokesman. Mental health funds were spent on new initiatives, but Burns said the VA spent money only on programs that met its standards.

VA officials planned to place at least some of the unspent money in a reserve fund to be used in fiscal year 2007, the GAO study says.

"We are taking some time," VA executive Gerald Cross told a House subcommittee Sept. 28. "But we want to make sure it's spent right."

The $300 million in 2005-06 funding came in response to a 2004 VA plan to correct gaps in a variety of areas. Among them: early assistance for Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans suffering from combat stress; mental health treatment programs for a growing number of female veterans; and rehabilitation programs for veterans with serious mental illnesses.

DOJ_NMG_0102510

"Without the commitment to fully fund the mental health care proposals … improvements in VA's mental health services will not be achieved," Rep. Mike Michaud, ranking Democrat for a Veterans Health subcommittee, wrote in a letter last week to VA Secretary Jim Nicholson.

Michaud cited statistics showing that the VA saw almost 18,000 Iraq and Afghanistan veterans diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) during fiscal 2006; the VA had anticipated 2,900 cases.

The VA provides health care to more than 5 million patients, including veterans and their families. It treats homeless veterans, veterans with serious mental illnesses and combat veterans for conditions such as depression, PTSD and substance-abuse problems.

A 2003 Army study showed that 17% of soldiers from combat units were diagnosed with such conditions as PTSD or major depression.

VA Failed To Spend All Money To Beef Up Mental Health Services (NCT)

By Suzanne Gamboa

North County Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Department of Veterans Affairs did not spend all of the extra $300 million it budgeted to increase mental health services and failed to keep track of how some of the money was used, a government report says.

VA launched a plan in 2004 to improve its mental health services for veterans with post-traumatic stress disorders and substance-abuse problems. To fill gaps in services, the department added $100 million for mental health initiatives in 2005 and another $200 million in 2006. That money was to be distributed to its regional networks of hospitals, medical centers and clinics for new services.

But the VA fell short of the spending, by $12 million in 2005 and about $42 million in fiscal 2006, said the Government Accountability Office, Congress investigative arm.

It distributed $35 million in 2005 to its 21 health care networks but didn't inform the networks the money was supposed to be used for mental health initiatives. VA medical centers returned $46 million to headquarters because they couldn't spend the money in fiscal 2006.

In addition, the VA cannot determine to what extent about $112 million was spent on mental health services improvements or new services in 2006.

VA reported in September that more than a third of Iraq and Afghanistan veterans who sought medical treatment from the VA in the 18 months prior reported symptoms of stress or other mental disorders.

Longer and multiple deployments, unpredictable daily attacks and roadside bombings and efforts to reduce the stigma of post-traumatic stress disorders have been cited as reasons for the increased reports.

VA said at the time it had increased funding for mental health services, hired 100 more counselors and was not overwhelmed by the rising demand.

VA spokesman Matt Burns said in a written statement the GAO looked at the agency's Mental Health Strategic Plan as an accounting exercise. "In contrast, VA's emphasis has been on building mental health care capacity and high quality programs to support and treat veterans. VA expends resources for programs that meet these criteria," Burns said.

He said VA has already taken steps to make sure mental health money is used for its intended purpose.

The money is only a portion of what VA spends on mental health. VA planned to spend about $2 billion on mental health services in FY2006. But the additional spending from existing funds on what VA dubbed its Mental Health Care Strategic Plan was trumpeted by VA as way to eliminate gaps in mental health services now and services that would be needed in the future.

"While we are at war we do have to make sure we spend the resources that are allocated for our veterans," said Rep. Michael Michaud, ranking Democrat on the House Veterans Affairs health subcommittee.

He said he thinks VA is overwhelmed. Along with the increased mental stress reports from Iraq and Afghanistan veterans, Vietnam vets are also experiencing flashbacks and recurrences of combat stress problems because of the ongoing wars, he said.

"This goes above and beyond just dealing with the veterans, it deals with the family of veterans which could have long-term implications and additional costs at federal level and state and local level," Michaud said.

Democrats have said they want to increase funding for veterans' health care, in particular its mental health counseling for returning Iraq and Afghanistan vets when they take over Congress next year. They also have said they want to increase the department's oversight and get detailed budget accounting from the VA.

Group Asks Removal Of Koran Swearing-In Critic (WP/AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

An Islamic civil rights group wants a columnist removed from the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council for criticizing Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Koran during the Minnesota Democrat's ceremonial swearing-in next month.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations said yesterday that comments by Dennis Prager, a columnist and conservative talk radio host, displayed an intolerance toward Islam that makes him inappropriate to serve on the council, which oversees the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

President Bush appointed Prager in August to fill the remainder of a five-year term, which expires in January 2011.

In his column last week, Prager wrote: "Insofar as a member of Congress taking an oath to serve America and uphold its values is concerned, America is interested in only one book, the Bible. If you are incapable of taking an oath on that book, don't serve in Congress."

Nihad Awad, CAIR's executive director, sent a letter to the council's chairman, Fred Zeidman, saying, "No one who holds such bigoted, intolerant and divisive views should be in a policymaking position at a taxpayer-funded institution that seeks to educate Americans about the destructive impact hatred has had, and continues to have, on every society."

Messages left yesterday at the Holocaust Museum and at Zeidman's office were not returned.

Prager, in a telephone interview yesterday, offered what he called "a solution to this that would satisfy me and the vast majority of Americans" -- Ellison bringing a Bible with him along with his Koran.

"The issue has never been one of religious freedom or attitudes toward Islam," added Prager, who is Jewish. "The issue has been from the outset honoring the most important text of American history."

Ellison is the first Muslim elected to Congress.

He will replace longtime Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo, who is retiring.

Ellison did not return phone messages yesterday, but a CAIR spokesman, Ibrahim Hooper, questioned Prager's offer.

"It's obviously up to Mr. Ellison to decide, but I don't think that forcing him to swear an oath on a book not of his faith is the answer," Hooper said.

By tradition, all members of the House are sworn in together on the House floor. It's in the photo-op ceremony that a Bible is used -- or in Ellison's case, the Koran.

Meanwhile, the Anti-Defamation League, which fights anti-Semitism and racism, issued a statement calling Prager's comments "intolerant, misinformed and downright un-American."

Postal Service, Union To Take Their Differences To Arbitration (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

The U.S. Postal Service and one of its largest unions, the National Association of Letter Carriers, have broken off contract talks and will take their differences to arbitration.

William H. Young, president of the letter carriers group, said outsourcing was the main issue preventing an agreement. In an e-mail to union members, he said the Postal Service "has signaled its intention" to use contractors for "existing city carrier work," such as delivering mail to homes and businesses in the nation's metropolitan areas.

A spokesman for the Postal Service said he could not comment on specific issues but said the agency had tried "in good faith" to reach an agreement with the letter carriers.

Contract talks continue with three other unions -- the American Postal Workers Union, the National Rural Letter Carriers' Association and the National Postal Mail Handlers Union. Contracts for all the unions expired Nov. 30.

The American Postal Workers Union posted a notice on its Web site yesterday afternoon reporting "substantial progress" in its contract talks. "We are cautiously optimistic" about a possible deal, the union's president, William Burrus, said in the notice. The union has asked rank-and-file union advisers on the talks to come to Washington for a meeting Wednesday, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0102512

Labor costs account for 78 percent of the Postal Service budget, and postal officials often try to avoid having contract disputes decided by a third party. The arbitration process typically takes six months or longer, and the rulings usually give unions some or much of what they sought at the negotiating table, according to Bush administration officials.

More than 616,700 postal employees are covered by union contracts; about 270,640 are represented by the American Postal Workers Union, and about 224,775 are represented by the letter carriers union.

Controlling the cost of mail delivery is a key management issue for the Postal Service, according to the agency's inspector general. Mail is delivered to more than 144 million homes, business and other places in the nation, primarily by city and rural letter carriers. The Postal Service rarely uses contractors to deliver city mail but has more than 6,000 contractors who deliver to mailboxes on highway routes, according to the inspector general.

Young said that the letter carriers union had offered to restructure mail delivery in cities and to help the post office address soaring employee and retiree health-care costs but that postal officials, in exchange, would not agree to protect work performed by letter carriers from outsourcing.

In an apparent reference to the union's lobbying strength on Capitol Hill, Young said the Postal Service had put at risk "a cooperative strategic partnership with NALC in pursuit of an outsourcing strategy that is politically unattainable."Early Outs at Labor

It's time for another round of early outs at the Labor Department.

Labor, which has offered early retirement to employees eight times in the past 10 years, will offer the option next year, from Jan. 1 to Sept. 30.

The department estimates that 2,662 of its 15,349 employees will be eligible to volunteer for retirement.

Employees are eligible for early outs if they have 25 years of service or have 20 years of service and are at least 50. Early outs can lead to reduced pensions for some employees, usually people under 55 covered by the Civil Service Retirement System.

The Labor Department said it was offering early outs to make room for new employees and a different mix of occupational skills. Relatively few employees take early outs, however. This year, only 125 left through a similar program.Retirement

Solly Thomas, acting associate director for human capital at the Office of Personnel Management, retired Dec. 1 after more than 33 years of government service.

Thomas joined the OPM in 2003 and has managed a number of government-wide initiatives, including personnel policy changes under the president's management agenda.

He has worked in eight federal agencies, including the Federal Labor Relations Authority, the International Trade Commission and the Navy.

Can't Be Bothered (WP)

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

IT SHOULDN'T matter whether you're conservative or liberal, for globalization or against: Some trade bills are so obviously beneficial and unobjectionable that there's no excuse for letting them languish. This is the case with a raft of measures that would extend trade preferences for poor countries -- preferences due to expire at the end of the year. Failing to renew them would not save American jobs or advance any other national interest; rather, it would disrupt the economies of U.S. trading partners and create another excuse for foreigners to resent the United States. The lame-duck session of Congress provides a chance to avoid that outcome, but there's no guarantee members will act.

Four trade-preference measures are in jeopardy. The measures would prolong tariff concessions to Andean nations, allow African garments made with third-country fabrics into the U.S. market, extend a similar concession to Haiti and renew the Generalized System of Preferences, which helps more than 100 countries. Passing these measures would not involve granting new market access; it would avoid closing the U.S. market and triggering factory closures in partner countries. Meanwhile, Congress also needs to ratify Vietnam's membership in the World Trade Organization. Without ratification, Vietnam will join the WTO anyway, but the United States will not enjoy the access that Vietnam has granted other WTO partners. The more Congress delays, the greater the head start it will give European and Japanese companies seeking to establish themselves in a fast-growing market of 85 million people.

These trade measures might founder partly because anti-globalization sentiment is growing in Congress, causing a minority of members to oppose all trade deals, no matter how routine. Another factor is that the pro-trade chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), is complicating passage by loading up legislation with his own tactical wheezes. To punish India and Brazil for not doing more to secure passage of the Doha global trade liberalization package, Mr. Thomas wants to restrict the Bush administration's discretion to allow those countries access to U.S. markets, but Mr. Thomas should leave the calibration of sticks and carrots to the president's negotiating team. To encourage Africans to make garments out of locally produced textiles, Mr. Thomas wants to set impossibly tough targets for local content. He should leave the management of Africa's industrial development to Africans.

But the biggest reason these trade measures may fail is the most scandalous: Most members of Congress know that they ought to be extended, but institutional inertia is stopping them from doing the right thing. For the past several months, Congress has put off dealing with the trade preferences, even though their expiration at the end of the year was no secret. Now the deadline is approaching, and members of Congress complain that they lack time to craft the legislation. What Congress is saying is that leaving town for the holidays is more important than jobs in developing countries. No wonder the United States is seen as arrogant.

Fed Official Moskow Continues To Expect Economic Growth (WSJ)

By Stephen Wisnefski

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

CHICAGO -- The president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago said Monday that the latest economic data, including numbers last week showing a contraction in the manufacturing sector, haven't changed his view of the economy.

"Overall, I think the economy is solid," Michael Moskow said in an interview that was webcast on CNBC.com. Mr. Moskow pointed to productivity growth, low unemployment and strong demand from countries outside the U.S. as factors that buoy the domestic economy.

Mr. Moskow said that the Chicago Fed is expecting gross domestic product growth to be "somewhat below trend," citing a forecast for 2007 of a 2.8% expansion. "I don't think that the data we have seen are out of line with that forecast," he added.

On Friday, the Institute of Supply Management, a private research group, said that its index of manufacturing activity fell to 49.5 in November. The figure came in well below market expectations and marked the first time in nearly three-and-a-half years that the ISM number didn't show expansion.

Mr. Moskow, who isn't currently a voting member of the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee but will be in 2007, said that it is essential for the Fed to look at all incoming data to see how its forecasts could be impacted and to adjust monetary policy accordingly.

The FOMC has left its benchmark federal funds rate at 5.25% at each of its last three meetings, after tightening monetary policy steadily over a two-year period to contain inflationary pressure.

Mr. Moskow and other Fed officials in recent weeks have said that inflation threats remain. Mr. Moskow has also said that further rate increases could be needed, as the risk of inflation being too high is greater than the risk of economic growth being too slow.

On Monday, Mr. Moskow said that core inflation -- which excludes energy and food costs -- is expected to come down somewhat over the coming year. He also said that recent data indicate that inflation is moving in the right direction.

Nonetheless, he said the Fed has to ensure that inflation doesn't stay elevated for an extended period of time and that inflation expectations remain under control. He noted that the Fed can't let up its guard on inflation.

Stocks Rebound On Takeovers, Oil-Price Decline (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

All it took was a couple of takeover announcements and a dip in oil futures, and stocks wiped out all of last week's losses.

Although they already have pushed indexes to double-digit gains since July 14, investors still appear prepared to buy.

After falling 86.04 points last week on disappointing economic news, the Dow Jones Industrial Average yesterday rebounded 89.72 points, or 0.74%, to finish at 12283.85. It is up 14.6% in 2006, less than 60 points from the record 12342.56 hit last month.

The Dow would have been up another 23.7 points except for a 10.6% decline at Dow-industrials component Pfizer, which abandoned a prospective cholesterol drug that was supposed to be a blockbuster. The decline knocked $21.3 billion off the overall stock-market value of the drug maker.

Investors applauded some takeover announcements -- that Bank of New York would buy Mellon Financial and LSI Logic would acquire Agere Systems. Takeovers reassure investors by indicating that acquiring companies see value in current stock prices. (Mergers boosted European markets, too1.)

DOJ_NMG_0102514

More important to some traders, oil futures, which had been rebounding, pulled back 99 cents to $62.44, following a National Weather Service forecast of warm December weather. "As oil goes, so does the stock market. That just happens to be the data point that everyone is concentrating on at this moment," said Doug Johnston, head of trading at Boston-based brokerage firm Canaccord Adams. Overall, he added, "the stock trend is still up."

Investors now await the November jobs report due Friday, which Fed officials have indicated they will examine as a key inflation indicator.

The National Association of Realtors announced a bigger-than-expected drop in its index of pending home sales for October. But Michael Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, told CNBC that "the economy is solid."

Treasury bonds, which react to economic surprises, were little changed, as was the dollar, which has rattled investors with its recent slide.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index pushed to another six-year high, rising 0.89%, or 12.41 points, to 1409.12, up 12.9% this year. The volatile Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 1.46%, or 35.18 points, to 2448.39, ahead 11% in 2006. The Russell 2000 small-stock index hit another record.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks and bonds rose2. The 10-year Treasury note rose3 2/32, or 63 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.431%.

The dollar was mixed4. It traded at 115.33 yen, down from 115.47, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.3328 from $1.3336.

Deals Propel Stocks To Highs For Year (USAT)

USA Today, December 5, 2006

NEW YORK — The broad U.S. stock market closed at a fresh 2006 high Monday as investors put aside Pfizer's decision to halt development of a key drug and focused instead on another series of takeover deals (stories, 1B, 9B).

The Standard & Poor's 500 index rose 12.41 points, or 0.9%, at 1409.12, hitting a fresh six-year high. The Russell 2000, an index of small-company stocks, notched a record high, gaining 14.68 points, or 1.9%, to 795.85.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 89.72 points, or 0.7%, to 12,283.85, while the Nasdaq composite added 35.18 points, or 1.5%, to 2448.39.

Pfizer shares fell $2.96, or 11%, to $24.90, after the company stopped the development of the cholesterol drug torcetrapib because of deaths and cardiovascular problems among people taking the drug during clinical trials (story, 3B).

The news was offset by several merger announcements that reinforced the belief that companies are optimistic about the economy and therefore are willing to take some risks. Leading them was Bank of New York's $16.5 billion deal to buy rival Mellon Financial to create an asset-management powerhouse.

Bank of New York shares jumped 12% to end at $39.75, while Mellon shares ended up 7% at $42.78.

“Trading activity is being driven by the large amount of merger and acquisition announcements, specifically in the banking, semiconductor and hotel sectors of the market,” says Michael Sheldon, market strategist at Spencer Clark.

LSI Logic, a maker of storage and DVD chips, said it would pay $4 billion for semiconductor and software storage company Agere Systems, sparking a rally in chip stocks. The semiconductor index rose 2%.

A break in the dollar's recent decline also raised the allure of U.S. stocks as investors bet on a strong Wall Street year-end finish.

The dollar edged up against most major currencies on Monday as investors moved in following a dollar decline that has shaved some 3% off its value in less than two weeks.

Crude ended down 99 cents a barrel at $62.44 amid forecasts of warmer weather in the USA and doubts among traders of another OPEC production cut.

The drop in oil prices spurred demand for industrial stocks such as United Technologies, Honeywell and 3M. United Technologies gained $1.04 to $64.90. Honeywell gained 80 cents to $43.61. 3M rose 91 cents to $80.89.

Merger Announcements Lift Stocks Even As Pfizer Dumps Key Drug (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 4 -- Wall Street surged higher Monday as investors dismissed Pfizer's decision to halt development of a key drug and focused instead on another series of takeover deals.

The Dow Jones industrial average rose 89.72, or 0.74 percent, to 12,283.85. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index was up 12.41, or 0.89 percent, at 1409.12, and the Nasdaq composite index added 35.18, or 1.46 percent, to 2448.39.

Pfizer shares fell by about 11 percent after the company stopped the development of torcetrapib, a cholesterol drug, because of deaths and cardiovascular problems among people taking it in clinical trials. The stock was also downgraded by several Wall Street analysts concerned that Pfizer's revenue growth would weaken.

But that news was offset by several merger announcements that reinforced the belief that companies are optimistic about the economy and therefore are willing to take some risks. Leading them was Bank of New York's $16.5 billion deal to buy rival Mellon Financial to create an asset management powerhouse. The all-stock deal will create the world's leading asset servicer with $16.6 trillion in assets under management. It also ranks among the top 10 global money managers, with more than $1.1 trillion in assets under management.

LSI Logic said it would buy rival chip and storage systems maker Agere Systems for $4 billion in stock. The purchase price represents a 28 percent premium for Agere shareholders.

And Kirk Kerkorian's investment firm, Tracinda, launched a cash tender offer to acquire 15 million shares of casino operator MGM Mirage.

Stocks stumbled Friday after a manufacturing survey unexpectedly contracted in November, pushing the major indicators to a loss for the week. However, major indicators are still poised to finish 2006 with double-digit gains.

Movers

Pfizer fell $2.96, to $24.90.

Merck gave up 36 cents, to $44.70.

Schering-Plough added 80 cents, to $22.73.

Bank of New York gained $4.27, to $39.75.

Mellon rose $2.73, to $42.78.

LSI fell $1.44, to $9.12.

Agere Systems rose $1.51, to $19.30.

MGM Mirage rose $2.68, to $56.35.

Wanted: Factory Workers (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, December 5, 2006

EMMAUS, Pa. — Michael Bunner has done everything he can think of to hire workers.

He's increased pay, offered training and recently, hired a man straight out of prison.

While his story isn't too surprising given that the unemployment rate of 4.4% is at a 51/2-year low, what is unexpected is that Bunner is in the manufacturing sector, an industry that has been grabbing headlines for losing jobs. But despite all those layoffs, Bunner can't find plastic welders or even people who are willing and able to be trained for the specialty job.

“I'm turning down contracts,” says Bunner, president of Electro Chemical Engineering and Manufacturing, which makes chemical tanks. “I could expand 20-30% overnight if I had more people.”

Much has been made of the loss of millions of manufacturing jobs in the USA in recent years.

But manufacturers, regardless of size, specialty or location, across the USA are reporting a dire shortage of skilled workers: people such as welders, electricians or machinists with a craft that goes beyond pushing buttons or stacking boxes but does not require a degree. That shortage is threatening their ability to meet current demand, let alone expand their businesses. The gap could threaten the viability of the U.S. manufacturing sector at a time when it is facing heavy competition from abroad.

In a survey of 800 manufacturers conducted by the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM) last year, more than 80% said they were experiencing a shortage of skilled workers. In October, manufacturers surveyed by the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia said “finding qualified workers” was their biggest business problem.

The shortage of skilled workers is the result of a number of factors. One of the biggest is that manufacturing in the USA is becoming more high-tech and skill-based as the more repetitive, less-skilled work is moving abroad. Such jobs require greater expertise.

Plus, baby boomers with years of experience are retiring. And younger people are bypassing factory jobs, viewing them as repetitive, dirty and without much opportunity, a view that hasn't been helped by all the factory closings and headlines about manufacturing jobs moving to China.

These factors have combined to create a serious worker shortage with no end in sight.

“I've never seen anything like it in my life,” says Bunner, whose father worked in a factory when he was growing up in West Virginia. “When I was a kid, people would stand in line for hours for an opportunity at a job like I have available. I can't get people to show up for an interview.”

DOJ_NMG_0102516

There were 10.2 million manufacturing production workers in the USA in October, down 19% from 10 years ago and 28% fewer than 40 years ago.

The percentage of all workers in the USA employed in manufacturing has been declining for 50 years. In October, 10% of the U.S. workforce was employed in the manufacturing sector, an all-time low. In 1946, one out of every three workers had jobs in manufacturing.

But the loss of jobs doesn't mean that manufacturing is disappearing from the USA. U.S. manufacturing production last year totaled $1.5 trillion, or 12% of gross domestic product, the broadest measure of economic activity within U.S. borders.

The sector has become more specialized, with a greater focus on technology. With a boom in productivity in manufacturing, firms are able to produce more with fewer workers.

Innovation in the manufacturing sector means that the jobs require greater skills than ever before. According to an analysis by economists Richard Deitz and James Orr at the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, employment in high-skilled manufacturing jobs rose 37%, or by 1.2 million jobs, from 1983 to 2002. At the same time, low-skilled factory jobs dropped 25%, or by approximately 2 million workers.

"The time when you can be relatively unskilled and work in manufacturing for a long time with just a high school degree and make a good salary to support a family is gone," National Association of Manufacturers chief economist David Huether says.

But finding people with the right skills isn't easy.

"It's limiting my growth," says John West, president of Fox Valley Metal-Tech in Green Bay, Wis.

Earlier this year West turned down a $1.5 million contract with Kraft Foods because he didn't have enough welders. That order would have grown his business by 10%.

West's firm, which produces metal machinery parts, has increased pay and offers full health benefits, training, a matching 401(k) plan and bonuses to employees who refer people to work there.

"You get a good worker who has that skill set, you make sure they don't want to leave," West says. "You pay them well; you treat them well."

That's good news for Richard Smith. The 29-year-old from Chillicothe, Ohio, is graduating Dec. 15 from a nine-month welding program at the Hobart Institute of Welding Technology. He's received three job offers, paying $16 to $19 an hour, or more than three times the federal minimum wage. The companies are also paying medical benefits, offering 401(k) plans and paying for additional training.

"It really took me off my feet," says Smith, who got interested in welding while he was in the Navy.

Andre Odermatt, president of the Hobart Institute in Troy, Ohio, says job postings at the school have risen 40% in the last year. Companies are increasingly offering sign-on bonuses of as much as $3,000 and are coming from as far away as California and offering to pay relocation for students willing to move, he says.

"It's like having gone through Harvard," he says. "The world is open for them."

Odermatt and others say they think the shortage of skilled manufacturing workers is largely a function of perception.

"Culturally, we have browbeaten manufacturing to such an extent that we don't have people interested," says John Sinn, interim director of the Center for Applied Technology at Bowling Green State University.

Sinn and others say it is now up to people in manufacturing to change that perception, particularly among younger people and their parents.

"Everyone wants their kids to be doctors, lawyers and dentists. … (But) all of us can't be that," says Lloyd McCaffrey, director of manufacturing technology at Williams International, a gas turbine manufacturer in Ogden, Utah.

McCaffrey's company is investing $30 million in a program at nearby Ogden-Weber Applied Technology College that will bring in students, some of them in high school, for hands-on training in machining.

Representatives at Oklahoma State University-Okmulgee meet with students, some of whom are in middle school, to teach them about manufacturing. The university also recently started a program to help train disadvantaged youths, some of whom are on probation, in manufacturing basics.

"What we're saying is, 'Here is a good option.' … This is a very good career for a lot of people," says Roy Cail, executive director of the economic development and training center at the university.

What concerns Cail and others is that as the workforce ages and the baby boomers retire, the shortage of skilled manufacturing workers could grow more acute.

In 2005, 43% of manufacturing workers were 45 years old or older. That's up from 32% in 1995, according to a NAM analysis of Labor Department data.

"As the labor force ages, there really aren't young kids coming into the trades," says Patrick Duffy, president of American Machine & Gear in Portland, Ore. Duffy recently paid workers triple time to work on Thanksgiving to get an order out.

DOJ_NMG_0102517

At Electro Chemical Engineering and Manufacturing, workers create tanks that are used to process, store or haul chemicals. The steel tanks are lined with a special plastic that prevents erosion and sometimes contain reactors to make the chemicals. Bunner's clients include major companies in the pharmaceutical, chemical and high-tech industries, such as Dow Chemical, Bayer, DuPont and General Electric.

Building the tanks takes a special skill in plastic welding. Even the tiniest crack can mean a chemical leakage, a potentially dangerous and even deadly situation.

But finding plastic welders, or even people interested in learning the skill, has become next to impossible. Bunner has had three open slots for welders since April. People have come in who can't do simple math — such as calculating square footages, a key skill when 1 square foot of plastic material goes for $250. He's also had people come in who have never used a tape measure or read blueprints.

Not only has Bunner increased pay, he offers a 401(k) with a matching program, health insurance and vacation time. But that still isn't working, so he's had to "go outside the box" to recruit, as he puts it.

When a local company shut down, he set up a booth in its human resources department. He hired two people that way. And he's working with the local rescue mission and prison ministry to try to identify candidates.

Bunner is also trying to bring former employees back. An employee who retired at 65 came back to work when he was 68. Soon, the company will be mailing letters to 13 former employees, asking if they'd be interested in working night or weekend hours.

"The fact that they worked for us and they are still alive, we are contacting them," he says.

Bunner notes with a tinge of irony that his business is just down the street from Allentown, Pa., the town Billy Joel made famous in 1982 with his song Allentown. In it Joel described the area's declining manufacturing base, particularly in the steel sector, saying it was "getting very hard to stay."

Electro Chemical used to serve the steel industry but has since adapted to more high-tech uses in the evolving economy, like many other companies.

"We had to adapt or die," he says.

But unless he finds enough people who can, as he puts it, "work with your hands and work with your head," companies like his are going to struggle to get ahead. He's perplexed why more people aren't going into manufacturing.

"Manufacturing has an ugly aura," he says. But "you can't have everyone sitting in a Dilbert cubicle. … Working with your hands, there's nothing wrong with that."

USA Today, December 5, 2006

At times, Kathy Emmons can sound like a tour guide.

Wyoming, says the director of the state's department of workforce services, isn't as cold in the winter as people think. There's very little traffic. Tons of skiing and snowboarding. No state income tax.

And the best part: lots of available jobs.

Wyoming, a state with a population of around 500,000, is seeing a boom in the energy, coal mining, high-tech data storage, communications and health care industries. The need for all kinds of workers, especially skilled ones, is so great that the state is actively recruiting from Michigan, were the situation is almost the exact opposite.

For the past two years, as General Motors, then Ford Motor and now Chrysler Group have sounded the siren on their worsening financial situations, workers have lived under the daily stress of knowing their jobs could be eliminated at any moment. More than 70,000 hourly autoworkers have agreed to take buyout packages this year.

The impact of those job losses is reverberating throughout Michigan's economy, affecting supplier companies that make everything from steel wheel wells to paper towels used in plant restrooms.

So, Wyoming officials thought, why not bring some of Michigan's displaced workers 1,000 miles west? The recruiting effort was "born out of absolute necessity to bring in people to fill jobs," Emmons says. "With only a half a million people, we just don't have enough people to fill the jobs."

About 100 people have made the move so far, and 6,000 more Michiganians have posted résumés on Wyoming's jobs website. Emmons considers the recruiting effort a big success, and the state is now brainstorming to determine what other regions to target for workers.

Few kids — except maybe some die-hard skiers — grow up dreaming of moving to Wyoming to make it big. Sandwiched between Idaho and Utah to the west and South Dakota and Nebraska to the east, the Rocky Mountain state has a reputation for harsh winters and, well, that might be about it.

DOJ_NMG_0102518

"We want to make sure we target states that make sense," Emmons says. "People think of Wyoming as having really hard winters. It really doesn't. … But it wouldn't make sense to recruit people from Florida."

Michigan may be a perfect target area. It's a state where winter lasts for five or six months. And its unemployment rate was 6.9% in October, the highest in the nation. Wyoming's rate was 3.3%. The national average was 4.4%.

"We've clearly had a difficult time over the last three years," says Dana Johnson, chief economist for Detroit's Comerica Bank. "It feels terrible, and it's discouraging and frustrating. Some people will react to that by looking for opportunities elsewhere, where the wind is more at their back."

Karen and Brian Peters, longtime Michigan residents, never thought they'd leave the state before retiring four or five years from now. Karen, a University of Michigan alumna and huge football fan, was used to spending summers by the lake and fall weekends at Michigan's "Big House" football stadium.

After her husband was laid off from his job as an electrician, Karen's job as a nurse managing workers' compensation claims continued paying the bills. But as Brian's unemployment dragged on, things started getting tough.

"We tried to stay very positive with the friends we have in Michigan, but it was very hard on my husband," Karen Peters said.

So when Brian easily landed a job working as an electrician in the Rio Tinto coal mines in Wyoming, Karen started looking, too. She found an opening for a job working for the state and got it with just one phone interview.

"There was no way I could say we weren't going to do it," says Karen Peters, who has three grandchildren.

There could be a downside to a mass exodus of skilled workers from Michigan, warns David Cole, chairman for the Center for Automotive Research. While the job losses seem significant today, many of the people accepting buyouts were close to retirement age anyway and would have left within the next four or five years.

Cole says the auto industry likely will face a shortage of skilled workers within the next decade. "We're very close to the point where the question is going to be, 'Where am I going to find someone to fill this job?' "

More Borrowers With Risky Loans Are Falling Behind (WSJ)

By Ruth Simon And James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Americans who have stretched themselves financially to buy a home or refinance a mortgage have been falling behind on their loan payments at an unexpectedly rapid pace.

The surge in mortgage delinquencies in the past few months is squeezing lenders and unsettling investors world-wide in the $10 trillion U.S. mortgage market. The pain is most apparent in subprime mortgages, though there are signs it is spreading to other parts of the mortgage market.

Subprime mortgages are loans made to borrowers who are considered to be higher credit risks because of past payment problems, high debt relative to income or other factors. Lenders typically charge them higher interest rates -- as much as four percentage points more than more-credit-worthy borrowers pay -- one reason subprime mortgages are among the most profitable segments of the industry.

They also have been among the fastest-growing segments. Subprime mortgage originations climbed to $625 billion in 2005 from $120 billion in 2001, according to Inside Mortgage Finance, a trade publication. Like other types of mortgages, subprime home loans are often packaged into securities and sold to investors, helping lenders limit their risks.

Until the past year or so, delinquency rates were low by historical standards, thanks to low interest rates and rising home prices, which made it easy for borrowers to refinance or sell their homes if they ran into trouble. But as the housing market peaked and loan volume leveled off, some lenders responded by relaxing their lending standards. Now, the downside of that strategy is becoming more apparent. (See related article1.)

Based on current performance, 2006 is on track to be one of the worst ever for subprime loans, according to UBS AG. "We are a bit surprised by how fast this has unraveled," says Thomas Zimmerman, head of asset-backed securities research at UBS. Roughly 80,000 subprime borrowers who took out mortgages packaged into securities this year are behind on their payments, the bank says.

Though delinquency rates on subprime mortgages originated in the past year have soared to the highest levels in a decade, economists don't expect any significant harm to the nation's economy or financial systems. But if late payments and foreclosures continue to rise at a faster-than-expected pace, the pain could extend beyond homeowners and lenders to the investors who buy mortgage-backed securities.

Several lenders are already feeling the sting. H&R Block Inc., which operates Option One, a major subprime lender, said last week that its mortgage-services unit posted a pretax loss of $39 million in the fiscal second quarter ended Oct. 31, compared with a year-earlier pretax profit of $48.8 million. The Kansas City-based tax-services company said last month it is considering selling Option One, which has been struggling with higher interest rates and defaults, and is closing 12 branch offices.

On Friday, KeyCorp said it reached a deal to sell its subprime Champion Mortgage business. Analysts at Friedman, Billings, Ramsey & Co. put the price for the company's subprime mortgage operation at $130 million, "far below" the $200 million to $250 million they expected. A spokeswoman for KeyCorp declined to comment, except to say that KeyCorp feels it "definitely generated a fair price" for both the unit and its loan portfolio, which was sold separately. She added that KeyCorp was leaving the subprime market because "it no longer fits with our long-term strategic priorities."

Soaring delinquencies are making some lenders more cautious, which is likely to put further pressure on the weak housing market. Yesterday, the National Association of Realtors said that its index for pending home sales for October fell a seasonally adjusted rate of 1.7% from September and was down 13.2% from a year earlier.

Delinquency rates have been rising steadily since the middle of 2005. But the trend has accelerated sharply in the past two to three months, according to an analysis by UBS. The figures don't include loans that lenders were forced to repurchase because the borrower went into default in the first few months; such repurchases also have increased sharply this year.

In October, borrowers were 60 days or more behind in payments on 3.9% of the subprime home loans packaged into mortgage securities this year, UBS says. That's nearly twice the delinquency rate on new subprime loans recorded a year earlier.

Carol Alter, a mail carrier in Aurora, Ohio, says she bought her first home for $99,000 at a sheriff's foreclosure sale in February, but felt pinched right from the start by her nearly $80,000 subprime mortgage. She says closing costs on the loan totaled $6,500, rather than the $2,500 she expected, forcing her to drain her savings and miss payments on her utility bills.

Ms. Alter says she fell behind on her mortgage payments in June after she hurt her leg and missed several weeks of work. She has been able to stave off foreclosure, she says, with the help of a $2,100 interest-free loan from Neighborhood Development Services in Ravenna, which operates a foreclosure rescue fund.

How much higher delinquencies further climb will depend in part on the depth of the current housing slump. Mortgage delinquencies generally rise when the housing market cools because borrowers who are in financial trouble find it harder to sell their homes. In addition, if prices fall, they may not have enough equity in their homes to refinance their mortgage.

The subprime industry's current troubles can be traced back to 2003 and 2004, when defaults were unusually low. Investors who purchased these loans did well and were eager to buy more. That encouraged lenders to lower their standards, making loans to more people with low credit ratings. Lenders also grew less inclined to demand full documentation of income and assets and more willing to offer "piggyback" loans that allowed borrowers to finance 90% or 100% of the purchase price without being required to buy private mortgage insurance.

Many lenders kept introductory "teaser" rates low even after short-term interest rates began rising in June 2005, while increasing the amount the rate could rise on the first adjustment. That meant borrowers would face sharply higher costs when their monthly payments were reset.

Fraud has also increased. Some borrowers who took out no- or low-documentation loans were coached by loan officers or mortgage brokers to inflate their incomes and couldn't afford even their first mortgage payment, says Theresa Ortiz, a foreclosure manager with Neighborhood Housing Services of New York City, a nonprofit that works with homeowners in financial trouble.

Even after the housing market started to cool in late 2005, lenders continued to offer credit on easy terms. Many didn't begin tightening up until a few months ago. Now, they are pulling back. Accredited Home Lenders Holding Co., for example, is doing fewer piggyback and stated-income loans -- or loans that don't require borrowers to fully document their income -- especially for people with lower credit scores. In retrospect, "the tightening process should have started a bit earlier," says James Konrath, Accredited's CEO.

Recent analyses by UBS and by RBS Greenwich Capital show that subprime loans made in 2006 are going into foreclosure at a faster pace than loans made in previous years. In many cases these loans are "so bad right off the bat" and so far beyond the borrower's ability to pay that giving the borrower more time to pay or restructuring the loan wouldn't help, says Michael van Zalingen, director of homeownership services at Neighborhood Housing Services of Chicago, a nonprofit organization that works with financially distressed homeowners.

If delinquencies continue to grow, the pain could also be felt by investors who have flooded into the market for subprime securities. Because of the way mortgage-backed securities are structured, investors who buy investment-grade securities aren't likely to be hurt if losses are close to expectations. But if losses on the underlying mortgages substantially exceed expectations, some investors who buy the riskiest slices of subprime securities are likely to rack up losses. These include hedge funds and investors who buy collateralized debt obligations, pools of debt instruments that are often snapped up by foreign buyers.

Because the underlying loans have gotten riskier, credit-rating agencies are telling issuers of mortgage-backed bonds to set aside more money to cover losses than they did three years ago in order to get an AAA rating for their bonds.

DOJ_NMG_0102520

But some recent deals are already coming under review. Standard & Poor's Corp. put one deal backed by loans issued by Fremont General Corp.'s mortgage unit on credit watch for possible downgrade last month and says it could take similar action on deals from several other issuers within the next few months. Fremont declined to comment.

"We are really monitoring very, very closely the portfolios of all the subprime issuers," says Ernestine Warner, head of RMBS Surveillance. "It's an industrywide trend."

Last week, Moody's Investors Service put a third 2006 deal on credit watch for a possible downgrade. Fitch Ratings also has a 2006 deal on credit watch. When mortgage-backed securities are downgraded it is typically during their third or fourth year.

Predicting losses on these securities is a challenge because there's little or no historical evidence to show how subprime loans will perform at a time when home prices are falling, says Thomas Lawler, a housing economist in Vienna, Va. An analysis by Merrill Lynch & Co. found that losses on recent subprime deals could be "in the 6% to 8% range" if home prices are flat next year and could rise to the "double digits" if home prices fall by 5%. Falling home prices could trigger losses not only for investors who bought riskier classes of mortgage-backed securities, but also for some holders of A-rated bonds, according to the report.

Dems' Gains In New Hampshire Spur 2008 Optimism For Sununu's Seat (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

Hill, December 5, 2006

If it was a Democratic wave that swept the country last month, it was a Democratic tsunami rushing over New Hampshire.

Battle lines will surely be drawn in 2008 in the Granite State over its two state houses and two U.S. House seats, which all flipped Democratic in dramatic fashion on Election Day — not to mention the state's having the first presidential primary in the nation.

But the lone red state in the Northeast, if one can still call it red, still has two Republican senators who were not up for reelection this year. In two years, however, freshman Sen. John Sununu (R) could well be headed for a race worthy of what has become the biggest little state in American politics.

Nearly a quarter of the 400 seats in the state House flipped, and exactly one quarter of the 24 seats in the state Senate flipped. Democrats now control each chamber with a nearly 60 percent majority.

Coupled with the reelection of Democratic Gov. John Lynch, these shifts give New Hampshire Democrats control of the state capitol for the first time in more than 130 years and a bright eye toward 2008 and, specifically, Sununu's seat.

"Certainly, the environment is more favorable for a Democrat than it has been in quite some time," said Portsmouth Mayor Steve Marchand (D), who last week indicated he would weigh a challenge to Sununu. "From a Democratic perspective, New Hampshire had about as favorable a day as any state in the country a few weeks ago."

The state-level action was overshadowed nationally by the losses of the state's two House members, Republican Reps. Jeb Bradley and Charlie Bass. Bradley was stunned by underfunded anti-war activist Carol Shea-Porter while Bass lost to Democrat Paul Hodes.

Shea-Porter and Hodes both figure to be attractive targets in 2008, and the state GOP is already attacking them in press releases.

The events of last month capped off a shift in the political landscape of New Hampshire, said St. Anselm College politics professor Dante Scala.

Scala said the transition from red to blue in New Hampshire is something that has been evolving for a while. The Republican-dominated state government simply hadn't yet changed to reflect it, he said.

"The political demographics of the state have deteriorated for John Sununu since 2002; 2002 was, in retrospect, a high-water mark for the Republican Party for the whole decade and maybe for longer than that," Scala said. "Ever since then, Democrats have really had the upper hand in terms of simple voter enthusiasm.

President Bush won New Hampshire in 2000, but Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) won it in 2004.

"Republicans can no longer count on a lead among the base voters the way they used to," said Scala.

Scala suggested that Sununu would be especially vulnerable in the absence of a Republican presidential nominee who appeals to the state's voters, adding that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who ran away with nearly 50 percent of the vote in the 2000 presidential primary there, would be a boon to Sununu.

The trick for Democrats is finding a candidate worthy of the race, and three potential challengers with valuable statewide experience appear unlikely to run.

Perhaps the strongest candidate, Lynch, was returned to office with a record 74 percent of the vote last month and doesn't plan to leave.

Former state Sen. Burt Cohen (D), who dropped a bid against Sen. Judd Gregg (R) in 2004 amid flawed financial filings, was recently charged with disobeying a police officer and resisting arrest during an incident stemming from a traffic stop.

DOJ_NMG_0102521

And former Gov. Jeanne Shaheen (D), who lost to Sununu by four points in 2002, is unlikely to run again, according to a New Hampshire Democratic Party source who "would be surprised" if Shaheen left her post as head of Harvard University's Institute of Politics. Asked about Sununu, Shaheen was reported in The Harvard Law Record as saying she has noticed that Sununu's approval rating is under 50 percent. She could not be reached for comment.

State senators who have been mentioned as potential candidates are also faced with deciding between their newfound majority and a difficult and costly bid to unseat Sununu. State Sen. Maggie Hassan, who will be a part of the new majority's leadership, told The Hill last week that her party's ascent quashed any thought she might have had of running.

State Sens. Peter Burling, Joe Foster and David Gottesman have also been mentioned, along with former Rep. Dick Swett.

Marchand, 32, indicated he would mull the decision with his family over the next several weeks and said it is important that he or any candidate decide by early next year so he or she can compete financially. Sununu, who raised $3.5 million and was outspent by more than $2 million in 2002, had $560,000 on hand at the end of September.

State Democratic Party Chairwoman Kathy Sullivan said she is optimistic that the gains Democrats made in the state will lead to increased interest in running against Sununu, since candidates will feel better about their chances.

She said adding hotly contested U.S. Senate and presidential races to defending their gains in the state and the U.S. House will surely make for a full plate for state Democrats, but that it's a nice problem to have.

"We were saying on election night — it's like the New Hampshire we always hoped we would see but never dreamed would happen," Sullivan said. "It's great. Now we've got to just try to hold on."

In a statement, Sununu said he would run his 2008 campaign just like past efforts.

"As they have always been, our campaign in 2008 will be an aggressive town-to-town, person-to-person effort — strong on grassroots organization and focused on the issues that matter most to New Hampshire citizens," Sununu said.

Brownback Moves Toward White House Bid (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, December 5, 2006

After taking the first step in a presidential bid on Monday, Sen. Sam Brownback said he would start a 10-state tour with a traditional stop in Iowa. Then he's going to jail.

The Kansas Republican plans to spend Friday night at Louisiana's notorious state penitentiary in Angola to highlight the problem of recidivism and programs that can help prisoners become law-abiding members of the community.

It's an unusual route, possibly a first for a potential presidential candidate. But the prison stay captures the complexity of Brownback's views and his desire to broaden his appeal beyond religious conservatives who form his natural base.

"There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion," Brownback said in a statement.

Brownback established an exploratory committee that will allow him to travel the country and raise money while gauging support for his long-shot White House bid.

Brownback, 50, says his deep faith in God guides his well-known opposition to abortion, gay marriage and embryonic stem-cell research. He pledged to make "issues of life," fiscal restraint and tax reform key components of his effort to woo supporters.

But his faith also leads him to tackle social injustice around the world. He's spearheaded legislation to fight genocide in Sudan and clamp down on human slave trafficking. Last week, he took an AIDS test with a potential White House rival on the Democratic side — Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois — to encourage others to be tested.

"We believe in a culture of life — that every human life is a beautiful, sacred, unique child of a loving God," Brownback said in a statement on his new Web site.

Brownback has openly weighed a presidential bid for nearly two years, but has struggled to build a national profile despite more than a dozen trips to Iowa and other states with early nomination contests.

The senator's best chance to make a splash in Iowa remains with influential members of the GOP's powerful conservative Christian wing. Those voters tend to be skeptical of better-known, more moderate Republicans such as Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, who also have established exploratory committees.

The number of possible candidates with a claim to the religious right has shrunk in recent weeks with the defeat of Sen. George Allen of Virginia in the midterm election and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's decision to forego a run for president.

But with many other contenders expected to jump into the wide-open race, Brownback needs to focus on Iowa and spend as much time as he can to generate more name recognition, said Chuck Hurley, president of the conservative Iowa Family Policy Center and an old law school classmate who's been supporting Brownback.

"The next 30 to 60 days obviously will be critical," Hurley said. "He's really got to describe who he is and get enough recognition that people see for sure that he's serious and that he's credible."

On Monday, Brownback announced 20 members of his exploratory advisory committee, an eclectic mix ranging from anti-abortion activists to business executives, including: Domino's Pizza founder Tom Monaghan, former Major League Baseball commissioner Bowie Kuhn, and the Rev. Frank Pavone, head of the advocacy group Priests for Life.

Brownback, who grew up on a farm near tiny Parker, Kan., was elected to the U.S. House in 1994 with the wave of Republicans who seized control of Congress. Two years later, he won a special election to succeed Bob Dole in the Senate after Dole left the seat to run for president.

Brownback promised to serve no more than two terms and has said he will not seek re-election in 2010.

Brownback Takes Step Toward Seeking GOP Presidential Nod (CQ)

By Martin Kady II

Congressional Quarterly, December 5, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback is joining an increasingly crowded field of 2008 presidential candidates, hoping his social conservative credentials will appeal to Republican primary voters.

Brownback, R-Kan., has formed an exploratory committee, allowing him to raise money and travel. He would be considered a dark horse right out of the gate, standing in the shadows of Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani. But Brownback says there is room in the Republican race for a committed social conservative who has been more outspoken on gay marriage, judicial activism and abortion. In courting the right wing, Brownback will be competing immediately with outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, another favorite of conservatives.

“I am running to spread hope and ideas,” Brownback said Monday in a statement on his Web site. “We are a blessed nation at an important crossroads. War, corruption, disintegrating families, and for some, hopelessness, tear at the American dream. We need hope and ideas.”

On the Democratic side, Sen. Evan Bayh, D-Ind., announced over the weekend he was creating an exploratory committee to run for president, and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., is reportedly conducting closed-door meetings with New York Democrats to discuss her possible candidacy.

Brownback may have a tough time standing out in the crowded GOP field, but he has ways of courting controversy.

Brownback caused a stir in recent weeks by holding up a judicial nominee who had merely attended a gay marriage ceremony, saying that going to the ceremony could affect the judge’s professional judgement should gay marriage issues come before the court.

In his announcement, Brownback made it clear his faith would be front and center in his nascent campaign.

“We believe in a culture of life—that every human life is a beautiful, sacred, unique child of a loving God,” Brownback said.

But Brownback’s social conservative activism extends beyond the traditional issues of gay marriage and abortion. He is one of the Senate’s most frequent travelers to Africa, speaking out for the continent’s AIDS victims. He has five children, including two adopted internationally. He is an advocate for prison reform and sees himself as a true believer in compassionate conservatism.

“The place to grow the vote for Republicans is in the compassionate conservative field,” Brownback said in an interview this summer with Congressional Quarterly. “Bush had a great line on compassionate conservatism, but a lot of people feel like he hasn’t delivered on it. I’m really mining the area, whether it’s prison reform, reconciliation — particularly with African Americans, poverty reduction.”

Brownback converted to Catholicism late in life, and on Sundays he has been known to attend two separate church services — a Catholic Mass on his own and Protestant services with his family.

Brownback realizes he is a long shot, but says there is a “calling” for people who run for president.

“My decision has always been based on whether you feel a real calling to do it at all,” Brownback said in the interview. “If you feel like this is really something you’re called to do, do it. I don’t care what the polls say and what the money is.”

Brownback Begins Bid For White House (KCS)

By Matt Stearns

The Kansas City Star, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON | For Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, the time for coyness is over.

The conservative Republican, “after much prayerful consideration,” took his first official step in a long-anticipated, long-shot 2008 bid for the White House Monday when he filed papers with the Federal Election Commission creating a presidential exploratory committee.

DOJ_NMG_0102523

Forming an exploratory committee allows Brownback to raise money and hire staff for a presidential campaign and to transfer money from his Senate campaign committee to the exploratory committee. It is one step short of a full-fledged campaign announcement, but in a prepared statement Brownback sounded like a full-throated candidate.

Calling the United States "a blessed nation at an important crossroads," Brownback said "I am running for America…to be of service in a crucial time of trial."

His first campaign stop will be Tuesday in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, to be followed by visits to ten states over the next month.

Brownback has spent the past two years road-testing a theme he describes as "renewing the culture."

It's a unique amalgam of old-fashioned Republican social and fiscal conservatism combined with a progressive, internationalist message of reconciliation between rich and poor, deeply informed by religious faith.

He is a leading opponent of abortion rights, embryonic stem cell research and gay marriage. But he is generally opposed to the death penalty and has made alleviating disease and poverty in the developing world a cornerstone of his Senate efforts.

Brownback called for a flat tax, for term limits for judges and members of Congress, and for "compassionate yet practical programs to help the poor here and around the world," in his prepared statement Monday.

He wrote that he considered "my citizenship and the responsibilities it carries today in the light of eternity."

A 20-member exploratory advisory group includes Tom Monaghan, founder of Domino's Pizza; Bowie Kuhn, former Major League Baseball commissioner; retired Gen. Charles Krulak, former U.S. Marine Corps commandant; and Steve McEveety, a Hollywood producer closely affiliated with Mel Gibson (his credits include The Passion of the Christ).

Also officially on board: Chuck Hurley, a friend of Brownback from law school who is a leader among social conservatives in Iowa, site of the crucial first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses in 13 months.

Brownback's Senate chief of staff, Rob Wasinger, will leave to run the exploratory committee. Kansas native Wasinger has worked for Brownback for 10 years and is well-known and well-regarded in Washington and national social conservative circles.

Brownback joins a field expected to be crowded.

Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani recently created presidential exploratory committees. Other Republicans in various stages of running: Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, and California Rep. Duncan Hunter.

But the field has thinned unexpectedly in ways that could help Brownback. Three Republicans also expected to compete for the party's socially conservative base in the party won't be factors: Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist dropped out last week. Virginia Sen. George Allen and Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum lost Senate re-election bids.

Still, Brownback faces daunting challenges, chiefly fundraising and name recognition.

Between his Senate committee and his Restore America political action committee, Brownback has about $650,000 at his disposal.

Compare that to Sen. Evan Bayh, an Indiana Democrat who said Sunday he'll form an exploratory committee this week for his own dark horse 2008 candidacy. He's got $10.5 million in his Senate account that he can transfer.

In early polls, Brownback routinely is near the bottom, around 1 or 2 percent. But he is a darling of the social conservatives who are the backbone of the Republican party in many states. He must persuade them he is electable.

"Ours is an exceptional nation united by our ideals," Brownback said. "But we are a great nation because of our goodness. If we ever lose our goodness, we will surely lose our greatness… we need a culture that encourages what is right and discourages what is wrong – and has the wisdom to understand the difference."

Brownback, A Favorite Among Social Conservatives, To Explore 2008 Presidential Bid (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., a favorite of social conservatives, announced Monday that he was taking the first step toward a 2008 White House run by setting up an exploratory committee.

"I have decided, after much prayerful consideration, to consider a bid for the Republican nomination for the presidency," he said in a statement. "There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture, and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion."

The formation of such a committee allows Brownback to begin raising money and test support for a presidential race without making a formal commitment to seek the nomination. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani already have such groups, but neither GOP hopeful has wide appeal among conservatives.

In recent weeks, several candidates on the right have fallen from contention: Sen. Bill Frist, R-Tenn., see took himself out of the running, and Sens. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., and George Allen, R-Va., were defeated in their re-election bids, dashing their presidential hopes.

DOJ_NMG_0102524

"Obviously there's a vacancy on the right, and (Brownback) may well fit the niche," said Stu Rothenberg of the Rothenberg Political Report. "He's a long shot -- but you don't have any shot if you don't throw your hat in the ring."

Raised as a Methodist, Brownback became a Roman Catholic in 2002. He has worked with Democrats on bills to stop human trafficking, end starvation in Uganda and genocide in Sudan, extend a path to citizenship to illegal immigrants, curb recidivism and ease the AIDS epidemic in Africa.

He also has pushed for a Smithsonian museum on black history and for a federal apology to American Indians to "help us move toward reconciliation" with two groups that "didn't feel like America had been fair to them."

And, outraged by singer Janet Jackson's 2004 Super Bowl halftime "wardrobe malfunction," he was instrumental in requiring the Federal Communications Commission to increase the fines for indecency on the airwaves.

An opponent of abortion, same-sex marriage and embryonic stem-cell research, Brownback often chairs meetings of the Values Action Team, where advocacy groups meet to track social conservative legislation.

"He will add a lot to the national, not just the presidential, debate," said Wendy Wright, president of Concerned Women for America, a group represented at those meetings. "He truly understands the conservative point of view. It is so frustrating for us when politicians try to pander to us. Brownback is consistent."

Elected to the House in the "Republican revolution" of 1994, Brownback ran for the Senate four years later, pledging to serve only two terms.

In an interview this summer with the Weekly Standard, a conservative magazine, he signaled that he intended to model himself on Ronald Reagan, whom he first supported when Reagan unsuccessfully sought the GOP presidential nomination in 1976.

Brownback, a graduate of Kansas State University and the University of Kansas law school, was raised on his family's farm in Parker, Kan., and served as secretary of the Kansas Board of Agriculture for seven years. He was named a White House Fellow in 1990, working for Trade Representative Carla Hills. A supporter of free trade and a flat tax, he has voted to authorize trade relations with China and phase out estate and gift taxes. He voted for -- and, aides say, still supports -- the Iraq war.

"Culturally and geographically, Sen. Brownback is a tremendous fit for Iowa -- the strongest fit of any candidate, Democrat or Republican," said David Kensinger, his former chief of staff and an informal campaign adviser. "He's clearly going to run as a Reagan Republican."

Brownback Seeks '08 Conservative Mantle (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, December 5, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) yesterday established a presidential exploratory committee, seeking to fill what conservatives say is an absence of strong conservative leadership among top-tier Republican White House candidates.

Brownback immediately sought to position himself as the leading social conservative of the 2008 field.

"I have decided, after much prayerful consideration, to consider a bid for the Republican nomination for the presidency," Brownback said in a statement. "There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion."

Brownback, along with outgoing Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), has in recent years been the Senate's most vocal advocate of social conservatives' agenda on abortion and related issues.

Brownback's appeal to social conservatives could help him become the leading alternative to Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the perceived frontrunner.

"The way I see the race shaping up is that it's going to be McCain against someone who's not McCain," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union. "McCain has a lot of people in the party who don't like him."

McCain has opposed his party on key issues such as tax cuts, campaign finance reform, gun control and global warming — stances that won the admiration of the nation's media elite, whom conservatives distrust.

Brownback is the third Republican member of Congress to create an exploratory committee. McCain and House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) have both established such panels, as has former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani.

McCain, Giuliani and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who is expected to set up an exploratory committee soon, are considered by Republican insiders and political analysts as the top tier. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, an ordained Baptist minister popular with social conservatives, is also among the upper echelon of GOP candidates.

The two Republican officials who were thought to have the best chance of becoming the conservatives' choice candidate, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), have both dropped out of contention. Frist announced last week that he would not run, and Allen lost his reelection bid in an upset after a dismal campaign that did much damage to his long-term appeal.

Social conservatives are wary of McCain for his stance on campaign finance, of Romney for his views on abortion, and of Giuliani because of his beliefs on both abortion and homosexual rights.

Many are gravitating toward Huckabee because of his experience as a minister, but Huckabee has alienated small-government fiscal conservatives because he raised taxes as governor.

The three most prominent aspirants, McCain, Giuliani, and Romney, are expected to run as centrists, even though they are all now working hard to court conservative support.

"Each of those three is going to run toward the center of the Reagan coalition," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, a leader of libertarian small-government conservatives, who hosts a weekly meeting of prominent activists. "McCain despite his apostasy is trying to get in the right place on guns and taxes; Romney is trying to run as a more conservative candidate [and] Giuliani I assume will do the same thing when he gets in the race."

Norquist criticized Huckabee's record on fiscal issues.

"He keeps raising taxes," Norquist said, then alluded to Huckabee's authorship of a book on his personal weight loss. "He has raised taxes more than once. The one thing Huckabee is known for is that he's lost lots of weight. I would prefer a fat guy with a skinny budget."

Tom McClusky, vice president of government affairs for the Family Research Council, one of the most influential conservative advocacy groups in Washington, said Giuliani has been historically "pro-gay rights and pro-abortion."

McCain, he said, has been "moderately pro-life" and supported issues adamantly opposed by social conservatives, such as embryonic stem-cell research and fetal- tissue research.

Romney, who declared his support for abortion rights during an unsuccessful 1994 Senate race, has a "spotty record on life," said McCluskey, who said Romney is now "certainly coming around on the issue, which we hope he will, and he has good people working for him."

McClusky said Brownback might be able to fill a conservative leadership void among top-tier candidates. But even if he does not win the nomination, Brownback could have a major impact on the Republican primary by defining the debate on abortion and other related "life" issues, he said.

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, who hosts a weekly meeting of influential social conservatives, acknowledged the perceived weakness of conservative credentials among the GOP's presidential frontrunners. He said Brownback or Huckabee could fill the role of a strong socially conservative candidate.

"Brownback's candidacy potentially gives us a vehicle and there may be others, like Gov. Huckabee of Arkansas, who many favor because he's a former preacher and is mesmerizing in his speaking ability."

Weyrich said that he and other conservative leaders would meet with and question leading presidential candidates to understand their views.

"If we can, we're gong to try to get behind one of them," said Weyrich. "If we do, we can give one of the candidates a considerable boost and could kick one of them to the top tier."

Conservative leaders uniting behind Brownback could push him to the final stages of the GOP primary or perhaps to the nomination.

But Keene, who is also columnist for The Hill, said Brownback's strength is also his weakness. He may appeal to social conservatives but faces the challenge of having to win over a broader spectrum of Republicans.

"His reach doesn't go much beyond the social conservative base," said Keene. "To run a viable candidacy you have to do more than that. At least Brownback has a claim that none of the others have on that segment of the movement. His challenge will be to get other conservatives, [such as] anti-tax people."

Keene said Brownback is better known by conservative voters than other Republicans positioning themselves as alternatives to McCain. He cited former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson and former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore as examples.

Keene said conservatives are afraid of McCain because of his past stances on tax cuts and campaign finance reform, and because he has a reputation for doling out political retribution.

"Conservatives are afraid of him because they think he doesn't like them and goes after most people he doesn't like," said Keene.

Sen. Brownback Forms Group To Explore White House Bid (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102526

Sen. Sam Brownback joined the ever-growing group of politicians with an eye on the White House by announcing the creation of an exploratory committee for a presidential run yesterday.

The Kansas Republican made clear that he will focus on the socially conservative themes that have formed the foundation of his career in elected office. "There is a real need in our country to rebuild the family and renew our culture, and there is a need for genuine conservatism and real compassion in the national discussion," he said.

Brownback allies noted that the formation of the exploratory group, which will allow the senator to raise money and travel the country to gauge support for a presidential bid, is a pro forma move and that he will almost certainly launch a full-fledged campaign.

Brownback is the fifth Republican to signal his intention to pursue the presidency in 2008. Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani and Rep. Duncan Hunter (Calif.) have formed exploratory committees, while Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is expected to join the race in early 2007. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.) and former congressman Newt Gingrich (Ga.) also have been mentioned as candidates for the GOP nomination.

In declaring his intentions so early, Brownback is hoping to stake out a position as the most viable conservative in the field. Neither McCain nor Romney is the first choice of social conservatives, and analysts said there is room for a candidate who fills that niche.

"He is the candidate of movement conservatives," said David Kensinger, a former Brownback chief of staff and a member of the senator's political inner circle.

Brownback began his political career with his 1994 election to the House. He was elected to the Senate in 1996, filling the seat vacated by Robert J. Dole (R). Throughout his tenure, Brownback has been one of the staunchest conservatives in Congress. He speaks often about the importance of religion in his life -- he converted from Protestantism to Catholicism in 2002 -- and is a critic of abortion and its impact on the culture more broadly.

Matt Keelen, a Republican lobbyist not affiliated with any '08 candidate, said Brownback's campaign will be "compassionate conservatism on steroids" with a strong focus on poverty and moral issues.

Kensinger argued that Brownback's political positioning makes him the ideal candidate for the Iowa caucuses, which tend to be dominated by social conservatives. While Brownback has kept a low public profile in Iowa, he has been working hard behind the scenes to build a volunteer-heavy grass-roots effort -- meeting with small groups in churches and living rooms -- under the belief that President Bush's reelection effort affirmed the import of ground troops.

Brownback's social-conservative credentials should get him in the door of many Iowa Republican households. What's more, having been raised on a farm outside of Parker, Kan., Brownback is as well versed as any candidate in the field on the agriculture issues so important to Iowa and enjoys home-state proximity, his supporters say.

Money is a major hurdle for Brownback, who has never raised or spent more than $2.5 million on a race. At the end of September, he had $600,000 in his Senate campaign account.

Kensinger acknowledged that Brownback's fundraising ability remains an open question but added: "If you can win Iowa, you are going to have all the money you need overnight."

Swelling 2008 Field Signals Expensive Race (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas on Monday became the fourth major presidential hopeful to set up a fundraising committee for 2008, testimony to the demands of a White House race shaping up as the most expensive in U.S. history.

Brownback is a Roman Catholic and social conservative active on issues such as abortion, prison reform, global AIDS and poverty. On Monday, he said he wants to talk to the country about fiscal restraint, tax reform, economic growth and a foreign policy that is “vigorous yet compassionate and consistent.”

Two leading GOP prospects, Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani, already have formed exploratory committees. A third, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, is also preparing to run. Other prospects include Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and New York Gov. George Pataki.

On the Democratic side, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is in the race and Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh is expected to form a fundraising committee today. Decisions one way or the other are expected after the holidays from a half-dozen Democrats, among them New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry and former North Carolina senator John Edwards.

DOJ_NMG_0102527

The pace of campaigns has been accelerating since 2000, when then-Texas governor George W. Bush formed an exploratory committee in March 1999 and started campaigning in June. Democrat Howard Dean officially started his 2004 bid in May 2002.

The big change for 2008 is the sheer scale of fundraising necessary to compete with celebrity candidates such as Clinton and McCain, and to prepare for spending unfettered by federal rules and caps.

Bush, Dean and Kerry turned down public money for the 2004 primary season because it would have required them to limit their spending. Nominees Bush and Kerry did accept about $75 million apiece in government funds for the general election campaign.

Michael Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission, says he expects that "for the first time ever," nominees of both parties in 2008 will opt out of the public financing system for both the primaries and the general. "The stage is set for the first billion-dollar presidential election," Toner says, predicting the eventual nominees will raise $500 million apiece.

Top-tier prospects such as McCain, Giuliani, Romney and Clinton should plan on raising $100 million by the end of 2007, Toner says. "If you're not in that ballgame, it's going to be hard to be taken seriously." That's nearly four times as much as Kerry, the Democratic nominee in 2004, raised in 2003.

The demands are equally stiff on lower-tier candidates. Republican strategist Alex Vogel says "the threshold for respectability" for Brownback and other long shots is $10 million by the end of March 2007. "This early money is friends and family money," he says. "If you can't bank $10 million in easy money, how long realistically are you going to stay in this process?"

Edwards raised the most money of the Democratic hopefuls in the first quarter of 2003, $7.4 million.

Brownback says he'll visit 10 states this month, including an overnight stay Friday at a Louisiana prison to dramatize the need for prison reforms and promote faith-based prison programs. Today he is in Iowa, where he has been cultivating Christian conservatives.

Ray Dearin, an active Republican and a professor of campaign rhetoric at Iowa State University, calls Christian conservatives "the predominant organized force" in the Iowa Republican Party. He says they view Brownback and Huckabee favorably — but after Republican defeats last month nationally and in Iowa, "they probably are going to be pretty pragmatic and look for someone who's likely to win."

Two early favorites of religious conservatives are no longer options: Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, who says he won't run, and Virginia Sen. George Allen, who lost his re-election bid. Dearin said McCain, who skipped Iowa in his 2000 nomination race, could benefit.

Brownback released a list of supporters that includes several active in the fight against abortion. But McCain outmaneuvered him in Iowa last week by snagging Marlys Popma, a prominent GOP activist who used to head Iowa Right to Life. Dearin called her decision "a signal to a lot of Christian evangelicals that John McCain is OK."

Obama Meets Party Donors In New York (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Senator Barack Obama treaded onto Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's home turf last night to meet with prominent Democratic donors and feel out those who might prefer the sound of President Obama to President Clinton (as in Hillary, not Bill).

Amid intensifying presidential musings by Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Obama met with George Soros, the liberal billionaire philanthropist, then some other donors last night at Mr. Soros's offices. Afterward he spoke at a charity event that was to be followed by a news conference.

One of the donors who met with Mr. Obama, and who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he did not want to offend Mrs. Clinton, said that he and several others had supported Mrs. Clinton's Senate campaigns but were not committed to her as a presidential candidate.

"I like Hillary a lot, but I'm also impressed with Obama — his message, the way he connects to people," said the donor, a prominent businessman. "It's a little too early for Democrats to be certain that Hillary is the strongest bet for 2008. There are a lot of good people interested in running."

Mr. Obama's reconnaissance mission came as Mrs. Clinton was starting to talk about 2008 not only with New York elected officials, but also with some prominent donors whom she would like to lock in for a possible White House bid.

John Catsimatidis, a loyal Clinton donor, said he had recently received a phone call from Mrs. Clinton asking to have dinner before the holidays. He believes she wants to run for president and is moving to ramp up her Senate fund-raising operation for a White House campaign.

"I think they have a phenomenal political machine set up that's far superior to any of the other candidates, or theoretical candidates," Mr. Catsimatidis said. "Now they're getting ready to put that machine to use."

To that end, the Clinton team disclosed yesterday that they had a new national finance director lined up in case the senator decided to run. Jonathan Mantz, a fund-raiser for Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey and a former finance official for the Washington-based operations to elect a Democratic House and Senate, has agreed to work for her if she is a candidate.

"It's not anything that is imminent," said Howard Wolfson, a senior adviser to Senator Clinton. The senator is expected to decide this winter whether to create an exploratory presidential committee.

The Clinton team also announced that Phil Singer, a communications strategist for the Democrats' successful takeover of the Senate last month, had agreed to play a similar role for Senator Clinton, should she run. Mr. Singer is a protégé of Senator Charles E. Schumer and was an aide on Senator John Kerry's presidential campaign.

Derek Shearer, a former ambassador, a donor to President Bill Clinton's campaigns and a supporter of Senator Clinton, said he believed that Mrs. Clinton's moves did not reflect concern about financial or political competition from Mr. Obama or others, but rather an orderly process of consultation and preparation.

"She's very deliberate about these things," he said. "What most concerns her is, does she think she could win and really make a difference in the country."

Supporters of Mr. Obama, a freshman senator from Illinois, described his New York visit as a combination of fact-finding and meet-and-greet as he considers whether to seek the Democratic nomination.

They said, and political analysts echoed, that Mr. Obama acknowledged Mrs. Clinton's home-state advantage in New York, but that there was surging interest in Mr. Obama, an eloquent antiwar Democrat who, if successful, would be the country's first black nominee for president.

"Most of the people Barack is seeing are either doing it out of respect for anyone who is a United States senator, or out of curiosity, or to leave their options open in case she decides not to run," said Ken Sherrill, a political scientist at Hunter College. "I can't imagine his picking up any significant support, but he can establish good will."

Mr. Soros, an early supporter, was the host of a fund-raiser during Mr. Obama's campaign for the Senate in 2004, said Michael Vachon, a senior aide to Mr. Soros. Mr. Obama's staff asked to use the Soros offices for last night's meetings since it was near the Midtown hotel where the senator spoke last night at a fund-raiser for K.I.D.S. (Kids in Distressed Situations), which assists children living in poverty.

Mr. Soros has not publicly endorsed or committed to any 2008 presidential hopeful.

While another possible Democratic candidate, Senator Chris Dodd of Connecticut, raised $500,000 in New York last week, others have been less aggressive in reaching out to New York donors than in past cycles, some of these donors say.

Former Senator John Edwards and former Vice President Al Gore have been in New York recently, and others plan to be, including Senator Joseph R. Biden of Delaware and Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa.

Yet the donors say that neither Mr. Edwards nor Mr. Obama, who are receiving perhaps the most buzz as possible opponents of Senator Clinton, nor anyone else has made an assertive push to challenge Mrs. Clinton and her local donor base in the aftermath of the 2006 elections. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Message From A Megachurch (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

American politics took an important turn last week at a church in the foothills of Southern California's Santa Ana Mountains.

When Rick Warren, one of the nation's most popular evangelical pastors, faced down right-wing pressure and invited Sen. Barack Obama to speak at a gathering at his Saddleback Valley Community Church about the AIDS crisis, he sent a signal: A significant group of theologically conservative Christians no longer wants to be treated as a cog in the Republican political machine.

For his part, Obama, the former community organizer from Chicago, showed why he is this moment's hottest commodity in 2008 presidential politics, even though he has not entered the race yet.

For a quarter-century since the rise of the Moral Majority and the Christian Coalition, white evangelical Christians have been widely seen as a Republican preserve. No one did a more comprehensive job of organizing them than President Bush, and he carried the white evangelical vote in 2004 over John Kerry by a ratio of nearly 4 to 1. Many of the most politically active evangelical leaders have insisted that the morally freighted social issues -- abortion, stem-cell research, same-sex marriage -- took priority over all questions.

DOJ_NMG_0102529

Enter Warren, or Pastor Rick, as he likes to be known. Warren is no political liberal. On the contrary, his views on the hot-button issues are reliably conservative, and he has said that members of his sprawling Orange County congregation probably vote overwhelmingly Republican.

But Warren speaks for a new generation of evangelicals who think that harnessing religious faith too closely to electoral politics is bad for religion, and who are broadening the evangelical public agenda to include a concern for global poverty and the scourge of AIDS.

Warren is also the most gifted religious entrepreneur since Billy Graham. Warren's book "The Purpose Driven Life" has sold in the tens of millions, and his specific model for the megachurch has spread all over the country. He is not building a new denomination. He is building a new network, and it's powerful. Warren and his wife, Kay, have made alleviating the AIDS crisis in Africa one of the central components of their mission.

And thus it came to pass that when Warren called a conference at his church last Friday on World AIDS Day, among those he invited were two potential presidential candidates. It was unsurprising that one of them was Sen. Sam Brownback, the Kansas Republican and a loyal social conservative who has taken up the AIDS issue with passion and commitment.

But when the other invitee turned out to be Obama, parts of the old evangelical political apparatus went after Warren as a heretic. Rob Schenck, president of the National Clergy Council, declared that Obama's views on abortion -- Obama is pro-choice -- represented "the antithesis of biblical ethics and morality" and insisted that Warren had no business inviting him to Saddleback.

Warren's church issued a statement reaffirming its strong opposition to abortion, but Warren did not back down. Indeed, he seemed to revel in rejecting the old evangelical political model. "I'm a pastor, not a politician," Warren told ABC News. "People always say, 'Rick, are you right wing or left wing?' I say 'I'm for the whole bird.' "

When it came his turn to speak, Obama took on the moral message of evangelical AIDS activists -- and then challenged them.

"Let me say this and let me say this loud and clear: I don't think that we can deny that there is a moral and spiritual component to prevention," he declared. "In too many places . . . the relationship between men and women, between sexuality and spirituality, has broken down and needs to be repaired."

Then Obama got to what "may be the difficult part for some," as he put it, that "abstinence and fidelity, although the ideal, may not always be the reality."

"We're dealing with flesh-and-blood men and women, and not abstractions," Obama said, and "if condoms and potentially things like microbicides can prevent millions of deaths, then they should be made more widely available. . . . I don't accept the notion that those who make mistakes in their lives should be given an effective death sentence."

That Obama received a standing ovation suggests that Warren is right to sense that growing numbers of Christians are tired of narrowly partisan politics and share his interest in "the whole bird." In their different spheres, Warren and Obama are both in the business of retailing hope.

One more thing: If you read Obama's speech, you'll realize he demonstrates a much truer Christian spirit than the GOP masterminds who have recently tried to push people away from Obama by pointing out that his middle name is Hussein.

Hillary Clinton Begins Calling Iowa Democrats (DMR)

Des Moines Register, December 4, 2006

Sen. Hillary Clinton began making calls today to Iowa Democrats about the state's political landscape with an eye toward its 2008 presidential nominating caucuses, aides to Clinton said.

The moves come as the New York senator has accelerated the steps she has taken since her November re-election toward making a decision about whether to run for president.

"She's begun the process of making some calls into Iowa," Lorraine Voles, Clinton's communication director, said today in a telephone interview with The Des Moines Register.

In the past week, Clinton has had conversations with supporters in New York and the state's congressional delegation to discuss the possibility of running.

"As a continuation of this process, she is starting to reach out across the country and specifically to some friends in Iowa," Voles said.

Clinton spoke today with Des Moines Democrat Bonnie Campbell, who worked in the Department of Justice during the administration of President Bill Clinton, the senator's husband.

Campbell, a former Iowa attorney general, declined to discuss the details of her brief talk with Sen. Clinton, except that it touched on her running for president and competing for the caucuses, scheduled to launch the 2008 nominating process.

"She is looking at the possibility of running for president and is looking for a read on Iowa," Campbell said.

DOJ_NMG_0102530

Sen. Clinton, by far the best-known among the Democrats eyeing the 2008 campaign, has ranked first in all national polls measuring support for prospective Democratic candidates for president.

However, two Iowa polls in the past year have borne out what some party activists worry are potential problems for Clinton.

A Register poll in June showed Clinton second to former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards among likely Democratic caucusgoers. In September, a Register poll of Iowa voters showed Clinton trailing all four Republicans listed in a hypothetical general election matchup.

Clinton handily won election to a second Senate term on Nov.7, but had not made any gestures toward the presidential campaign until last week, while others in the large, gathering field had begun to take visible steps and make key contacts.

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and Edwards, a candidate for president in 2004, also rank high in national polls and are contemplating the 2008 race.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is the only announced candidate among the large number of nationally recognized Democrats considering the race. The two-term governor formed a federal campaign organization on Nov. 9 and wrapped up his kickoff national tour Monday with stops in South Carolina.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh announced Sunday he was forming a presidential exploratory committee and was in Iowa today.

All of them have made efforts to visit and appeal to Iowa Democrats during the past two years.

Campbell said she would support Clinton if she ran, as did Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's former chief of staff JoDee Winterhoff, a former Iowan now living in the Washington, D.C.-area.

Winterhoff said Clinton called her today but the two failed to connect.

"I would assume that Senator Clinton would compete in the caucuses if she runs," Winterhoff said.

There has been speculation about whether she would campaign in Iowa, considering her husband bypassed the caucuses in his winning 1992 bid.

Voles said there had been no discussion of an Iowa visit by Clinton.

Hillary Sizes Up Support Among NH Democrats (UL)

By John Distaso

Union Leader.com, December 5, 2006

New York Sen. Hillary Clinton has begun weighing in with New Hampshire Democratic activists about a possible run for President in 2008.

Clinton during the past few days has placed initial calls to key Democrats in the first-in-the-nation primary state seeking advice, according to veteran state and national party activist Karen Hicks.

Hicks, who headed Howard Dean's New Hampshire presidential campaign in 2004, said those calls will continue. Hicks also confirmed that if Clinton runs for President, "I'll be with her," reportedly as national field director, a position similar to the one she held for the Democratic National Committee during the 2004 general election.

The New Hampshire Union Leader learned that Clinton had a telephone conversation last week with Gov. John Lynch. The two officials had been trying to contact each other since Clinton initiated the calling immediately after the Nov. 7 election.

Clinton reportedly met on Sunday with New York Gov.-elect Eliot Spitzer to solicit his support for a White House bid. A top aide to Clinton also told The Associated Press that Clinton aides have begun interviewing possible campaign staffers and have hired a communications specialist and a national fund-raising director.

Word of Clinton's New Hampshire overtures comes as state Democrats prepare to welcome their party's newest "rock star," Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, to a celebration of their 2006 election day sweep on Sunday afternoon in Manchester. Yesterday, Obama added a Sunday morning visit to Portsmouth to his schedule.

As first reported on UnionLeader.com yesterday afternoon, Hicks said Clinton has "begun calling a whole variety of people in New Hampshire to get their advice as she enters a new phase of thinking" about a run for President in 2008.

Hicks said she spoke with Clinton recently about the former First Lady's possible Presidential bid. She said Clinton told her she would be making the New Hampshire calls.

"I still think she is exploring this," Hicks said. "She, of course, has a huge interest in New Hampshire, and she is interested in getting people's advice about what the campaign should look like if she runs."

Hicks said she did not have the names of all of those Clinton has called and will be calling.

"I don't know the whole list," Hicks said, "but obviously they are going to be some of the leaders that you would think would be on the list, some of the good grassroots organizational people on the electoral level, and a whole variety of people that, should she decide to run, would be in a position to help her."

DOJ_NMG_0102531

Hicks was a long-time New Hampshire-based activist who, after working for Dean's campaign and then the DNC, became a senior advisor to the Labor Party in Great Britain for the 2005 British general election. She said she is currently engaged in a fellowship in political organizing at the John F. Kennedy School of Government's Institute of Politics in Boston.

Hicks called Clinton "the kind of leader we need, and I'm excited about the fact that she is considering this. I'm willing to do whatever I can to help."

She said she did not know either Clinton's timetable for a formal decision or whether plans are being made for a Clinton visit to New Hampshire.

State Democratic chair Kathy Sullivan yesterday declined to comment when asked if she has heard from Clinton.

State Rep. Patricia McMahon, D-North Sutton, and former Bill Clinton-appointed ambassadors Terry Shumaker and George Bruno, all key players in former President Clinton's New Hampshire Presidential campaigns in 1992 and 1996, said they had not yet heard from her.

"I have no idea if she will run," McMahon said, "and my bet is that she is not sure yet and her husband does not know yet. But McMahon, asked if she would support a Clinton run for President, said, "It's early, but I'd have to say it would be hard to say 'no' because of the experience she's had and the issues that she has supported."

The Host With The Most (NYT)

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

Senator John McCain hardly needs a holiday to give a party. Just last week, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, presented a lavish feast for Republican governors gathering in Florida. From the 2004 Republican convention in New York City, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, is still fondly remembered, at least among the A-list crowd, for holding an event for his 68th birthday at La Goulue on Madison Avenue and another soiree at Cipriani on 42nd Street. And in this bustling season of holiday parties, Mr. McCain was among the first to have an event, on Monday evening. The senator and his wife, Cindy, invited several hundred people to the Corcoran Gallery of Art in Washington for a party to be paid for by his primary campaign account. Cameras were not only allowed, but also encouraged. JEFF ZELENY <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Why The Early Field For 2008's Election Is The Biggest Yet (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, December 5, 2006

WASHINGTON

Twenty-three months before the 2008 presidential election, the jockeying among hopefuls is already fierce. No fewer than two dozen men - and a woman - are running or thinking of running or being urged to run for the top spot. On an almost daily basis, exploratory committees are forming, first trips to New Hampshire are taking place, and Internet campaigns both for and against possible candidates are sprouting up.

The 2008 race is morphing so fast that four possible candidates have already dropped out. Then there's the X factor - the unprecedented front-loading of primaries and caucuses that will make it more difficult than ever for a dark horse to come out of nowhere and take the nomination.

This election is going to be "the mother of them all," Democratic adviser James Carville declared at a political conference last week. He marvels at the array of "larger than life people" definitely or possibly mounting campaigns - John McCain, Rudolph Giuliani, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama, Al Gore, and "to make it interesting," Newt Gingrich. These are people who "change the temperature of the room" when they walk in, Mr. Carville says.

It may be a sign of the vulnerabilities of both putative front-runners - Senators McCain (R) and Clinton (D) - that so many other people are talking about running, but in the end, many political oddsmakers are still betting that today's front-runners end up facing off in November 2008. And the size of the field is likely to shrink fast.

This is good news, at least, for most news organizations, which don't have the staff to follow dozens of Oval Office wannabes all over Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Nevada, not to mention Michigan, Florida, and California, which are taking steps to hold early primaries, too.

"A big field will become a little field very quickly," says Jack Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont-McKenna College in Claremont, Calif. "I suspect a lot of the people talking of running now or even announcing exploratory committees will flunk the invisible primary."

He refers to the early fundraising, polls, and media attention that indicate whether a candidate is viable.

DOJ_NMG_0102532

For now, it's the Democratic world that's buzzing, as the charismatic Senator Obama starts making moves toward a possible run; he delivers his first speech in New Hampshire next Sunday. Obama's maneuvering may have quickened the pace of other hopefuls' moves, though they deny it.

Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa has become the first fully announced Democratic candidate. Over the weekend Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana announced an exploratory committee. Team Hillary has whispered to the media that the senator is lining up support among top Democrats in New York for an increasingly likely run.

For a candidate like Governor Vilsack, who is not widely known nationally, the early rollout has provided him some time in the spotlight that will become increasingly difficult to commandeer.

His next task is to raise enough money to mount at least a minimal campaign, in the hopes that he catches fire as an outsider alternative to the top-billed senators he faces. As a governor, with roots in both Pennsylvania and Iowa and a life story that stresses overcoming adversity, he can tout executive experience that has made other governors successful presidential candidates. But even he acknowledges that he is a long shot.

"As a sheer matter of math, the more candidates, the lower the odds," says William Mayer, a political scientist at Northeastern University in Boston. "For long shots, the question is, can you get a bare minimum amount of attention to break through to the public consciousness."

Just how much money a candidate needs to raise in the first quarter of 2007 is open to debate, but a common benchmark is $30 million. Obama would probably be able to hit that mark; Clinton would have little trouble raising several times that; former Vice President Gore also still has his network. Beyond those three, access to big money is dubious; there's a lot out there, but it's not infinite.

Top advisers are also limited in supply, and will soon be married up to one candidate or another, if they aren't already.

The possible expansion of the early primary and caucus calendar will also favor those with big war chests. If Vilsack stays in the race until the Iowa caucuses, his presence as a native son could diminish the importance of that race, which would add even more clout to the New Hampshire primaries. And even though New Hampshire Democrats are upset that the national party has added early nominating contests in Nevada and South Carolina, New Hampshire's key role remains in place. The same will hold true if Michigan, California, and Florida move up their primaries to just after New Hampshire's.

Assuming that New Hampshire maintains its status as the first primary state, then the additional front-loading could serve to enhance New Hampshire's clout.

"If you are anybody but Hillary, your only chance of breaking out of the pack is in New Hampshire," says Mr. Mayer. "You can't say, 'It's OK if I come in fifth in New Hampshire; I'll emerge by doing well in California.' "

So the race is on to see who becomes Clinton's top challenger. For now, the excitement is around Obama. If he runs and does not stumble, there may not be enough political oxygen left for any of the other Democrats running or thinking of running or being urged to run.

Democrats Eyeing '08 Face Stumbling Blocks (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, December 5, 2006

The 2008 Democratic presidential race was off and running as soon as last month's midterm elections concluded, with front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton facing more opposition than she may have expected at this point in the two-year campaign cycle.

The New York senator and former first lady, who easily won a second term on Nov. 7, is the leading choice of her party in all the polls. But more than half a dozen other candidates are likely to challenge her expected bid for the nomination, including Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the party's 2004 nominee; Mr. Kerry's running mate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina; and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, the Democrats' hottest political figure, who has rocketed into contention like a rock star.

But the Democrats' growing pack of presidential hopefuls is fraught with problems. Mrs. Clinton remains one of the most polarizing political leaders in the country, with nearly half of the voters polled earlier this year saying they did not like her. Mr. Kerry, who hurt himself in the final weeks of the midterm elections when he told a joke that suggested only uneducated soldiers ended up fighting the war in Iraq, has fallen in the polls since then.

And both Mr. Edwards and Mr. Obama have thin experience on their resumes. Mr. Edwards of North Carolina served only one term in the Senate, while Mr. Obama, who was elected in 2004 has been in the Senate for just two years, and has little or no legislative accomplishments of which to speak.

"I don't think anyone is going to doubt Hillary's credentials. She certainly was an activist first lady. On the other hand, there will be issues raised about her [lack of] foreign-policy experience and gender," said pollster John Zogby. "She does have problems."

"Right now, Barack Obama and John Edwards are both blank slates, empty slates," Mr. Zogby said.

A national poll of 530 registered Democratic voters conducted last month by Opinion Research for CNN showed Mrs. Clinton favored by 33 percent. Mr. Obama was in second place with 15 percent and Mr. Edwards and former Vice President Al Gore were tied for third with 14 percent. Mr. Kerry, in the wake of what he called his "botched joke," dropped from 12 percent in late October to 7 percent.

"Worse news for Kerry: a majority of registered Democrats say they do not want to see Kerry win the party's nomination in 2008," CNN said.

The rest of the pack of potential candidates were all in the low single digits, including retired Gen. Wesley Clark, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who on Thursday became the first Democrat to formally announce his presidential candidacy.

As first lady in the Clinton White House, Mrs. Clinton had a reputation as the most liberal figure in her husband's inner circle. But during the past six years in the Senate she has reinvented her political persona as more of centrist. She voted for the Iraq war resolution and rebuked Democratic calls for a complete U.S. troop withdrawal.

The centrist Democratic Leadership Council, which helped Bill Clinton put together the agenda that helped him win the presidency, has been in her corner, too, defining her as one of them and giving her prominent speaking roles at their political conventions.

"There has been an attempt at an image makeover in which she is attempting to portray herself as a centrist Democrat," Mr. Zogby said.

But in the past few months, and particularly since the midterm elections, most of the political buzz in the party has been about Mr. Obama and his announcement that he is considering a run for the presidency.

Mr. Obama reportedly has been talking to top Democratic campaign strategists, including John Norris, the Des Moines Democrat who was the architect of Mr. Kerry's come-from-behind win in the state's 2004 delegate-selection caucuses.

Mr. Norris said Mr. Obama "truly wanted to know what he had to do and when he had to do it," to wage a competitive campaign in Iowa, political reporter Thomas Beaumont wrote last week in the Des Moines Register.

For 1,000 Or More Homeless In Hawaii, Beaches Are The Best Option (NYT)

By Janis L. Magin

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

HONOLULU, Dec. 4 — When the home she had rented for 30 years for $300 a month was sold, Alice Greenwood and her 6-year-old son joined an estimated 1,000 people living in tents along the 13 miles of beaches on the Waianae Coast of Oahu.

“There was no choice but to come on the beach,” said Ms. Greenwood, 60, who is disabled because of a work-related injury eight years ago and lost her benefits a month before losing her home.

Homelessness in Hawaii has become so pervasive that the governor has assigned a state employee to work full-time at getting people off the beaches and into transitional housing. Once there, they have access to rent assistance programs and low-income housing.

While hundreds of homeless people live on Honolulu’s beaches, including the tourist center Waikiki, it is the Waianae Coast on the semiarid west shore where the problem is most visible. The population of Waianae, home to about 40,000 of Oahu’s 900,000 people, is predominantly native Hawaiian and is historically low income.

Hawaii’s economy has been strong in the last two years, and the state consistently has one of the lowest unemployment rates in the nation. The real estate market has skyrocketed along with the job growth, and houses on the Waianae Coast that rented for $200 or $300 a month a couple of years ago are now advertised for more than $1,000.

Nobody knows exactly how many people are living on the beach. Kaulana Park, the state’s point man for the homeless, estimated that more than 1,000 people lived on the Waianae Coast beaches, but cautioned that any count was good only on the day it was taken. And that estimate does not account for the hidden homeless: people who sleep on a relative’s sofa, or in their cars, or camp in areas not as visible as the public beaches.

Many living on the beach have jobs, mostly in the service and construction sectors. They include families with children, who attend public schools by day and sleep in tents on the beach at night.

Venise Lewis, 35, who lives near Ms. Greenwood at Maili Beach Park with her husband and two of their four children, said her daughters, ages 8 and 10, must finish their homework in the afternoon because there was no lighting at the beach after sunset.

DOJ_NMG_0102534

Ms. Lewis's oldest daughter lives with a grandmother, and her son lives with the family's pastor.

"They don't like the idea of living on the beach," she said of her younger children. "Usually when we go camping, we go home if it rains."

The homeless problem in Hawaii came to light in March, when the City and County of Honolulu began a cleanup of Ala Moana Beach Park, at the entrance to Waikiki, and began closing the park at night in response to complaints.

Hundreds of homeless people, or "illegal campers," as the city calls them, moved to an emergency transitional shelter set up by the state in a warehouse close to downtown Honolulu. But some went west, closer to the Waianae Coast communities where they were raised. The city has since conducted similar cleanups at other beaches.

Lester Chang, the city's parks and recreation director, said the number of illegal campers made it difficult for his department to keep the parks safe and clean.

"I think all communities have to deal with this situation, but Hawaii is unique because it's an island," Mr. Chang said. "There's no place to push them off to."

Honolulu officials say finding long-term solutions to the homeless problem on Oahu is the state's responsibility. The city's housing department was abolished in the late 1990s after a scandal.

Mr. Park has been talking with New York City officials about how to adapt New York's solutions to an island state.

He said he was inspired by a speech last summer by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York, who told of how the city secured financing for some 12,000 units of supportive housing, and of the city's program to help people stay in their homes by interceding with landlords to head off evictions. Hawaii has started a similar program.

In late October, the state opened a transitional shelter for 30 families, including 90 children, at a converted 1940s-era military building in Kalaeloa, the former Barbers Point Naval Air Station.

On Nov. 18, the state poured the foundation for an emergency transitional shelter in Waianae that will house up to 300 people when it opens early next year. The state is looking at building shelters at eight more sites along the Waianae Coast.

But Dino Palisbo, who has been living at Maili Beach Park with his girlfriend and their three dogs for about a year, said some people did not want to trade the freedom of the beach for the rules of a transitional shelter. "Half of them can pay rent, but it is so high it is going to take them out of the comfort zone," Mr. Palisbo said. "When a studio costs $700 or $800, how can a family put four or five kids there?"

Others, like Ms. Greenwood, did not want to leave their communities for the state's shelter at Kalaeloa, which is 10 miles from the beach park and several miles from the nearest bus route. She plans to move to the new shelter in Waianae, set to open next spring, because it is closer to her son's school and her community activities.

Mr. Park said other homeless people on the beach looked up to Ms. Greenwood, who is a member of the state's Oahu Island Burial Council, which works to protect ancient Hawaiian remains. A widow, she also has four adult children, but the only daughter who lives nearby has a studio apartment too small for Ms. Greenwood and the boy she adopted, Makalii Hatchie.

"She takes it upon herself to be somewhat of a leader," Mr. Park said.

Ms. Greenwood said she hoped to begin collecting Social Security benefits and settle her workers' compensation case soon so that she and her son could find a new home.

"Being homeless is not a crime, it is the fault of the government," she said. "I can understand when its 20, 30 people, but when it hits the thousands. ..."

French: 6 Powers Near Iran Nuke Accord (AP)

By Angela Charlton

AP, December 5, 2006

The six powers seeking a U.N. resolution to punish Iran for its nuclear program are nearing agreement on a text, France's foreign minister said Monday.

High-ranking diplomats from the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members plus Germany will meet Tuesday in Paris to discuss imposing penalties on Iran for refusing to stop uranium enrichment.

"I think that we should now reach agreement on this," Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said in Brussels.

He gave no details of the possible text, but indicated progress had been made in his talks in Brussels on Monday with his Russian counterpart, Sergey Lavrov.

"We are in agreement with Russia to adopt sanctions against Iran's proliferation program, that is to say the sensitive nuclear activities and the ballistic missile program. ... We want to reach as broad an agreement as possible in the U.N. Security Council," Douste-Blazy said.

DOJ_NMG_0102535

The Security Council has been at odds over how to deal with Iran's defiance of an Aug. 31 U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment. The Europeans and Americans want tough sanctions. Russia and China have pushed for dialogue instead, despite the failure of a EU effort to bring the Iranians to the negotiating table.

On Friday, Lavrov reaffirmed Russia's readiness to back a U.N. ban on exports of nuclear materials and sensitive technologies to Iran, but said U.S.-proposed sanctions were "too tough."

A European draft U.N. resolution in October would order all countries to ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missiles programs. It would also impose a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in those programs.

The draft would exempt a nuclear power plant being built by the Russians at Bushehr in Iran, but not the nuclear fuel needed for the reactor.

Russia want to scratch any travel ban, asset freeze, or mention of Bushehr. They proposed major changes that would limit sanctions solely to measures that would keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons and ballistic missiles.

"We have taken the Russian amendments into consideration," Douste-Blazy said. "We want to reaffirm the unity of the international community. We are trying to find a plan that is both firm and effective."

A representative of EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana was expected to join Tuesday's talks in Paris with political directors of the foreign ministries of Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States, plus Germany, "for an update on the Iranian nuclear file," French Foreign Ministry spokesman Jean-Baptiste Mattei told reporters Monday.

No other details of the meeting were immediately available.

Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry said Friday that he didn't expect the Iran resolution to make its way back to New York for discussion until at least Dec. 11.

In Brussels, Nicholas Burns, U.S. undersecretary of state for political affairs, said it was time to send a strong message to Tehran that "we're all unhappy with Iran."

"We just wish the Iranian government would stop developing nuclear weapons, supporting ... terrorist groups in the Middle East and destabilizing Lebanon," said Burns, who will represent the United States at the meeting. "We stand for peace and overcoming divisions in the Middle East and Iran stands for disrupting everything through the barrel of the gun."

Time For Russia And China To Accept Iran Resolution: US Official (AFP)

AFP, December 5, 2006

A top US official said it was "time" for Russia and China to agree with Britain, France, Germany and the United States on the sanctions to impose on Iran for refusing to suspend its uranium enrichment program.

"It's been too long we have been debating ... we have to pass the sanction resolution" at the UN Security Council, US undersecretary of state for political affairs Nicholas Burns said to journalists on the margins of a conference of the pan-European OSCE watchdog.

"It is not that complicated," he added, "we need to send a strong message to the Iranians."

The six world powers are to meet Tuesday in Paris in their latest bid to secure agreement on a package of sanctions against Iran for its refusal to suspend sensitive nuclear activities.

High-ranking diplomats from the five veto-wielding UN Security Council members plus Germany will attend the talks at the French foreign ministry.

A representative of European Union policy chief Javier Solana will also take part in the meeting.

Burns said that the participants would "see if we can narrow our differences and agree so that our ambassadors (at the UN) in New York should pass in the quickest possible time a decisive sanction resolution".

World powers have been trying for weeks to agree what sanctions to impose on Iran for its refusal to comply with a UN deadline to freeze uranium enrichment, which can be used to generate electricity or to build atomic weapons.

A draft resolution circulated by Britain, France and Germany would have barred trade with Iran in goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programmes and applied financial and travel restrictions to persons and agencies involved in either area.

But Russia and to a lesser extent China, have tried to water down the text, saying the sanctions should not target individuals and should be limited in duration.

Meanwhile Washington wants to harden at least the wording of the text.

Iran's Web Crackdown Shows Ease Of Government Internet Censorship (WSJ)

By Christopher Rhoads

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102536

Iran's campaign to shutter popular Web sites and curtail text-message traffic reflects the growing ability of governments to control online content inside their national borders.

The crackdown, reported earlier by Britain's Guardian newspaper, is part of a broader offensive against what authorities consider immoral Western culture. It has targeted Web sites including Amazon.com, publicly edited online encyclopedia Wikipedia.com, movie Web site imdb.com and online video-sharing portal YouTube.com, among others. Some of these sites are working again, but the clampdown is consistent with a tightening of online content in Iran dating back two years.

The blockage isn't airtight, as more-savvy Internet users in the country have access to software and other measures that allow them to get around government restrictions, Internet experts say. It is uncertain how long the restrictions will last.

Iran is one of a host of nations that have taken steps to limit access to the Internet or control what users can see in cyberspace. Others that have taken such steps include China, Cuba and North Korea. Tehran's recent actions are noteworthy given the country's flourishing and relatively free Internet culture in recent years. Iran has an estimated 7.5 million users, up from 250,000 six years ago, according to InternetWorldStats.com. A lively blogosphere emerged in recent years, as state control of the country's traditional print media increased.

Arash Sigarchi, for example, was a member of the reformist press that developed under President Mohammad Khatami in the late-1990s. When this media was shut down in 2000, Mr. Sigarchi began blogging on a collective site called "The Man from Gilan," and later on his own personal site, called "The Window of Hope." The now 28-year-old Mr. Sigarchi was arrested in early 2005 and sentenced to 14 years in prison for "propaganda against the regime," according to Reporters Without Borders, a Paris-based press-freedom group.

As Internet usage has increased in more countries, so has the ability of governments to restrict the online experience within their countries.

"Countries with the political ability and desire to limit info will do so," said Robert Faris, director of research for a global project on Internet filtering at the Berkman Center for Society and Internet at Harvard Law School. "The technical means are available now."

The Internet crackdown in Iran reflects efforts by the Islamist government of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to cleanse Iran of what its leaders deem decadent Western culture, including music and movies. Government authorities in recent days have broached several new measures, such as requiring bloggers and operators of Web sites to register with an official body, strengthening the government's ability to police what it views as objectionable content.

The government began tightening its grip on the Internet two years ago, when it arrested a handful of bloggers and others whose writings were deemed offensive, according to Reporters Without Borders. One blogger, Mojtaba Saminejad, faced the death penalty for "insulting the prophets," but was found guilty of a lesser charge.

Last month, the government blocked two Web sites, tik.ir and meydann.com. The first contained criticism of the government and its spiritual leadership, and the second published articles calling for an end to the stoning of women, according to Reporters Without Borders.

The government has also taken the unusual step of attempting to curtail the speed of Internet access, essentially banning broadband.

"It's weird" said Julian Pain, head of the Internet freedom desk for Reporters Without Borders, because limiting connection speed not only curbs dissidents but "economically has a huge impact." Trade, government business and private-sector activities can all be hurt by hobbled Internet speeds, he said.

Tools to get around restrictions are spreading quickly. The University of Toronto, for example, late last month announced a program called psiphon, which works on the principle of social networking. It enables a person in an uncensored country who downloads the software to turn his computer into an access point for users in censored countries. People in censored countries can use the computer as a proxy to access the broader Internet without detection by authorities.

Realism And Iran (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

Realism is an academic theory that holds that nations should, and typically do, conduct foreign policy with greater regard for their interests than their values. But realism is also an ordinary word that tells us that good sense and experience are better practical guides to action than theory. That's a distinction worth bearing in mind as the Baker-Hamilton Iraq Study Group releases its report this week and we debate whether the U.S. should engage diplomatically with Iran.

To hear the so-called realists tell it, engaging Tehran is a matter of necessity and ought to be one of choice. Necessity, they say, because there will be no good outcome in Iraq -- or Lebanon and Palestine -- without Iranian acquiescence, which can only be achieved through face-to-face talks and confidence-building measures. Necessity, too, because they think that neither the U.S. nor Israel can stop Iran's nuclear ambitions militarily and so they must be dealt with as part of a broader negotiation.

Yet the same people who now call for engagement also believed in it long before the invasion of Iraq or the recent revelations about Iran's nuclear advances. They argue that Iran's pressing political and economic problems -- the country's huge youth cohort, cleavages within the regime and its loss of popular legitimacy, ethnic and labor unrest and growing unemployment -- mean the Islamic Republic has reasons of its own to come to the table. The same logic also suggests that the real purpose of its nuclear program is to serve as a bargaining chip to obtain bigger concessions from the West rather than as an end in itself. * * *

But here's where realism of the common sense kind should intrude. Iran's domestic problems are hardly new and in some ways have been eased by the high oil prices of recent years. In 1997, Iranians "elected" a supposedly moderate president, Mohammed Khatami, on a reformist platform. As Iranian journalist Amir Taheri notes in the November Commentary magazine, the Clinton Administration sought to establish openings with the Khatami government by lifting some sanctions and apologizing for U.S. political meddling. President Clinton even planned an "accidental" encounter with Mr. Khatami during the U.N.'s millennium summit, but Iran's Supreme Guide Ali Khamenei canceled it at the last minute. The stood-up President "was left pacing the corridors of the U.N.," writes Mr. Taheri.

Presidents Carter and Reagan earlier tried engagement with the Ayatollah Khomeini, each time with disastrous consequences: the seizure of the U.S. embassy in 1979; the Iran-Contra scandal of 1986. One problem is that however sincere Iranian moderates may be in seeking an accommodation with the West, Iranian hardliners have proved equally intent on torpedoing any deals. The hardliners have consistently held the upper hand.

This point should be obvious now that Mr. Khatami has been replaced by Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Much has been said about Mr. Ahmadinejad's election being a victory for populism over clericalism. But his candidacy was promoted by Supreme Guide Khamenei and a clerical establishment that pre-selects its officeholders according to narrow ideological and religious criteria.

In Mr. Ahmadinejad, they found a man whose wipe-Israel-off-the-map rhetoric is matched by his record as a hostage-taker, prison interrogator and organizer of violent domestic paramilitaries. If the "realists" greeted Mr. Khatami's election as a sign of regime softening, why then do they not draw opposite conclusions about his successor?

The Bush Administration has also tried diplomacy, agreeing to allow the Europeans -- hardly the most truculent negotiators, except on Guantanamo -- to take the lead on the nuclear issue. In late 2003, Iran agreed to suspend its nuclear work as a confidence-building measure; within months, they were caught cheating. A second go-around a year later led to the same result, with Tehran dismissing a package of incentives that included security guarantees, technical assistance, commercial ties and prospective membership in the World Trade Organization.

An effort to get Iran to agree to have Russia enrich its uranium was negotiated for months and led nowhere. Iran has consistently misled U.N. inspectors and illegally obstructed their work by denying them multiple-entry visas. It has flouted the Security Council's August 31 deadline to cease enriching uranium, choosing instead to expand its enrichment work while pursuing other nuclear programs such as a heavy water plant at Arak that has few possible non-military uses.

The deeper issue concerns Iran's strategic ambitions. "Realists" argue that despite the regime's avowed revolutionary principles, what it really seeks is to become a status quo power, secure in its neighborhood and linked to the wider world.

Even assuming Iran's ambitions extend only to the region, its unneighborly behavior belies this hope. Iranian agents were almost certainly responsible for the 1996 murders of 19 U.S. servicemen in Saudi Arabia. Hezbollah waged its summer war against Israel using arms supplied by Tehran; those arms may yet be turned on the Lebanese government.

Both Britain and the U.S. have publicly accused Iran of supplying increasingly sophisticated improvised explosive devices to anti-Coalition forces in Iraq; IEDs are the leading cause of U.S. military deaths. Now Iran says that a swift American withdrawal from Iraq is the key to peace. That may be music to the ears of Western critics of the war. But it's hardly surprising given that the U.S. is what chiefly stands in the way of Iran's desire to dominate Iraq through the likes of Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army is responsible for some of the worst sectarian violence.

Iran actively supports more than a dozen Parties of God (aka, Hezb Allah) in places as faraway as Paraguay and Argentina. Asian regional powers such as India and Pakistan have not sought the long-range ballistic missiles as Iran has through its Shihabs, which can now reach parts of Europe. Whereas India and Pakistan have deployed modest nuclear arsenals adequate to defend against each other, the scope of Iran's enrichment program suggests a desire to construct scores of bombs a year. * * *

Finally, there is the matter of values. One has to wonder about "engaging" a regime whose recent domestic practices include taking a razor to the tongue of labor leader Mansour Ossanloo, whose crime was to have organized an independent union for bus drivers. Realists would have us believe that a country that indulges such barbarism can still be expected to act as a predictable and, under certain conditions, reliable partner in diplomacy.

It's true that we also "engaged" the Soviet Union during the Cold War, but most successfully when Ronald Reagan also spoke candidly about Soviet reality and on behalf of Russian freedom and the U.S. resisted the Kremlin's global designs. We suppose in that sense the Gipper was an idealistic realist. President Bush has spoken repeatedly, in his major speeches and in interviews, about American support for Iranians who aspire to more freedom, which is one reason the U.S. is popular among the Iranian people. What message would it now send those Iranians if the U.S. turned around and embraced the rule of Tehran's mullahs?

We think it's simple realism to believe the fate of people like Mr. Ossanloo explains Iran's past behavior, and well predicts its future.

Blair Proposes Sub-based Missile Shield (USAT)

USA Today, December 5, 2006

British Prime Minister Tony Blair unveiled plans Monday for a new submarine-based nuclear-missile defense system to thwart threats from rogue regimes and state-sponsored terrorists.

Blair told the House of Commons that despite the end of the Cold War, threats were posed by North Korea, Iran and others. Blair said land- or air-based alternatives were considered too costly and too vulnerable.

“It would be unwise and dangerous for Britain alone of any of the nuclear powers to give up its independent nuclear deterrent,” he said. Blair said Britain would cut back on its nuclear stockpile from 200 warheads to 160.

Parliament will vote on the proposal by March. Blair's Labor Party was once committed to unilateral disarmament.

Coup underway in Fiji, prime minister says

Fiji's elected leader said a military takeover was under way in the South Pacific country as armed troops surrounded his house and locked down the capital. Heavily armed soldiers set up check points around the capital, Suva, and seized official vehicles from government ministers.

Prime Minister Laisenia Qarase was asked in a radio interview if he was still in control of the country.

“There are some things that aren't clear,” Qarase told the Legend network. “If the military has completed the takeover then they are in control. If they have not completed the takeover, then we are still the government of the day.”

U.S. Marine gets 40 years in Philippine rape case

U.S. Marine Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith was convicted of rape in the Philippines and sentenced to 40 years in prison. A 23-year-old Filipino woman accused Smith of sexually assaulting her while she was drunk on Nov. 1, 2005. Smith, 21, of St. Louis, testified that the sex was consensual. Three other Marines were acquitted of complicity.

The U.S. Embassy had retained custody of the men during prosecution, in line with the Visiting Forces Agreement signed in 1998. Smith became the first American soldier to be convicted of wrongdoing since then. The judge ruled Smith would be temporarily held in a Philippine jail during his appeals.

Egypt arrests foreigners for allegedly plotting attacks

Egyptian police arrested an American, two Belgians, nine French and several others from Arab countries for allegedly plotting terrorist attacks in Middle Eastern countries including Iraq, the Interior Ministry said.

The group was part of an Islamic terrorist cell that was in Egypt under the guise of studying Arabic and Islamic studies, a ministry statement said. “They were seeking to recruit others … urging them for jihad, traveling to Iraq to carry out operations,” the statement said.

It did not give names or the number of Arabs arrested.

Blair Unveils Plan For Nuclear Missiles (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, December 5, 2006

Prime Minister Tony Blair launched plans Monday for a new multibillion-dollar submarine-based nuclear missile defense system, warning lawmakers the future may hold perilous threats from rogue regimes and state-sponsored terrorists.

In what is expected to be among his last major acts as premier, Blair told the House of Commons that despite the end of the Cold War, potential threats were posed by North Korea, Iran and others.

"In these circumstances, it would be unwise and dangerous for Britain alone of any of the nuclear powers to give up its independent nuclear deterrent," he said.

Blair said Britain would cut back on its stock of nuclear warheads from 200 to 160 — a move intended to make the proposal more acceptable to detractors within his own party. But he said any decision to reduce the nuclear-armed submarine fleet from four to three would be made only after a new vessel is designed. Blair said advisers had ruled out land or air based alternatives as too costly and too vulnerable.

The existing submarine fleet will be phased out from 2022, defense officials said.

Blair also said a decision on whether Britain will build a new arsenal of warheads to replace current stocks — expected to last only until the 2020s — would not be made before 2009.

That means Blair — due to stand down in 2007 — avoided the most contentious aspect of committing to a future nuclear defense program. Debates over a new warhead program are expected to stir up fierce divisions in his Labour party, once committed to unilateral nuclear disarmament

Britain's conservative opposition leader, David Cameron, endorsed the new deterrent, though he urged options be kept open for fourth submarine.

The replacement fleet would cost around $40 billion.

Blair said Britain would join in a U.S. program to extend the Trident D5 missile, currently used by both countries, until the early 2040s. President Bush has assured Blair that Britain would also be included in designing a successor missile, defense officials said.

Blair told legislators they would be asked to decide on the number of new submarines and a new missile design in the next Parliament, following national elections expected in 2009.

Kate Hudson, chairwoman of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, said Iran and North Korea would see Blair's decision as a vindication of their own aspirations.

Opponents of a replacement system — including nuclear disarmament campaigners — claim the new fleet is likely to cost as much as $150.6 billion.

Lawmakers will be asked to vote on the proposal by March and senior officials said the plan was expected to win overwhelming support.

Britain's first Trident submarine, the HMS Vanguard, went on a maiden patrol in December 1994.

Britain's third party Liberal Democrats have argued that a decision could be put off until as late as 2014. The government claims a decision is urgent because it will take up to 14 years to design, commission and build the submarines.

Menzies Campbell, leader of the Liberal Democrats, questioned the timing of the decision. "Is this about Britain's interest or your legacy?" he asked Blair in the Commons.

A survey of members of the House of Commons indicated that Blair faces strong resistance within his party.

Among 80 Labour lawmakers who completed a questionnaire, 39 percent were opposed to a new generation of nuclear-armed submarines, CommunicateResearch reported for The Independent newspaper.

In contrast, 94 percent of 52 Conservatives supported a new generation.

Beyond five formally declared nuclear weapons states — the United States, Russia, China, France and Britain — four others are known or thought to have such arms. They are India, Pakistan, Israel and, following its October missile test, North Korea.

Of the nuclear powers, only the United States and Russia have submarine, air and land-based capability.

Blair Urges Keeping Nuclear Arms Program Alive (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 4 — Citing a potential nuclear threat from nations like North Korea and Iran, Prime Minister Tony Blair urged legislators on Monday to extend the life of Britain's nuclear arms program with a new generation of submarines costing as much as $40 billion.

Mr. Blair made his proposal as he presented a white paper to Parliament on the subject of Britain's nuclear capacity that is expected to be debated at some length before a vote next March.

Mr. Blair proposed a plan to replace four Vanguard nuclear-powered submarines, equipped with Trident D5 missiles manufactured in the United States, that he said were the nation's only nuclear deterrent. The vessels will begin to go out of service in 2022, he said, and it will take 17 years to design and build replacements.

Nuclear weapons are a sensitive issue for the governing Labor Party since many of its supporters — including at one time Mr. Blair himself — have traditionally opposed nuclear weapons. Indeed, until the late 1980s, the party was formally committed to unilateral nuclear disarmament.

Mr. Blair insisted Monday that Britain should not dispense with its nuclear capacity.

DOJ_NMG_0102540

“The risk of giving up something that has been one of the mainstays of our security since the war, and moreover doing so when the one certain thing about our world today is its uncertainty, is not a risk I feel we can responsibly take,” he said in Parliament. “Our independent nuclear deterrent is the ultimate insurance.”

Apart from other arguments, Mr. Blair said, “The new dimension is undoubtedly the desire by states, highly dubious in their intentions, like North Korea and Iran, to pursue nuclear weapons capability.”

But Mr. Blair’s supporters are calculating that they can muster sufficient parliamentary support from the opposition Conservatives to squash Labor opposition in next year’s vote. As a sop to Labor dissent, however, Mr. Blair said Britain would consider reducing its nuclear submarine force to three from four and might cut its “stockpile of operationally available warheads” by one-fifth, to “no more than 160.”

In addition to Britain, nations with nuclear weapons include the other four permanent members of the United Nations Security Council — the United States, Russia, China and France — and India and Pakistan.

Western nations like the United States and Britain accuse Iran of seeking a nuclear weapons capacity, which it denies. North Korea conducted a nuclear test in October. Israel has not commented on claims that it has nuclear weapons capacity.

“The notion of unstable, usually deeply repressive and anti-democratic states, in some cases profoundly inimical to our way of life, having a nuclear capability is a distinct and novel reason for Britain not to give up its capacity to deter,” Mr. Blair said.

“It is not utterly fanciful either to imagine states sponsoring nuclear terrorism from their soil,” he said. “We know this global terrorism seeks chemical, biological and nuclear devices. It is not impossible to contemplate a rogue government help such an acquisition.”

Some opponents of nuclear weapons said that Britain should spend its money on the environment, not on weapons. But labor unions representing shipyard and engineering workers said thousands of skilled jobs would be secured by a new nuclear submarine program. <NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM> </NYT_UPDATE_BOTTOM>

Blair Calls For New Nuclear Sub Fleet (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

LONDON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday called for building a multibillion-dollar, new-generation nuclear submarine fleet to counter future threats from "rogue" nuclear states and nuclear terrorism.

The move, which Blair justified as a hedge against potential threats from terrorists and states with nuclear ambitions, such as Iran and North Korea, rekindled debate over Britain's nuclear future and the role of such weapons in the post-Cold War world.

Blair said his government would support a top-to-bottom renewal of the nation's nuclear-powered Trident submarine fleet, which is equipped with nuclear ballistic missiles, to ensure that Britain retains its seat among the world's five major nuclear powers for decades to come.

"The risk of giving up something that has been one of the mainstays of our security since the [Second World] War, and moreover doing so when the one certain thing about our world today is its uncertainty, is not a risk I feel we can responsibly take. Our independent nuclear deterrent is the ultimate insurance," Blair told an occasionally skeptical Parliament, which will vote on the program in March.

"Proliferation remains a real problem," he said. "The notion of unstable, usually deeply repressive and anti-democratic states, in some cases profoundly inimical to our way of life, having a nuclear capability, is a distinct and novel reason for Britain not to give up its capacity to deter."

There have been mounting calls in Britain to dismantle the four-vessel nuclear-weapons fleet that many believe has outlived its purpose. Spending billions on a new fleet could undermine negotiations with North Korea and Iran at a time when those nations are being asked to adhere to international nonproliferation obligations, these critics say.

"How can this cost be justified in the post-Cold War environment, when it will severely restrict much more needed conventional military expenditures, undermine the Nonproliferation Treaty and drain off colossal sums of money from real threats of terrorism, climate change and long-term energy security?" Michael Meacher, a lawmaker from Blair's Labor Party, argued during Monday's opening debate in the House of Commons.

But Blair's proposal can survive misgivings in his own camp because he is assured of substantial support among opposition Conservative lawmakers. Tory leader David Cameron said "the case is very powerful" for building "a credible system … that isn't vulnerable to preemptive attack," and even questioned Blair's commitment to a 20% reduction in the number of Trident nuclear warheads.

"Does he realize he doesn't have to make concessions to those who've never supported the concept of deterrence?" Cameron said.

DOJ_NMG_0102541

Blair is calling for revamping U.S.-made Trident D5 missiles to extend their utility into the early 2040s while reducing their number to 160 from 200. British designers would immediately launch the design and construction of as many as four new submarines to replace within 17 years the current fleet of four Vanguard-class nuclear-powered submarines, launched in the mid-1990s.

The estimated cost would range from $30 billion to $40 billion, an average of 3% of the defense budget over the next two decades.

Britain would continue to field the smallest stockpile of nuclear weapons among the five recognized nuclear powers and would be the only one with a single delivery system, Blair noted.

He said the end of the Cold War had not ended Britain's potential future vulnerability to possible threats. "The new dimension is undoubtedly the desire by states, highly dubious in their intentions, like North Korea and Iran, to pursue nuclear weapons capability," he said.

Gavin Ireland, a military sciences researcher at the Royal United Services Institute, said Britain's nuclear posture was founded on the concept of deterrence based on ambiguity.

"It's there in the back pocket. It's not intended to be an overt threat," Ireland said.

Unlike U.S. nuclear policy, he said, which calls for deployment of a wide range of missiles on multiple platforms capable of striking a broad range of targets, Britain's strategy calls for keeping at least one sophisticated and elusive nuclear submarine deployed somewhere in the world's oceans whose orders to launch would be difficult, if not impossible, to subvert.

Ultimately, Blair said, relying on the substantially larger U.S. arsenal to shield Britain is not a foolproof option.

"The independent nature of the British deterrent is again an additional insurance against circumstances where we are threatened but America is not," he said. "These circumstances are also highly unlikely, but I am unwilling to say they are nonexistent."

Offering Video, Israel Answers Critics On War (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 4 — Israel's military, which has been accused of abuses in its war against Hezbollah this summer, has declassified photographs, video images and prisoner interrogations to buttress its accusation that Hezbollah systematically fired from civilian neighborhoods in southern Lebanon and took cover in those areas to shield itself from attack.

Lebanon and international human rights groups have accused Israel of war crimes in the 34 days of fighting in July and August, saying that Israel fired into populated areas and that civilians accounted for a vast majority of the more than 1,000 Lebanese killed.

Israel says that it tried to avoid civilians, but that Hezbollah fired from civilian areas, itself a war crime, which made those areas legitimate targets.

In a new report, an Israeli research group says Hezbollah stored weapons in mosques, battled Israelis from inside empty schools, flew white flags while transporting missiles and launched rockets near United Nations monitoring posts.

The detailed report on the war was produced by the Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center at the Center for Special Studies, a private research group headed by Reuven Erlich, a retired colonel in military intelligence, who worked closely with the Israeli military.

An advance copy was given to The New York Times by the American Jewish Congress, which has itself fought against the use of "human shields," provided consultation and translated the study.

In Lebanon, a Hezbollah official denied the study's allegations, saying its military units were based outside towns and villages and had come into populated areas only when circumstances required it. "We tried to avoid having to fight among civilian areas, but when Israeli troops entered villages, we were automatically forced to fight them from inside these villages to defend it," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on military matters.

Israel's critics charge that its military either singled out civilians or was reckless in its pursuit of Hezbollah. The new report is an attempt to rebut such criticism.

The report includes Israeli Air Force video that it says shows several instances of Hezbollah personnel firing rockets next to residential buildings in southern Lebanon and then being bombed by Israel. The adjacent buildings were presumably damaged, but there is no information on whether civilians were inside.

"This study explains the dilemma facing the Israeli military as it fights an enemy that intentionally operates from civilian areas," Mr. Erlich said. "This is the kind of asymmetric warfare we are seeing today. It's not only relevant to Lebanon, but is also what we are seeing in the Gaza Strip and in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0102542

The report says: “The construction of a broad military infrastructure, positioned and hidden in populated areas, was intended to minimize Hezbollah’s vulnerability. Hezbollah would also gain a propaganda advantage if it could represent Israel as attacking innocent civilians.”

In video from July 23, a truck with a multi-barreled missile launcher, presumably from Hezbollah, is parked in a street, sandwiched between residential buildings. The video was transmitted from an Israeli missile approaching the truck. The screen goes fuzzy as the missile slams into the target.

In another video, from a Lebanese village, rockets are seen being fired from a launcher on the back of a truck. The truck then drives a short distance and disappears inside a building. Seconds later, the building itself disappears under a cloud of smoke from an Israeli bomb.

The report says that there were many such examples, and that Hezbollah has been preparing for such an engagement for years, embedding its fighters and their weapons in the Shiite villages of southern Lebanon. When Hezbollah fired its rockets from those areas, Israel faced a choice of attacking, and possibly causing civilian casualties, or refraining from shooting because of the risk, the report said.

Elias Hanna, a retired Lebanese Army general, said of the Israeli allegations, “Of course there are hidden invisible tunnels, bunkers of missile launchers, bunkers of explosive charges amongst civilians.”

He added: “You cannot separate the southern society from Hezbollah, because Hezbollah is the society and the society is Hezbollah. Hezbollah is holding this society together through its political, military and economic services. It is providing the welfare for the south.”

Asked whether Hezbollah should be seen as responsible for the deaths of Lebanese civilians in the war, he replied: “Of course Hezbollah is responsible. But these people are ready to sacrifice their lives for Hezbollah. If you tell them, ‘Your relative died,’ they will tell you ‘No, he was a martyr.’ The party’s military preparations from 2000 till 2006 took place in their areas. They were of course done with complete secrecy, but in accordance with the civilians.”

During the war, Israel dropped leaflets urging villagers to leave southern Lebanon and also to evacuate from Hezbollah strongholds in southern Beirut. Many did flee, but some remained and among them were hundreds who were killed.

In one highly publicized Israeli strike on July 30, at least 28 Lebanese civilians, including many women and children, were killed when Israel bombed a residential building in the village of Qana. Israel said it struck a Hezbollah rocket cell that had recently fired from near the building.

In several other instances, Israel bombed vehicle convoys that were trying to leave the combat zone in southern Lebanon, killing many civilians. Human Rights Watch, a New York-based advocacy group, said shortly before the war ended that it had documented the deaths of 27 Lebanese civilians killed while trying to flee.

Kenneth Roth, the executive director of Human Rights Watch, wrote shortly after the war that the Israeli military “seemed to assume that because it gave warnings to civilians to evacuate southern Lebanon, anyone who remained was a Hezbollah fighter.”

He wrote, “But giving warnings, as required by international humanitarian law, does not relieve the attacker of the duty to distinguish between civilians and combatants and to target only combatants.”

Amnesty International said that Israel “consistently failed to adopt necessary precautionary measures,” and that its forces “carried out indiscriminate and disproportionate attacks on a large scale.”

The group also accused Hezbollah of “serious violations of international humanitarian law” for deliberately attacking Israeli civilians with rockets. But it did not address the accusation that Hezbollah hid its militants among Lebanese civilians.

The Israeli report defended the Israeli operations, saying “airstrikes and ground attacks against Hezbollah targets located in population centers were carried out in accordance with international law, which does not grant immunity to a terrorist organization deliberately hiding behind civilians.”

The Israeli report included video of what it said were three Hezbollah prisoners being questioned by Israeli military personnel.

Muhammad Srour, a young Hezbollah fighter, said he had initially received training in Iran and was undergoing further training in eastern Lebanon’s Bekaa Valley when the war broke out. He was sent to the front lines.

Like many Hezbollah fighters, he traveled by motorbike, but they were frequently the targets of Israeli forces. While transporting missiles, hidden in cloth, in and around the southern village of Aita al Shaab, “I carried a white flag,” Mr. Srour said.

Hezbollah operated freely from homes in the village, with the permission of residents who had fled. The departing residents either left their doors unlocked or gave their keys to Hezbollah, he said. Mr. Srour acknowledged that homes used by Hezbollah were more likely to draw fire.

But, he said, “better that the house is destroyed and the Israelis don’t enter and come back to conquer Lebanon.”

DOJ_NMG_0102543

Another captured fighter, Hussein Suleiman, explained how he had set up a rocket-firing position on the front porch of a house on the outskirts of Aita al Shaab.

A third Hezbollah man, Maher Kourani, said group members had worn civilian clothes, tried never to show their weapons, and traveled in ordinary civilian cars. “We use Volvos, Mercedes, BMW,” he said. “We use Range Rovers, too.”

The Israeli report makes frequent references to Hezbollah’s using Lebanese civilians as human shields, though it cites only two villages where it says Hezbollah prevented residents from leaving. Mr. Erlich acknowledged that over all, Hezbollah did not use coercion against Lebanese civilians.

Rather, he said, “Hezbollah was operating inside a supportive population, and cynically used them to further its own goals.”

Hezbollah fired some 4,000 rockets into northern Israel, and most Israeli civilians either fled the region or took refuge in bomb shelters.

Over all, more than 1,000 Lebanese were killed, and a vast majority were civilians, according to the Lebanese government. Hezbollah has said that no more than 100 of its fighters were killed.

The Israeli report disputes this, claiming that at least 450 and perhaps as many as 650 of the Lebanese dead were from Hezbollah.

Israel suffered 159 deaths, including 41 civilians and 118 military personnel, according to the report.

Israel withdrew its troops from southern Lebanon in 2000 after a presence of nearly two decades, much of it spent fighting Hezbollah. There was periodic cross-border shelling in the ensuing years.

The war erupted on July 12 when Hezbollah crossed the border and attacked an Israeli jeep patrol, killing three soldiers and capturing two more, who remain held by Hezbollah, according to the group.

The fighting stopped Aug. 14, shortly after the passage of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1701, which reaffirmed an earlier resolution calling for Lebanese militias to disarm.

Israel says Hezbollah has only hidden its weapons and is being resupplied from its longtime patrons, Syria and Iran. Israel continues to send warplanes on reconnaissance missions over southern Lebanon, despite criticism from the United Nations forces in the region. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

More Troops Deployed In Beirut After Killing Of Protester (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

Lebanon’s army deployed more soldiers in Beirut on Monday after the killing of a pro-Syrian demonstrator raised fears peaceful anti-government protests could turn to violence.

Security sources said the military increased its forces in the Sunni districts that Shia protesters drive through to get to central Beirut where the Hezbollah-led opposition is holding a sit-in aimed at forcing the government of Fouad Siniora to step down.

The anti-government demonstrations in Lebanon claimed their first life on Sunday after a protester was killed in a clash when Shia marchers entered a largely Sunni neighbourhood of Beirut. The man was shot when Hizbollah supporters were making their way home through the suburbs.

Both sides in the country's power struggle vowed not to budge, with thousands of anti-government demonstrators camping out in the heart of Beirut for a third night while Mr Siniora insisted that he would not resign.

The prime minister said that "protest is no solution". The opposition, led by the pro-Syrian, Shia Hizbollah movement, is demanding a government of national unity. Margaret Beckett, the British foreign secretary, and Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the German foreign minister, were in Beirut over the weekend.

They met Mr Siniora separately and expressed their support for him. In the Arab world, King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia and Egypt's President Hosni Mubarak voiced strong support for the Lebanese government. Amr Moussa, the head of the Arab League, called for a compromise.

Troops Patrol Beirut After Shooting (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi

AP, December 5, 2006

Troops in armored cars deployed to Sunni Muslim neighborhoods in the capital Monday after the shooting death of a young Shiite man, but that failed to prevent renewed friction. Shiite leaders urged the victim's family to avoid revenge, fearing sectarian violence that could detonate Lebanon's political crisis.

Lebanese were struggling to contain tensions after Shiites were fired on Sunday as they walked through Sunni and mixed neighborhoods following an anti-government demonstration in downtown Beirut. The attack raised memories of Lebanon's 1975-1990 civil war, when Beirut was divided by the Green Line between its warring Christian and Muslim districts.

Now Lebanon's divisions fall along different lines: The government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora has widespread support among Sunnis, while its opponent, the pro-Syrian Hezbollah, is backed by Shiites. Lebanon's Christians largely support the government, though a major faction has allied with Hezbollah.

Police said two people were injured late Monday when a group of Shiites, returning home from downtown Beirut, smashed windows of parked cars and stores in a neighborhood near Qasqas, the mainly Sunni area where Sunday's shooting took place.

Troops fired several warning shots in the air and intervened to prevent the friction from escalating, said security officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media.

About 300 people also gathered on the highway to Beirut international airport, in an apparent attempt to block the road, but security forces prevented them, the security officials said.

The body of Ahmed Mahmoud, a 20-year-old Shiite, was brought by ambulance Monday night to downtown Riad Solh Square, where thousands of pro-Hezbollah protesters were camping for the fourth straight night demanding the ouster of Saniora's U.S-backed government.

The protesters cheered, blared nationalist songs and waved the Lebanese flag as the coffin was placed on a platform in front of the crowd, just a few hundred yards from Saniora's offices, which were ringed by troops.

Hezbollah's Al-Manar television station, which aired the event live, called Mahmoud "the martyr of national unity." Mahmoud's funeral was scheduled for Tuesday.

Mahmoud's father, Ali, said he initially had thought of revenge, but backed down after a visit by envoys of Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah and his ally, Parliament Speaker and leader of the Shiite Amal Movement Nabih Berri, who said vengeance would only play into the hands of those trying to divide Lebanon.

"They said my son was martyred for the homeland and they don't want chaos, but want all sects to live in harmony, to love each other," Mahmoud said as he received well-wishers at a funeral hall.

He said he hoped that Saniora, who has been holed up in his office since Friday, will quit. "Then, everything will be fine. We don't want problems between Sunnis and Shiites, Christians and Druse," he said.

Ahmed Mahmoud and his brother Hassan were returning home from the protest Sunday and had just turned a corner when heavy gunfire broke out.

"Ali said, 'Let's run the other way,'" said Hassan, 22. He said he heard his brother scream, and saw him fall, but kept running. An hour later, the family got a call saying Ahmed had been killed by a bullet to the back.

Hassan Mahmoud accused Saniora and his top ally, Saad Hariri — son of slain Sunni former prime minister Rafik Hariri — of causing problems "so Sunnis and Shiites start fighting each other."

Accounts of how the shooting started varied. Sunnis in the neighborhood said the Shiites returning from the rally began chanting rude slogans against Sunni leaders, provoking Sunnis to throw stones. Some — Sunnis and Shiites — said they believed the came from outsiders not connected to the rally.

"I expect things to get worse, there will be war. The signs are all there," said Issam Qadah, a Sunni coffee vendor who heard the gunfire.

Mazen Mizhir, 19, a Sunni student, said he was worried about his safety because his college was in a Shiite neighborhood. "Tomorrow, Nasrallah and Saad Hariri will kiss and make up. It's only the ordinary people who will lose," he said.

Mohammed Barakat, a 34-year-old Sunni, blamed Hezbollah for the crisis. "We (Sunnis) feel like foreigners in our own land," he said. "We're living on the edge."

The political crisis began escalating when six pro-Hezbollah ministers resigned from the Cabinet last month after Saniora and his anti-Syrian majority in parliament rejected the group's demand for a new national unity government that would effectively give it and its allies veto power.

Hezbollah says it will continue its protest campaign until Saniora agrees to step down; the prime minister and his supporters have vowed to stay.

Saniora, a Sunni, gave a veiled warning Sunday of the possibility of Sunni-Shiite fighting, saying that any attempt by Hezbollah's supporters to storm his office would lead to "a major and serious problem."

Beirut Protester Killed In Brawl Is Hailed As Hezbollah 'Martyr' (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102545

BEIRUT, Dec. 4 -- The posters went up Monday morning, followed by slogans and chants. And within a day of his death in a street brawl along Beirut's increasingly tense fault lines of sect and politics, Ahmed Mahmoud became the first symbol of the mass demonstrations by Hezbollah and its allies meant to bring down the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

"Lift the Lebanese flag," an announcer intoned over loudspeakers, as tens of thousands at the protest in downtown Beirut surged toward an ambulance carrying Mahmoud's coffin, draped in a Lebanese flag. "Let us give respect to the martyr."

The bells of St. George Cathedral rang, and protesters recited Koranic verses as his body was carried through the streets. At times, the crowd shouted, "Down with the government!" His posters were hung over the crowd and plastered on car windshields. "Martyr of Lebanese national unity," one read. "Martyred at the hands of the authority's militias," said another.

Mahmoud was shot Sunday in clashes that erupted on the edge of Tariq Jdideh, a tense Sunni neighborhood, between its residents and Shiite protesters returning from downtown. The exact circumstances of his death remained unclear, but the conflicts there and elsewhere in the city sent a chill through Beirut, bracing for more trouble between the tens of thousands going back and forth to the protest and other residents who say they see the banners, flags and chants as a provocation.

Soon after the clashes, the Lebanese army deployed more soldiers in the capital, particularly along protesters' routes. Downtown, dozens of soldiers and riot police stood behind barbed wire and barricades guarding the government headquarters known as the Serail, where Siniora and other ministers have taken up residence. Even the arrival of Mahmoud's body at the protest went unannounced; organizers, sensing that tempers were running high, said they were trying to act responsibly.

Hours after nightfall Monday, Lebanese television aired footage of more fights in the same neighborhood, which is near the largely Shiite Muslim southern suburbs. Car windows were shattered, and groups of youths surged down the streets.

"We're not scared of sectarian strife, but we're ready for it," said Wael Ali, a 27-year-old protester. "We don't want to aggress against anyone, but if someone aggresses against us, we'll never give in."

He stood with a friend, Hassan Qassem, both of whom have come each day to the demonstrations.

"We're ready for everything," said Qassem, also 27. "We had martyrs in the war with Israel, and we won. We're not ready for just one martyr. We're ready for 1,000 martyrs, but in the end, the government will be brought down."

As they spoke, the Lebanese national anthem played as the body was driven through the streets, with crowds rushing toward the ambulance. Some threw red and white rose petals on top of the hood. As it made its way toward the edge of downtown, the crowd shouted, "There is no god but God; the martyr is beloved by God."

Hezbollah and its allies called the protest Friday after the government rejected their demands for a greater share of power in the cabinet. The government and its supporters, allied with the United States and France, have described the demonstrations as a coup attempt. Hezbollah, backed by Syria and Iran, has insisted the protesters will remain in the streets until the government resigns.

The arrival of Mahmoud's body was a dramatic moment in the otherwise carnival-like atmosphere of the demonstrations, which entered their fourth day. Boys played cards in the street or smoked Arabic water pipes outside dozens of tents that have gone up in parking lots and parks.

Families posed for pictures, and youths tried to outdo each other with chants. Most were directed at Siniora and his government allies, particularly Ahmed Fatfat, who as acting interior minister during the recent war had authority over a police commander who served tea to Israeli troops who had entered his headquarters as they occupied the southern town of Marjayoun.

"Oh Fatfat, you tough guy, we'll take three coffees and a tea!" they shouted.

As protesters passed police checkpoints, some motioned their hands downward, a gesture made to order tea.

British Police Take Poisoning Inquiry To Moscow (WP)

By Mary Jordan And Peter Finn

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 4 -- A team of British police investigators arrived in Moscow on Monday to begin questioning people about the poisoning death of Alexander Litvinenko, a former Russian spy who had recently become a British citizen, in a case that is straining relations between the two governments.

Home Secretary John Reid, speaking at a European Union meeting in Brussels, said the Scotland Yard officers in Moscow would "follow the evidence wherever it goes."

Although Russian officials have pledged to cooperate in the inquiry, their irritation over the case showed through in official comments. Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov warned Monday against "politicizing this issue" and "speculations on this subject." The Interfax news agency also quoted him as saying, "This is, of course, harming our relations."

In Russia, a jailed former intelligence officer made a plea Monday through his lawyers for British investigators to talk to him. Mikhail Trepashkin, who used to work in the Federal Security Service, or FSB, said an FSB officer had told him that Litvinenko was being targeted and "won't escape Trotsky's ice pick," a reference to the 1940 murder of Bolshevik figure Leon Trotsky by a Soviet agent in Mexico City.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko's, said he hoped British investigators would be allowed to interview Trepashkin in jail because he would be able to tell them about "rogue elements within the FSB," the domestic successor to the KGB.

Litvinenko, 43, an outspoken critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin, a former KGB officer, accused Putin of ordering his killing, according to a statement Litvinenko's family and friends said he dictated on his deathbed. The Kremlin has called those allegations absurd, and Reid has cautioned against making assumptions about the case before the facts are known.

Scotland Yard detectives in Moscow are treading on delicate ground as they look into the business and personal relationships of former members of Russia's secretive intelligence services. A central focus of the investigation in Moscow will be interviews with three men, at least one of them a former KGB officer, who met with Litvinenko on Nov. 1, hours before he fell violently ill from poisoning by radioactive polonium-210.

In comments to Russian news organizations, the three men -- Andrei Lugovoy, Dmitry Kovtun and Vyacheslav Sokolenko -- have denied any involvement in Litvinenko's death. All three met Litvinenko in the Millennium Hotel in London, across the street from the U.S. Embassy. Police later detected traces of radiation at the hotel.

Police are investigating whether there are also links between any of the men and traces of polonium-210 found in London hotel rooms and on British Airways planes that flew from London to Moscow, among other destinations.

The three Russians met in the 1980s at the Supreme Council Military School in Moscow, according to a recent joint interview with Echo Moskvy radio. Lugovoy is a former KGB agent -- as was Litvinenko -- but the backgrounds of Kovtun and Sokolenko are less clear. Sokolenko said he runs an association of security companies called the Ninth Degree, and Kovtun described himself as a business consultant.

Many private security companies in Russia are stocked with former officers of the KGB and FSB, according to Olga Kryshtanovskaya, head of the Center for the Study of Elites at the Institute of Sociology in Moscow. She said the former agents provide physical security and gather political and economic intelligence for corporations.

"They are very valuable to employers of private security firms," agreed John Barber, an expert in modern Russian history at Cambridge University, especially because of their connections.

Sokolenko told the radio station that he was in London on Nov. 1 to join Lugovoy at a soccer game between British and Russian teams. Sokolenko said he "didn't have a meeting" with Litvinenko at the Millennium but merely "exchanged greetings" with him as Litvinenko spoke to the other two.

Kovtun said he first met Litvinenko in London with Lugovoy on Oct. 16, then again on Nov. 1. Kovtun said on Echo Moskvy that Litvinenko had "serious contacts with serious British companies which wanted to get into the Russian market, but had experienced difficulties with this."

Lugovoy described himself as an owner of a factory producing wine and nonalcoholic drinks made from herbs and honey. "This is my main business now," he said. "This factory is the largest in the country, 50,000 square meters, 500 employees. The company is very successful."

After graduating from the military academy, Lugovoy said, he worked in a KGB Kremlin regiment that provided security for VIPs. After the fall of the Soviet Union, he provided security in 1992 and 1993 for then-Prime Minister Yegor Gaidar -- who himself fell mysteriously ill recently during a visit to Ireland. He was released from a Moscow hospital Monday evening.

After leaving government service, Lugovoy spent several years as head of security for ORT, a national television channel once controlled by Boris Berezovsky, a billionaire now living in self-imposed exile in London. Berezovsky was a friend of Litvinenko's and is another harsh critic of Putin, who arranged a state takeover of ORT.

Lugovoy, like Litvinenko, spent time in prison in Russia. Lugovoy was charged with trying to help an official of the Russian airline Aeroflot, in which Berezovsky was a major shareholder, escape from police custody.

Litvinenko, for his part, angered his superiors when he publicly accused them of ordering him to kill Berezovsky. He was jailed on several charges of abusing his authority before he was released and fled the country, arriving in Britain in 2000.

Russia: Poison Probe Has Hurt UK Ties (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Jimmy Burns And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

Russia warned on Monday that the mounting furore over the poisoning in London of Alexander Litvinenko was damaging relations between the two countries.

As British investigators arrived in Moscow last night for a highly unusual joint probe, Sergei Lavrov, Russian foreign minister, hit out at what he called the “politicisation” of the case.

DOJ_NMG_0102547

UK investigators and officials have refused to rule out the possibility that the former KGB agent was killed as a result of a conspiracy involving Russian security services involved in political manoeuvring.

The Russian prosecutor-general's office confirmed that London's police had requested assistance with its investigation. Mr Litvinenko died after being poisoned with radioactive polonium 210. His death led to a health scare in Britain in which buildings and people were found to be contaminated with radiation and three British Airways aircraft were grounded.

Moscow has been irritated by newspaper reports from London that Moscow tried to prevent the publication of Mr Litvinenko's deathbed letter. "This is damaging our relations," Mr Lavrov was quoted as saying by Russian news agencies. "We must avoid speculation on this subject."

British investigators plan to interview at least three Russians who met Mr Litvinenko on November 1, the day he fell ill.

Particular attention is focusing on Andrei Lugovoi, a former KGB officer who also has past links – like Mr Litvinenko – with Boris Berezovsky, the exiled Russian oligarch.

Mr Lugovoi was unavailable for comment on Monday but in previous media statements has denied any responsibility for Mr Litvinenko's poisoning.

British Spy Probe Turns To Émigrés (WSJ)

By Carrick Mollenkamp And Aaron O. Patrick

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

LONDON -- The investigation into the poisoning of the former Russian spy who died here last month has cast a spotlight on some of London's wealthiest jet-setters: the thousands of Russian émigrés who have moved here in the past decade.

Russians, as with other wealthy émigrés from the Middle East, come to protect their wealth and take advantage of the tax laws, or send their children to British schools. Some Russians are exiles seeking escape from the regime of President Vladimir Putin.

It was in these circles that former spy Alexander Litvinenko moved before his death in a London hospital on Nov. 23 from poisoning by the radioactive substance polonium 210.

Mr. Litvinenko was an associate of Boris Berezovsky, one of the most prominent Russian exiles in the United Kingdom and, like Mr. Litvinenko, a critic of Mr. Putin.

Many Russians here maintain ties back to Russia and its murky business and government connections, and while police haven't publicly identified any suspects, those links appear to be key. Yesterday, British investigators traveled to Moscow, testing relations between the U.K. and Russia.

To many, it follows that the plot leading to Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning would play out, like a spy novel, in London. London's Metropolitan Police Service has investigated nearly a dozen sites Mr. Litvinenko visited, or sites that police say require monitoring by health officials because of his radioactive poisoning. While Mr. Litvinenko blamed Mr. Putin in a note from his death bed -- a claim the Russian government has denied -- with the many wealthy Russian businessmen in London, a former spy could have crossed others who had the means to poison him.

Russian wealth makes a big contribution to London's economy, driving up house prices and boosting retail sales. Communities of wealthy Russians can be found in a number of other major cities, such as New York. London, and the U.K., do a lot to court these émigrés and other wealthy foreigners. Foreigners who reside in the U.K. but can show they don't live here permanently don't have to pay taxes on overseas income as long it resides offshore.

London's business climate also helps. The city has seen an influx of Russian businessmen rich with oil and telecommunication assets who have tapped the city's deep well of capital. Britons refer to a top London soccer team, Chelsea, as "Chelski" because the team is owned by Russian oligarch Roman Abramovich. Since 2000, Russian companies have taken part in 27 equity sales on the London Stock Exchange's main and alternative investment market, raising $24.6 billion, according to research firm Dealogic.

Earlier this year, in a huge offering, state-controlled Russian oil company OAO Rosneft listed its global depositary receipts on the London Stock Exchange. Underscoring the disputes from Russia that have spilled over into London, the stock offering came about only after lawyers for Russian oil company OAO Yukos failed to stop the listing after claiming that Rosneft's assets came from the unlawful seizure and sale of Yukos.

Among home sales, from June 2005 to June of this year, Russians have bought one in every five properties priced at and above £6 million ($11.9 million), according to real-estate firm Knight Frank.

This year, Russian homeowners are expected to buy 243 London homes priced above £1 million, compared with 67 in 2001, according to Liam Bailey, head of residential research at Knight Frank. The average sales price during that same period has risen 80% to £2.5 million for homes in London and the English countryside.

Last month, one of the U.K.'s top real-estate agents, Savills PLC, formed a joint venture with a Russian real-estate company, Intermark, to sell English houses and apartments to wealthy Russians. Virginia Garnett, a Russian-speaking executive with Savills in London, says Russians are prepared to spend £15 million to £30 million for homes in London.

Lately, Russians are discussing Mr. Litvinenko, Ms. Garnett says. "Socially, it comes up. Overwhelmingly, the Russian position is that Putin is being unfairly accused. I think there is definitely an attitude of disappointment in that right now that [Putin] is guilty until proven innocent" in the U.K., she says.

Iconic department store Harrods hired Russian-speaking personal shopping assistants last year. The store's export bureau, which helps foreign customers claim back sales tax, has had Russian-speaking staff since 2004. "The Russian market is very attracted to all of the top-of-the-range international designer labels," says a Harrods spokesman.

Peter Eatenton, a joint partner at Chelsea's Rolls Royce and Bentley car dealership, says Russians usually will only buy the latest and most expensive models. "They tend to be a bit over the top and want the best of the best," he says.

At the outpost of Sotheby's auction house in London, sales of Russian art are booming. Two sales of Russian art last month raised £22 million, including £2.25 million for two vases which Tsar Nicholas I gave to a French ambassador in 1830. Sotheby's declined to disclose the buyers, but Jo Vickery, head of the Russian department, says "the vast majority of our buyers are Russians. They made their money during the [Russian President Boris] Yeltsin period and now they are building up their collections."

A Familiar Mystery (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

In the 10 days that have passed since Alexander Litvinenko, an ex-KGB agent, died of radiation poisoning in London, we have learned a lot about his death -- haven't we?

Well, we have learned that Litvinenko died after somehow ingesting polonium-210, a relatively rare radioactive substance. We have learned that a mysterious Italian, Mario Scaramella-- a self-employed "security expert" who last year claimed that he'd found ex-KGB men selling nuclear material in the postage-stamp republic of San Marino -- has been poisoned too. We have learned that various other ex-KGB agents floating around London also have tested positive for polonium-210, as have a Piccadilly sushi restaurant, a London hotel room and a few airplanes.

We have seen a photograph of Litvinenko flaunting KGB gauntlets, a Chechen sword and a Union Jack. We have also seen a photograph of Litvinenko with tubes in his body, on his deathbed.

We have learned that Litvinenko may or may not have known who murdered the Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya earlier this year (and that the same people may have killed him too); that he may or may not have been involved in a scam to blackmail various prominent Russians (unless that's just information planted in the British press); that he may or may not have possessed a dossier proving that the Kremlin framed the imprisoned billionaire boss of the Yukos oil company, Mikhail Khodorkovsky (unless that's what Khodorkovsky's people, or some other people, want us to think); that he may or may not have possessed proof that Vladimir Putin -- another ex-KGB officer, now president of Russia -- ordered his goons to blow up some apartment buildings in Moscow several years ago, a terrorist act that launched the current Chechen war.

In other words: Though we don't know who killed Litvinenko, we have learned that London is a more exciting place than we thought it was. We have learned that the complex plots of Dostoevsky novels merely reflect Russian reality. And we have learned that the old KGB lives on in new guises.

Or rather -- we have been reminded that the old KGB lives on in new guises, because in fact we have known this for some time. True, the old employees no longer belong to a single all-powerful institution. Some ("the stupidest," according to Oleg Gordievsky, the former double agent) have stayed with the agency, joining either the domestic service (FSB) or the foreign intelligence bureau (SVR). Others went into business, some joining the security entourages of new Russian millionaires, some becoming Russian millionaires in their own right. Still others, to put it bluntly, went into organized crime. And some -- President Putin is the shining example here -- went into politics.

Despite their widely varying fates, it has long been perfectly clear that many of these old comrades continue to work together in mutually profitable ways. As far back as 1999, for example, a group of Russian-born bankers was caught laundering money through a New York bank, probably using information obtained, one way or another, by Russian intelligence. Since then it has become clear that a number of Russia's largest companies were launched with money from mysterious sources, and a number of former KGB officers have shown up at the helm of businesses and banks, too.

Of course this same mutually profitable relationship will also make it extremely difficult to find Litvinenko's real killer. After all, this set of post-KGB relationships is nothing if not complex: There are conspiracies within conspiracies, agents of agents of agents, people who pretend to be acting on behalf of a particular oligarch or Chechen insurgent who are actually acting on behalf of someone quite different. It is possible that Litvinenko was murdered by "rogue secret policemen," as the British press suspects. It is also possible that the "rogue secret policemen" were working for someone who worked for the Kremlin, or someone who worked for a Russian oligarch, or who worked for a Russian oligarch who worked for the Kremlin.

As the investigation progresses, I'm sure many more wonderfully shady characters will emerge, along with many theories about who was trying to discredit whom. But though it's doubtful that he ever gave an actual order to an actual thug, Putin is certainly responsible for Litvinenko's death in this deeper sense: He presides over this web of old intelligence operatives, indeed, sits at its center. And he approves of their methods.

One of his first acts as prime minister in 1999 was the unveiling of a plaque to Yuri Andropov, the former KGB boss best known for his harsh treatment of dissidents. Last year Russians built a statue to Andropov. No one should have been surprised that the former KGB's harassment of modern "dissidents" grew harsher with every passing year -- or that it culminated in this strange murder.

That we were surprised, are surprised, is both tragic and ironic: After all, for the better part of a decade now, we've been desperately looking for weapons of mass destruction and for the strange new enemies, the Islamic radicals who might be planning to use them. And now we've discovered that there really is nuclear material for sale and that it really is being used, in the West, to kill people. And that the killers aren't strange, or new, or even Islamic.

Ukraine Committed To U.S., Leader Says (AP)

By Desmond Butler, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 5, 2006

Prime Minister Viktor Yanukovych of Ukraine told an American audience Monday that his country is committed to democracy and on a path toward political and economic reform.

On his first trip to the U.S. after becoming prime minister, Yanukovych sought to convince U.S. officials and business leaders that he has strong democratic credentials, even though he was previously identified with efforts to rig the 2004 presidential election.

"There can never be too much democracy in the Ukraine, just as there can never be too much freedom," Yanukovych said in remarks at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a think tank.

Yanukovych's meetings Monday and Tuesday with Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and members of Congress were designed in part to discuss Ukraine's economy and its possible entry into the World Trade Organization and NATO.

But more was at stake than that.

"The main goal that Yanukovych is coming with is to establish some credibility with the administration," said Steven Pifer, a former U.S. ambassador to Ukraine and now a senior adviser at the think tank.

In 2004, Yanukovych was seen as a foe of democracy. Western officials expressed outrage at stolen votes that initially helped him win the presidential election. Protesters rose up in what became known as the "Orange Revolution." The country's Supreme Court overturned the election and ordered a new vote, which he lost to his pro-Western rival, Viktor Yushchenko.

Yanukovych was widely discredited, while Yushchenko was praised in the West and given a standing ovation when he addressed the U.S. Congress last year.

But Yanukovych became prime minister after parliamentary elections in March that were declared Ukraine's freest and fairest ever. He now shares power with Yushchenko.

Yanukovych's trip comes after the Ukrainian parliament on Friday ousted the country's foreign and interior ministers, two key allies of Yushchenko. Pro-Western Foreign Minister Borys Tarasyuk was fired after criticizing Yanukovych's Washington trip and grappling with Parliament about the president's constitutional primacy over foreign policy.

U.S. officials have played down the moves by Yanukovych's party against the ministers as an internal Ukrainian matter. But they have cautioned that Ukraine's democratic development is their primary concern.

"With respect to Ukraine, as with respect to any other country, we certainly want to see those that are elected democratically, govern democratically," said State Department deputy spokesman Tom Casey at a briefing Friday.

Despite setbacks for Yushchenko, he has argued that the wrangling between two directly elected power centers — the parliament and the presidency — are indeed signs of democracy.

Venezuelans Give Chávez A Mandate To Tighten His Grip (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, December 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0102550

CARACAS, Venezuela, Dec. 4 — If President Hugo Chávez rules like an autocrat, as his critics in Washington and here charge, then he does so with the full permission of a substantial majority of the Venezuelan people, Sunday's election here showed.

Sent to power for a third time, Mr. Chávez seems intent on assuming the mantle from the fading Fidel Castro of chief Latin American scourge of the United States. He also has made no secret of his intent to consolidate his power further through legal and personnel changes.

He has spoken of a desire to unite his supporters in one political party and to alter legislation to allow him to remain in power past 2020.

Winning support for such measures may not be difficult in a country where his allies already control the legislature and the Supreme Court as well as governorships in all but two states, and where the military, the national oil company and other government bureaucracies and institutions have been systematically packed with Chávez boosters and stripped of opponents.

Now, facing an anemic opposition that could not win in any of Venezuela's 23 states or Caracas, Mr. Chávez is expected to tighten his grip, first and foremost over his own supporters in an effort to prevent challenges to his rule from emerging.

"A priority for Chávez right now is what he calls a 'revolution within a revolution,' " said Steve Ellner, a political scientist at the Universidad de Oriente in eastern Venezuela. "This means a purging process of those associated with corruption or excess bureaucracy. In January you're going to see some heads being chopped."

Venezuela leading newspapers, El Nacional and El Universal, published maps in their pages on Monday showing the entire country painted red, the color of Mr. Chávez's campaign, as a reflection of his convincing victory.

Red, in fact, colored not just the clothing and advertisements of the Chávez campaign. Rafael Ramírez, the energy minister, described the national oil company as "red, really red," in comments caught on video in which he told workers that they had no place in the company if they were not supporters of the government.

Mr. Ramírez's words, which Mr. Chávez promptly adopted as one of his refrains, point to a creeping "with us or against us" radicalization in Venezuelan society that goes beyond the government-run oil company to institutions like public schools and museums.

That polarization may now worsen, a prospect that clearly concerns leaders of Venezuela's political opposition as they regroup after their defeat.

"Chávez is not a dictator," Teodoro Petkoff, the editor of the newspaper TalCual and a key adviser to the president's defeated opponent, Manuel Rosales, said in an interview. "But he's not a Thomas Jefferson either."

The reality of Venezuela's democracy is indeed far more nuanced, as is Mr. Chávez's "21st-century socialism" in an oil-exporting country experiencing a boom in conspicuous consumption.

Mr. Rosales's campaign itself illustrated that complexity. Mr. Rosales, the governor of Zulia State, rose from near obscurity to lead a movement that won nearly 40 percent of the vote nationwide. Much of the established media in the capital, Caracas, clearly supported him, although in relatively restrained coverage compared with their previous opposition to Mr. Chávez.

Beyond Venezuela, Mr. Chávez's rise to international prominence in Latin America and beyond has much to do with his supremacy in Venezuela.

With his new term and the slow demise of his hero Fidel Castro, who was too ill to attend his own 80th birthday celebrations in Havana over the weekend, Mr. Chávez may indeed solidify his place as the new the standard-bearer of the left in Latin America, where leftist candidates have won presidential elections in the last five weeks in Brazil, Ecuador, Nicaragua and Venezuela.

That left is indeed varied, and Mr. Chávez is not necessarily its most representative figure. But he is its most vocal one, especially when it comes to chiding President Bush.

Mr. Chávez's prominent position will continue to depend, of course, on the price of oil, the volatile commodity at the heart of Venezuela's economy. Those prices may remain high as the war in Iraq drags on and markets gaze nervously at the Middle East. Meanwhile, paradoxically, the United States remains the largest buyer of Venezuelan oil and has in effect helped to finance Mr. Chávez's ambitions.

"Chávez is getting stronger as an unintended consequence of war and globalization," said Kenneth Maxwell, a professor of Latin American history at Harvard.

Despite Venezuela's tight commercial embrace of the United States, the obstacles to improving relations may now loom larger.

Washington remains wary of Venezuela's warm ties to Cuba, Iran and Syria. The Bush and Chávez administrations hold different views on hemispheric integration, with United States wanting to expand it, based on the model of trade agreements like Nafta, and Venezuela promoting Latin America first, before further integration with the North American economies.

DOJ_NMG_0102551

"The chances for improvement are minimal for the remainder of the Bush administration," said Daniel Hellinger, a political scientist and an expert on Venezuela at Webster University in St. Louis. "More is involved here than the personal animosity between Bush and Chávez."

U.S.: We Can Work With Venezuela (AP)

AP, December 5, 2006

The Bush administration, long at odds with Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, greeted the populist leader's landslide re-election victory by holding out the possibility of a more cooperative relationship.

"We look forward to having the opportunity to work with the Venezuelan government on issues of mutual interest," State Department press officer Eric Watnik said Monday.

His brief comment did not offer congratulations to Chavez. Nor did it make direct reference to him or what it regards as the increasingly authoritarian course he has pursued.

Watnik noted that Tom Shannon, who heads the State Department's Latin America bureau, has praised the campaign run by Chavez's main opponent, Manuel Rosales.

"The opposition demonstrated its ability to put forth an important, peaceful and democratic campaign and it garnered a significant share of the vote," Watnik said.

He said reports of irregularities should be investigated.

"We look forward to hearing from the Organization of American States, the European Union and civil society groups that observed the electoral process," Watnik added.

The administration, he said, closely followed reports of intimidation and voter harassment during the campaign, including various instances of irregularities reported by the media.

On Friday, two days before the election, National Intelligence Director John Negroponte outlined U.S. concerns about Chavez in a wide-ranging speech at Harvard.

He said Chavez's "meddling in the domestic affairs of other states in the region — granting Colombia's FARC insurgents safe haven and other material support, for example — already has made him a divisive force."

He criticized Venezuela's attitude toward drug trafficking as "permissive," an allegation Venezuelan officials have denied.

Venezuela's growing ties to Iran and other states, such as North Korea, Syria, and Belarus, "clearly demonstrate a desire to build an anti-U.S. coalition that extends well beyond Latin America," Negroponte said.

The High Road To Caracas (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

Washington should heed Venezuela's opposition leader and greet Chavez's election victory with grace.

THERE ARE PLENTY of reasons for Venezuelans not to like Hugo Chavez. Crime, especially murder, has skyrocketed during his eight years as president. Corruption is ubiquitous — the country ranks No. 138 out of 163 on Transparency International's annual misgovernance index (the higher the number, the more corrupt the country is perceived to be). Democratic institutions have been subverted, foreign investors are jittery and Chavez's clownish anti-American rhetoric has made Venezuela a pariah in most Western countries, even if it has warmed the hearts of dictators everywhere.

None of that mattered Sunday, when Chavez was reelected with an impressive 61% of the vote. The source of Chavez's popularity is apparent: High oil prices have fueled 9% annual growth in Venezuela and allowed him to buy the loyalty of the poor by pumping oil revenue into social programs. Oil wealth also has given him free rein for socialist tinkering — such as seizing energy production facilities and increasing government control over the private sector — that has backfired in nearly every nation in which it's been tried.

Yet as long as the petrodollars pour in, Chavez will remain a daunting political force, and the impracticality of his economic policies will be rendered moot. And if he has his way, he may be in charge for a lot longer than six more years; he has promised to push through a constitutional reform ending term limits for Venezuela's president.

Not all the news was bad for the beleaguered opposition, led by the middle and upper classes. In the past, it has reacted badly to Chavez's political successes, including an attempted coup in 2002. These moves only made Chavez stronger by allowing him to paint his opponents as undemocratic. By gracefully conceding after the election results became clear, opposition candidate Manuel Rosales has assured that the coalition he patched together will continue to be a political player.

The U.S. should also take the high road. President Bush, a.k.a. "the devil" in Chavez's lexicon, should disappoint the Venezuelan leader by taking his win in stride. That means ratcheting down the anti-Chavez rhetoric and U.S. support for the opposition. The point is not to play into Chavez's narrative portraying the U.S. as an intolerant hegemonist. Chavez has shown himself to be his own worst enemy, capable of acting as much the bully as he portrays Bush to be.

Washington should try to improve bilateral ties not just because there is a long-term strategic value to cordial relations with this big oil producer. A goodwill effort to be reasonable toward Caracas will also undermine Chavez's own credibility when he tries to sell his Yankees-are-devils pitch to the rest of Latin America.

Now Is The Time To Engage With Hugo (FT)

Financial Times, December 5, 2006

On the face of it Hugo Chávez's decisive election victory in Sunday's election in Venezuela and his promises to radicalise what he calls "21st century socialism" might seem to present something of a problem for policymakers in Washington.

After all, the Venezuelan leader seems to go out of his way to make friends with US enemies and elections in Latin America during the past 12 months have shown that he has pull in the smaller and more economically vulnerable countries of the region.

Firm allies are now installed in Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua, which, alongside Cuba, are all likely to form part of the anti-US axis that Mr Chávez aspires to lead.

Yet, it is important not to exaggerate the Venezuelan leader's influence. This year's election round has also highlighted the limits of Mr Chávez's reach. Moderate candidates keen to work with Washington won elections in five of the six important countries. In two of those, Peru and Mexico, perceived association with Chavismo contributed to the defeat of left-wingers.

And at home, the re-elected leader faces significant obstacles as he looks to radicalise. True, a six-fold rise in the oil price has transformed Venezuela's economy in the eight years since Mr Chávez was first elected, allowing the government to spend heavily on social programmes and build up considerable financial reserves.

However, Venezuela's rapidly growing economy is not creating enough jobs nor making enough goods. A boom in liquidity and credit is adding to inflationary pressures.

Opinion polls, which forecast the election result and demonstrated the popularity of health and education programmes, also showed that government supporters are worried about the extent of corruption and crime.

And there are signs too that Mr Chávez may also face opposition from within his own ranks if he presses through a constitutional reform that would allow him to run for office yet again, remaining in power into the next decade and beyond.

Mr Chávez also faces a more effective opposition. Judging by the dignified way Manuel Rosales, the losing candidate, accepted defeat on Sunday night, he realises that building up a viable alternative is a long-term process.

Better then, for the US and its hemispheric friends to cease the rhetorical barrages against Mr Chávez that are such grist to his populist mill. After appearing to collude in the failed 2002 coup against his elected government, moreover, Washington has ground to make up. It should continue a recent more pragmatic approach, engaging Venezuela in areas such as oil, energy policy and border security.

None of this will be easy, but it will place the onus on Mr Chávez to deliver prosperity for his people and make it more difficult for him to hide behind a smokescreen of nationalist rhetoric.

Efforts To Aid Darfur Reach Dead End (AP)

By Alfred De Montesquiou

AP, December 5, 2006

Sudan's final rejection of a joint U.N.-African peacekeeping force in Darfur came as little surprise to many involved in failed international efforts to end the region's deadly violence.

But many say civilians will be the ones to bear the costs of that opposition — thousands more will die, they fear, and many more will be forced to flee their homes unless the West can somehow muster strong sanctions against Sudan's government.

"Khartoum will not stop the massive war crimes taking place in Darfur until it is forced to," said Tom Cargyll of Chatham House, a British think tank.

The U.N. compromise deal was announced last month by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan as a major diplomatic breakthrough to bring peace to Darfur — one that would allow him to keep his pledge to solve the Darfur crisis before he steps down as U.N. chief later this year.

Annan said Sudan had agreed in principle to a "hybrid mission" of some 20,000 peacekeepers — mostly from Africa — to deploy in Darfur under U.N. command to replace an overwhelmed AU force.

Yet within 24 hours, Sudan's foreign minister said there was a misunderstanding and that a "mixed operation" in Darfur did not mean a "mixed force."

That put Sudan back to its original stance: No U.N. peacekeeper could deploy in Darfur, but the U.N. was welcome to provide logistical and financial support.

"International troops are a colonization of Sudan," Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir later told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0102553

An African Union summit in Nigeria last week — which had been due to fine-tune the joint mission — instead was forced to yield to Sudanese pressure. It voted to prolong by another six months the stay of the underfunded and ill-equipped 7,000 AU peacekeepers.

Sudan's opposition is deeply rooted, some analysts say.

"Its entirely coherent with (Sudan's) pattern of behavior over the last 17 years," since al-Bashir came to power in a 1989 Islamist and military coup, said Colin Thomas-Jensen of the International Crisis Group, a U.S. think tank.

Several Sudanese government hard-liners are believed to be on a list of suspects that the International Criminal Court has said it would prosecute for crimes against humanity.

That could explain why Sudan adamantly refuses to let the U.N. into Darfur, even though 10,000 peacekeepers are already in the country's south on a separate mission, Cargyll said.

"Khartoum has much more to lose at Darfur being internationalized than any other country has to win," he said.

Thursday's AU summit in Abuja came as a bitter reminder of dashed hopes.

In the same city last May, the Sudanese government and a leading rebel group signed a deal meant to end three years of violence that have killed at least 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million. The deal has since largely collapsed, and Sudan's policy has since been to win time by appearing to negotiate, while pro-government militias rampage through Darfur on an ever-larger scale, analysts say. The Sudan's latest backtracking shows it will only yield to strong pressure, they say.

But al-Bashir and other Khartoum hard-liners have grown increasingly savvy at playing the rifts in international diplomacy, he said.

Sudan gained sympathy in the Arab world, for example, by comparing its confrontation with the West to the plight of Lebanon, Iraq and the Palestinians — which many Arabs see as victims of U.S. foreign policy.

More importantly, Sudan knows that Russia and China, two veto-yielding powers at the U.N. Security Council, oppose sanctions.

Previous U.N. sanctions against Sudan were lifted after it cooperated with U.S. counterterrorism efforts after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. U.S. sanctions were re-imposed in 1997 and recently strengthened, but such one-country measures have little effect in a globalized economy, analysts say.

More than 5 percent of China's oil imports come from Sudan, and Khartoum knows that its key Asian ally is unlikely to let it down if the Security Council considers an embargo, Cargyll said.

"Over the past four years, there has been no real cost imposed on the Sudanese government for what is happening in Darfur," Thomas-Jensen said.

The United States has given some indications it may take a more robust stance soon.

Andrew Natsios, the special envoy named by the White House, recently warned that if Khartoum did not accept an international solution by January, the U.S. and it allies would find an alternative.

Analysts say the new strategy could be targeted sanctions against Sudan's main oil companies, suspected to be owned by regime hard-liners. But Khartoum appears confident it will face no harsh measures, because too many countries now rely on its resources.

"Just when some countries gave us sanctions, God gave us oil," al-Bashir said last week.

'Hotel Rwanda' Hero Hasn't Fared Well Back Home Lately (WSJ)

By Christopher Rhoads

The Wall Street Journal, December 5, 2006

KIGALI, Rwanda -- Since the movie "Hotel Rwanda" was released two years ago, Paul Rusesabagina has become a hero in the U.S. In Rwanda, he is seen in a different light.

The film shows him saving hundreds of refugees from his country's genocide in 1994, as the manager of a Rwandan hotel. Mr. Rusesabagina was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom by George Bush. He has published his autobiography, "An Ordinary Man," and is currently on a U.S. speaking tour. There's talk he will enter Rwandan politics.

Back home, the Rwandan media, former refugees in the hotel and even the country's president in recent months have denounced Mr. Rusesabagina as an impostor profiting from the genocide. They say the Hollywood movie greatly exaggerated his role and distorted these sensitive events. The head of the country's genocide survivor association has called for criminal charges against him. A government adviser is interviewing more than 100 people who were in the hotel and intends to write a book on his findings.

Efforts to discredit Mr. Rusesabagina have taken some bizarre turns: His detractors used criticism from a supposed U.S. journalist who turned out to be a 12-year-old Arizona boy. Mr. Rusesabagina says an attempt was made on his life on a highway in Belgium and that agents of the Rwandan government tried to disrupt a speech he made recently at a school in Ohio.

"I never expected to be in the public as I am," says the 52-year-old Mr. Rusesabagina, who has declined invitations to return to Rwanda because he fears for his life. In his travels to speaking engagements in the U.S., he rides with police escorts.

Twelve years after genocide orchestrated by a Rwandan government led by the majority Hutus killed more than 800,000 minority Tutsis and some moderate Hutus in just 100 days, tensions in Rwanda are rising again -- this time over the writing of history. Once again, Mr. Rusesabagina finds himself at the center of it.

Mr. Rusesabagina's case comes as anti-French protests sprang up in the capital Kigali in recent days, after a judge in France charged associates of President Paul Kagame with downing the presidential plane in 1994. The event set the genocide in motion. In response to the judge's action, Rwanda last month severed diplomatic relations with France. President Kagame, the Tutsi military leader whose rebel forces ended the genocide, says radical Hutus shot down the plane.

France supported the Hutu government in the civil war with the Tutsis, but France denies any involvement in the genocide.

Mr. Rusesabagina's father was Hutu, his mother Tutsi. By Rwandan custom, that made him a Hutu. He worked his way up from receptionist at the Hotel des Mille Collines, the meeting place for the country's elite here in Kigali. He later became manager of a sister hotel up the road.

After the bloodshed began on April 6, 1994, he was asked to oversee both hotels. Over the next two months, the Mille Collines became a sanctuary for Tutsis and some moderate Hutus, including prominent politicians and a handful of United Nations personnel. The Mille Collines was one of the few gathering places where nobody was killed. The film depicts Mr. Rusesabagina saving the refugees by plying the militants with bribes, including fine alcohol, and by calling on his extensive network of contacts.

Mr. Rusesabagina subsequently moved with his family to Brussels, where he was driving a taxi when his life took another turn.

In 1999, Keir Pearson, fresh out of New York University film school, heard about what happened at the hotel from a friend living in Tanzania and got in touch with Mr. Rusesabagina. He thought the story was so compelling that he turned it into a screenplay. The film, directed by Terry George, won several film prizes and three Academy Award nominations.

In May 2005, Mr. George watched the movie in Rwanda with most of the Rwandan parliament and President Kagame. The president thanked Mr. George for making the world aware at last of what had happened in the country, Mr. George says.

Then, in the fall of 2005, as Mr. Rusesabagina's fame grew in the U.S., he began criticizing the Rwandan government for limiting political opposition, controlling the media and having only a few token Hutus in cabinet positions.

Around that time, the attacks against him began. Rwanda's New Times newspaper called him, among other things, a "dirty political animal." After Mr. Rusesabagina was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom in November 2005, an editorial declared he had "sold the soul of the Rwandan genocide to amass medals."

At a public ceremony in Rwanda last February, Mr. Kagame weighed in, saying, "Film stars have no place on the list of our national heroes." During a visit to Washington in June, Mr. Kagame dismissed Mr. Rusesabagina as someone who just happened to be in the hotel at the time. "Someone is trying to rewrite the history of Rwanda, and we cannot accept it," he said.

Mr. Rusesabagina was beginning to get scared. He says that in Belgium at about that time, a car driven by several Africans tried to run his car into a truck. He escaped with minor bruises and cuts, he says.

To buttress its condemnation of Mr. Rusesabagina, the New Times in one article quoted someone identified as an American reporter named Richard Cesare saying, "None of his actions made him a hero even in the eyes of Americans." Mr. Cesare later in the article dismissed the Medal of Freedom as no big deal.

It turns out Mr. Cesare is, in fact, a 12-year-old from Sahuarita, Ariz., who had contacted the New Times for help with a history paper he was writing on Mr. Rusesabagina.

"We were laughing so hard when we saw this article," says Lea Cesare, Richard's mother. "He was just a kid doing a homework assignment." Ms. Cesare says her son was in contact for months with several reporters and editors at the New Times who were well aware of his age. The New Times did not respond to requests for comment.

In an interview in his Kigali office, President Kagame said his concern is to set the record straight. He said he believes the hotel was spared, in part, because Hutu militants wanted to use the refugees there to exchange for hostages held by the Tutsi rebel forces. He says he also believes Mr. Rusesabagina is being used by "subterranean forces trying to pull back what we are trying to move forward."

One evening recently after speaking to about 150 college students in Providence, R.I., Mr. Rusesabagina acknowledged the income from his new fame has allowed him to quit his other jobs and put two of his children in private schools in Massachusetts.

He said he believes the attacks on him come from people worried that he will turn his celebrity into a credible opposition and run for president somewhere down the road. "I haven't made a decision yet," he said. "But you never know."

Cuba's Future Is Already Here (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, December 5, 2006

Fiercely implacable exiles in Miami, perennially outfoxed bureaucrats in Washington and salivating real estate developers around the world have spent years trying to predict what will happen in Cuba the day after Fidel Castro dies. Now I think everyone knows the answer: nada.

That chuckling you hear is Fidel, in his hospital room, having the last laugh.

The 80-year-old revolutionary icon, evidently at death's door, appears to have engineered a seamless transition to the post-Fidel era. Brother Ra?l presided over last week's 50th-anniversary shindig with none of Fidel's charisma but all of his authority. If any lingering doubts about the de facto succession needed to be dispelled, Havana's biggest military parade in years on Saturday reminded everyone that Ra?l has been running the Cuban armed forces since Day One.

Fidel's absence from the festivities marking the 50th anniversary of the Cuban revolution pretty much ended any uncertainty about his health. Government officials say he's recovering like a champ and will be back on the job any day, and they sound so sincerely optimistic that you could almost look past the images of a gaunt, frail old man that were released a few weeks ago. But I doubt that anything except the looming hand of death could have kept Fidel Castro away from a cheering, flag-waving crowd of millions -- Fidel's people, filling the vast plaza named for Fidel's revolution, hoping for a last glimpse of the only leader most Cubans have ever known.

We have to assume that Fidel is not long for this world. We also have to assume that a day, a month or even a year after he dies, Cuba will be essentially unaltered.

A year isn't forever, and some kind of change will eventually come. But the Bush administration has been even more idiotic than its predecessors in its policies toward Cuba, which means that the United States is perfectly positioned to have little or no influence over what kind of Cuba finally evolves.

About all this administration can do is make things worse. Julia E. Sweig of the Council on Foreign Relations, a leading Cuba expert, writes in the current issue of the journal Foreign Affairs that by "continuing the current course and making threats about what kind of change is and is not acceptable after Fidel, Washington will only slow the pace of liberalization and political reform in Cuba and guarantee many more years of hostility between the two countries."

In the article, Sweig points out what any visitor to Cuba who is not wearing ideological blinkers quickly realizes: that the Cuban government's hold on power does not derive from repression alone. In my visits to the island, I've been struck by how Cubans can be bitterly critical of the hard-line restrictions the regime imposes on speech, assembly, movement, commerce and other activities, and in the next breath speak with pride of the government's achievements in providing free health care and education.

In Washington and Miami, the prediction was that when the Soviet Union and the East Bloc dissolved, Fidel Castro's regime would soon follow. But Ra?l Castro and a group of pragmatic-minded young officials -- basically, the people who are running the country now -- opened the spigot and allowed just enough economic reform to keep the place going. Now, with Ra?l's armed forces functioning essentially as the island's biggest business conglomerate, and with Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez shipping his mentor Fidel all the oil he needs, the government seems increasingly secure.

That security hardly looks permanent. Many Cubans are indeed restless for change. There are focal points around which a kind of civil society has started to coalesce -- the black-market economy, the Catholic Church, the Afro-Cuban faiths, the arts -- and the government has had little success in co-opting these independent movements.

Ra?l Castro is 75, so his time in the driver's seat will be brief. Maybe he will try to move Cuba toward the Chinese model of continued one-party rule in exchange for free-market liberalization of the economy -- something Fidel would never abide. Lacking his older brother's presence and oratorical skills, maybe Ra?l will have to be oppressively heavy-handed in using the army he built to maintain order.

For now, though, the Cuban regime has accomplished something that the Bush administration had pledged to thwart: an uneventful transition that leaves the Cuban Communist Party still comfortably in charge. The handover of power took place in August, when Fidel's illness was announced and power was transferred "temporarily" to Ra?l and other party leaders.

Fidel's revolution won't survive forever -- the tide of history is flowing in the opposite direction. But surely it will survive the old man's death.

Islam Gets Concessions; Infidels Get Conquered (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 5, 2006

What they capture, they keep. When they lose, they complain to the U.N.

IN THE DAYS before Pope Benedict XVI's visit last Thursday to the Hagia Sophia complex in Istanbul, Muslims and Turks expressed fear, apprehension and rage. "The risk," according to Turkey's independent newspaper Vatan, "is that Benedict will send Turkey's Muslims and much of the Islamic world into paroxysms of fury if there is any perception that the pope is trying to re-appropriate a Christian center that fell to Muslims." Apparently making the sign of the cross or any other gesture of Christian worship in Hagia Sophia constitutes such a sacrilege.

Built in the 6th century, Hagia Sophia — Greek for "Holy Wisdom" — was Christendom's greatest and most celebrated church. After parrying centuries of jihadi thrusts from Arabs, Constantinople — now Istanbul — was finally sacked by Turks in 1453, and Hagia Sophia's crosses were desecrated, its icons defaced. Along with thousands of other churches in the Byzantine Empire, it was immediately converted into a mosque, the tall minarets of Islam surrounding it in triumph. Nearly 500 years later, in 1935, as part of reformer Kemal Ataturk's drive to modernize Turkey, Hagia Sophia was secularized and transformed into a museum.

Protests aimed at keeping the pope out of Hagia Sophia rocked Istanbul right up to the morning of his visit to the site. Contrast that intolerance with the tolerance granted Muslims in regard to the Al Aqsa mosque — this time, an Islamic site in Jerusalem annexed by Judaism. Unlike the permanent Muslim desecration of Hagia Sophia, after Israel's victory in the 1967 war, the Jews did not deface or convert the mosque into a Jewish synagogue or temple, even though the Al Aqsa mosque is deliberately built atop the remains of the Temple Mount, the holiest site of Judaism and, by extension, an important site for Christians. Moreover, since reclaiming the Temple Mount, Israel has granted Muslims control over the Al Aqsa mosque (except during times of crises).

All this illustrates the privileged status that many Muslims expect in the international arena. When Muslims conquer non-Muslim territories — such as Constantinople, not to mention all of North Africa, Spain and southwest Asia — those whom they have conquered as well as their descendants are not to expect any apologies, let alone political or territorial concessions.

Herein lies the conundrum. When Islamists wage jihad — past, present and future — conquering and consolidating non-Muslim territories and centers in the name of Islam, never once considering to cede them back to their previous owners, they ultimately demonstrate that they live by the age-old adage "might makes right." That's fine; many people agree with this Hobbesian view.

But if we live in a world where the strong rule and the weak submit, why is it that whenever Muslim regions are conquered, such as in the case of Palestine, the same Islamists who would never concede one inch of Islam's conquests resort to the United Nations and the court of public opinion, demanding justice, restitutions, rights and so forth?

Put another way, when Muslims beat infidels, it's just too bad for the latter; they must submit to their new overlords' rules with all the attendant discrimination and humiliation mandated for non-Muslims. Yet when Islam is beaten, demands for apologies and concessions are expected from the infidel world at large.

Double standards do not make for international justice. Either territorial conquests are always unjust and should therefore be ameliorated through concessions, or else they are merely a manifestation of the natural order of things — that is, survival of the fittest.

If some Muslims wish to wage eternal jihad until Islam dominates the globe, they are only being true to Islam and its doctrines as they understand it. However, in that case, where the world is divided into two warring camps, Islam and Infidelity — or, in Islamic terms, the Abode of Islam and the Abode of War — how can these Muslims expect any concessions from the international community? The natural conclusion of the view that "might makes right" is "to the victor go the spoils."

The fact that Turkey conquered Constantinople more than 500 years ago does not prevent the Turkish government from returning Hagia Sophia to Christendom today, which would undoubtedly be a great gesture. But of course that can never be. The Muslim world would undergo a "paroxysm of fury" if a Christian pope dares pray in the conquered church; what would the Muslim world do if Hagia Sophia were actually converted back to a church?

But perhaps Muslims cannot be blamed for expecting special treatment, as well as believing that jihad is righteous and decreed by the Almighty. The West constantly goes out of its way to confirm such convictions. By criticizing itself, apologizing and offering concessions — all things the Islamic world has yet to do — the West reaffirms that Islam has a privileged status in the world.

And what did the pope do in his controversial visit to Hagia Sophia? He refrained from any gesture that could be misconstrued as Christian worship and merely took in the sights of the museum. Moreover, when he was invited into the Blue Mosque nearby, he respectfully took off his shoes and prayed, eyes downcast, standing next to the the grand mufti of Istanbul like a true dhimmi — a subdued non-Muslim living under Islamic law and acknowledging Islamic superiority.

DOJ_NMG_0102557

And therein is the final lesson. Muslims' zeal for their holy places and lands is not intrinsically blameworthy. Indeed, there's something to be said about being passionate and protective of one's own. Here the secular West — Christendom's prodigal son and true usurper — can learn something from Islam. For whenever and wherever the West concedes ideologically, politically and especially spiritually, Islam will be sure to conquer. If might does not make right, zeal apparently does.

US Justice Department says secrecy needs bar surveillance suit

By DAVID N. GOODMAN

Associated Press Writer

DETROIT_The Bush administration asked a federal appeals court to toss out a lawsuit challenging a warrantless surveillance program, saying the government cannot defend itself without revealing national secrets.

The Bush administration secretly launched the surveillance program in 2001. It monitors international phone calls and e-mails to or from the United States involving people suspected by the government of having terrorist links.

The American Civil Liberties Union sued the National Security Agency in January on behalf of journalists, scholars and lawyers who say the surveillance has made it difficult for them to do their jobs because they believe many of their overseas contacts are likely targets.

U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ruled in August that the program violates the rights to free speech and privacy and the separation of powers.

The Justice Department appealed to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati, which ruled that the administration could keep the program in place during the appeal.

"This suit must be dismissed because its very subject matter is a state secret, and litigation would inevitably result in disclosing state secrets," Justice Department lawyers wrote in a brief filed Monday.

A secret court was established in the late 1970s to grant warrants for such surveillance, but the Justice Department said it cannot always wait for a court to act.

Bush and his advisers "have determined that the current threat to the United States demands that signals intelligence be carried out with a speed and methodology that cannot be achieved by seeking judicial approval" through traditional channels, Monday's brief said.

The journalists and other plaintiffs lack standing to sue because secrecy considerations mean that "they cannot show, and the government cannot dispute, that the government has intercepted or likely will intercept their communications," the government brief said.

It a brief filed Nov. 14, the ACLU said that the Bush administration's "sweeping theory of executive power would allow the president to violate any law passed by Congress."

"This theory presents a profound threat to our democratic system," it said.

The 6th Circuit Court of Appeals has set a Dec. 18 deadline for other interested groups to file their own briefs in the case.

In a related case, a Michigan judge last week refused to halt the ACLU's complaint that accuses AT&T Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc. of giving the NSA private phone call information.

The ACLU asked the Michigan Public Service Commission in July to determine whether the phone companies violated customers' privacy rights.

Administrative Law Judge Mark D. Eyster on Friday rejected the phone companies' contention that the state secrets doctrine requires dismissal of the complaint. "Only the federal government may claim the state secrets privilege," he wrote.

Verizon spokesman Bill Kula said Monday that the company continues to believe that the case is without merit.

AT&T spokeswoman Melissa Oakley said, "We respect our customers' right to privacy, and beyond that we do not comment on matters of national security."

Lawyers Sue for 5 Detainees' Freedom, Alleging U.S. China Deal-Making

By Josh White

WASHINGTON _ Lawyers for a group of Chinese Muslims held for nearly five years in the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, filed suit Monday, asking that the men be released immediately and alleging that they have been held as part of a political deal between the United States and China.

Citing new laws that allow detainees to challenge their status as ``enemy combatants,'' the lawyers argue that their seven clients, ethnic Uighurs (pronounced wee-gurs), have never taken up arms against the United States or its allies. They contend the men have been labeled wrongfully as terrorist suspects because they oppose the communist Chinese government.

In a 58-page filing in the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, the lawyers argue that the Uighurs have been held since early 2002 as a way to win Chinese acquiescence for the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

The lawyers, Sabin Willett and Susan Baker Manning, allege in the court documents that their clients' detention in Guantanamo was one of several demands the Chinese government solicited in mid-2002 as the U.S. was seeking global support for its plan to topple Saddam Hussein.

U.S. officials labeled the East Turkistan Islamic Movement (ETIM) _ a group that includes Uighur separatists who want their own nation in western China _ a terrorist organization in August 2002 after diplomatic discussions with China about Iraq, the lawyers allege.

``In the crisis atmosphere of the time, the interests of a few dozen refugees paled beside the urgency of the Administration's war plans,'' the lawsuit says. ``The Iraq deal sealed the fate of the seven petitioners here. More than four years have passed. Long-discarded pawns in a diplomatic match between superpowers, petitioners today remain illegally imprisoned at Guantanamo.''

Former State Department officials acknowledged in interviews that they negotiated with China about placing ETIM and another group on a list of known terrorist organizations, and that ETIM was added after intelligence reports indicated the group had killed innocent people. The officials said, however, that labeling the group as terrorists had no effect on Uighurs already in U.S. custody, who were believed to be cooperating with the Taliban and al-Qaida near Tora Bora, Afghanistan.

Then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage met with Chinese officials in Beijing in late August 2002 and discussed the Iraq situation with them. He said at the time that ETIM was placed on the foreign terrorist list after months of discussions with China. He also said he made clear that China needed to respect the minority Uighur population.

``They had been after us to put ETIM on the list,'' Armitage said in a recent interview. He said the decision did not have anything to do with winning China's tacit approval on the Iraq invasion. ``But at the time, we didn't know when we were going to invade Iraq. It was done in response to information gathered by the intelligence group.''

The Uighurs have been a diplomatic headache for the United States. U.S. officials working to negotiate the release of five other Uighurs held at Guantanamo who were determined not to be a threat to U.S.

interests refused to return them to China out of concern they could be tortured or killed. More than two dozen countries declined requests to take them in, and the United States has been unwilling to allow them to come here.

Earlier this year, those five Uighurs were released to a U.N. compound in Albania, where they remain virtual prisoners.

Pierre-Richard Prosper, who formerly led U.S. negotiations with other countries over Guantanamo detainees, said that China wanted custody of the Uighurs, but the United States staved off Beijing because of human rights concerns. ``We tried for many months to reach an understanding with China regarding the fate of the Uighurs and were unable to do so,'' Prosper said.

More than a dozen Uighurs are still in Guantanamo. U.S. officials have determined them to be enemy combatants because of their participation in an alleged terrorist training camp in Afghanistan, which all fled when the United States started bombing the area after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The Uighurs have told military court officials they were not allied with the Taliban and are sympathetic to the United States, which they view as a liberator. They said they were living in a small community in Afghanistan after fleeing oppression in China.

According to military tribunal records and court filings, the men were lured to a mosque in Pakistan, where they were arrested and later turned over to Pakistani authorities. Willett said he believes the men were sold to the United States for sizable bounties and were sent to Guantanamo along with many other detainees\l "I" captured there.

The lawyers challenge the way the Uighurs were determined to be enemy combatants, arguing that their encampment in Afghanistan did not make them a party to hostilities. The Uighurs have said the United States allowed a Chinese delegation to visit and interrogate them after their capture, and that the Chinese agents threatened them. A U.S. official confirmed that the Chinese were allowed to question the Uighurs.

``It is amazing to me that the U.S. has agreed to, in effect, hold political prisoners for China in exchange for anything,'' Manning said. ``That goes against everything that we, I thought, stood for in this country.''

RCMP commissioner admits inaccuracy over Arar testimony

OTTAWA (CP) - The embattled RCMP commissioner has admitted he was inaccurate when testifying to a Commons committee about the Maher Arar affair in September, but he has steadfastly refused to offer his resignation.

Giuliano Zaccardelli says he wants to "set the record straight" about what he knew and when he knew it in the case of Arar's deportation to Syria as a suspected al Qaida agent.

For the first time, Zaccardelli said the national police force alerted U.S. authorities that it had no evidence to support allegations against Arar before they deported him to his homeland, where he was tortured into false confessions of involvement in terrorism.

Zaccardelli initially told the committee he got involved before Arar was detained, but on Monday he said he learned far more about the Mounties involvement after report on the incident was issued this fall.

He told the all-party committee U.S. authorities were informed that the RCMP had no reason to detain, charge or prevent Arar from returning to Canada. But he admitted mistakes were made in the process and key information was not known by senior Mounties until after the O'Connor report was issued.

Zaccardelli told the panel that purposely withholding information or misrepresenting facts is a "cardinal sin," and he added that if he had done so no one would have to ask for his resignation.

Wyo man sues BLM workers under racketeering law

By BEN NEARY
Associated Press writer

CHEYENNE -- The U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to decide some issues from a case in which a Wyoming rancher charges that employees of the U.S. Bureau of Land Management stripped him of his federal land grazing permits because he refused to give the agency easements over his land.

The Supreme Court on Friday announced it will consider the case, which centers on whether BLM officials can be sued personally under federal racketeering law for their official actions.

Thermopolis rancher Harvey Frank Robbins maintains that BLM workers pulled his grazing permits and otherwise persecuted him to try to get him to give the government road access.

Although Robbins sued the BLM employees personally, the U.S. Department of Justice is representing them. Kathleen Blomquist, spokesman for the department, said her office had no comment on the case, but federal officials previously have said that Robbins' grazing permits were revoked because of repeated grazing violations.

Robbins' case itself is still pending in U.S. District Court in Wyoming. The issue of whether federal employees are immune from lawsuits under the racketeering law was first appealed to 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver. When that court sided with Robbins, government lawyers appealed that issue to the Supreme Court.

Cheyenne lawyer Karen Budd-Falen, who represents Robbins, said she has never argued a case before the U.S. Supreme Court in her career.

"I am very excited, and very nervous -- especially a case that I believe is going to define private property rights vis-a-vis the federal government," Budd-Falen said.

Because the courts have not addressed a similar situation previously, she said, lawyers on both sides will be left arguing about Congress' original intent.

Budd-Falen said the court has placed the matter on a fast-track schedule, with all briefs due by Feb. 15. She said the case has been pending for seven years, longer than cases usually take.

"The Supreme Court could say that government employees are protected by sovereign immunity, which means that you can't sue them, period," Budd-Falen said. However, she said that if the court rules for Robbins, trial would proceed in Wyoming.

Budd-Falen said the Supreme Court will also consider whether citizens enjoy a constitutional right to be free from retaliation from government employees if they exclude the government from their property.

Budd-Falen said the government argues that the federal employees shouldn't be sued even if they violated or conspired to violate Robbins' property rights because the government, and not the employees themselves, stood to gain by the action.

Budd-Falen said the government maintains that it was acting like any other neighboring property owner in asking Robbins for easements over his land. But she said Robbins maintains that the government must use its power of eminent domain to obtain any easement, and must pay for whatever it gets.

In 2003, the BLM and Robbins entered an agreement under which he would not be punished for 16 alleged grazing violations. The BLM said it revoked the agreement because Robbins had violated the permits again.

The 2003 agreement had prompted complaints from conservation and watchdog groups. The inspector general of the Department of Interior, which oversees the BLM, concluded in February 2005 that the settlement negotiations circumvented normal processes and were completed without appropriate input from agency officials, and that the interests of the BLM "were not adequately protected."

While Robbins' lawsuit under the federal racketeering law is still alive, the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals -- in a separate case -- agreed with U.S. District Judge Alan Johnson of Wyoming that Robbins' right to due process was not violated by the BLM's decision to revoke his grazing permits.

Supreme Court to decide if Madison atheist group can sue Bush

Shamane Mills, Wisconsin Public Radio

The U.S. Supreme Court will decide whether Madison's Freedom from Religion Foundation can sue the White House, for using tax money on faith-based programs.

Annie Laurie Gaylor, representative from the foundation, says the suit challenges the existence of President Bush's Office of Faith-Based Initiatives.

She says it's not right for the group to hold taxpayer-funded conferences, where churches can learn how to get money from the government.

Religion is supposed to be kept out of the service programs themselves.

Gaylor says the conferences are more like prayer sessions and it all adds up to an unconstitutional preference for religion by the folks at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave.

The Supreme Court will not consider the merits of the case, only whether folks like Gaylor can sue.

Judges question FMCSA's numbers in hours rule

By Avery Vise

An attorney representing the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration's latest hours of service regulations Dec. 4 found himself defending the statistical models the agency relied on for guidance in its redrafting the rules.

Matthew Colette, a Justice Department lawyer representing FMCSA, also faced questions from a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit regarding the impact of the rules on the industry and public.

FMCSA is fighting separate lawsuits filed by the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association and safety advocacy group Public Citizen over the August 2005 revisions to the rules that took effect in January 2004. The D.C. circuit appeals court in July 2004 had invalidated those rules. On Dec. 4, a three-judge panel –- different from the one that ruled in 2004 –- heard arguments from OOIDA, Public Citizen and FMCSA.

Paul Cullen, Jr., an attorney representing OOIDA, urged the court to send FMCSA "back to the drawing board" to reconsider the rule in three areas:

The decision not to allow breaks during the work day to stop the 14-hour clock. OOIDA has found that delivery schedules force many drivers to complete their work days without taking a break, Cullen told the judges. That's the type of impact on driver health the court expressed worries about in 2004, Cullen said. In a member survey, OOIDA found that 60 percent said they avoid taking breaks during the 14-hour window.
The increased minimum consecutive hours in sleepers to satisfy mandatory rest. "The sleeper berth issue has caused the most concern," especially for team drivers, Cullen told the court. He also faulted FMCSA's procedural conduct in adopting the change even though the notice of proposed rulemaking didn't specifically propose it. "We do not believe FMCSA gave proper notice," Cullen said. "Either they would have to do a two-step rulemaking –- and they had plenty of time to do that –- or they would have had to better define the problem they were seeking to address."
The effect of loading and unloading on driver fatigue, particularly extensive waiting times that force drivers to push harder once they can get on the road.

Public Citizen argued that FMCSA's statistical models in the "virtually identical" new rule gave short shrift to the effects of "time on task" –- in other words, time spent working and driving –- even though the court in 2004 criticized the agency for precisely this approach. "The model only cares about sleep," said Bonnie Robin-Vergeer, an attorney for Public Citizen. "It's irrelevant how much work you are doing."

But time on task matters, Robin-Vergeer said. "We have extensive evidence about the sharp increase in crash risk after 8 hours of driving."

"The 34-hour restart is the most pernicious provision in the new rule," Robin-Vergeer told the appeals court. The rule allows substantially more hours driving in a week, contributing to higher cumulative fatigue and less off-duty time, Public Citizen charges. Various surveys have shown that a significant number of drivers are pushing the limits by taking only the 34-hour minimum, she said.

Public Citizen also faults FMCSA for simultaneously downplaying in the preamble to the rule the likelihood that drivers would use the 34-hour restart to maximize driving hours and playing up, in the regulatory impact analysis (RIA) accompanying the rule, the productivity gains from the restart.

Colette defended FMCSA's position that the science shows that "length of wakefulness is a bigger factor in fatigue than time on task" and disagreed with Public Citizen that there is an inconsistency between the preamble and the RIA. FMCSA used the same estimates and assumptions in analyzing both crash risk and productivity, he said.

The government attorney also stood by FMCSA's analysis of the 34-hour restart and how drivers are using it in practice. "They are not necessarily using it to drive a massive number of hours," Colette told the three-judge panel. "Rather, we believe they are using it to spend more time at home." In any case, the number of hours driving per week is not as significant as reducing fatigue on a daily basis, he said.

Judges on the panel seemed less interested in how the rule has worked in practice than in how FMCSA justified the rule from the standpoint of safety and economic impact.

Judge Merrick Garland, for example, questioned Colette on the methodology of FMCSA's analysis of how increased consecutive hours of driving affected crash risk. Unsatisfied with Colette's responses, Garland chided the government attorney. "You're not a statistician. This is a debate among statisticians."

Colette stood by FMCSA. "Where we are statistically is within the realm of reasonableness." But Garland responded that the analysis must be not only reasonable but also fairly transparent, noting that the appeals court has declared numerous times that the court can't evaluate a model if the agency doesn't expose it in the notice of proposed rulemaking.

Chief Judge Douglas Ginsburg raised similar concerns, noting that the RIA doesn't break down the components of the regulatory impact it projects. He asked, "How do the petitioners know it's a sound number?" It's difficult for parties to respond to FMCSA's projections, the judge said, if the agency doesn't disclose how the agency arrived at them. "Any number of times we have said, 'Show your work.'"

The appeals court panel is expected to issue its ruling in the next two or three months.

Editorial: District judge unable to see the big picture

Last week a federal judge ruled that the U.S. Treasury must start redesigning its paper currency so that each denomination could be readily identifiable by blind people. The ruling comes four years after the American Council of the Blind filed a lawsuit claiming the current bills discriminate against them.

U.S. District Court Judge James Robinson ordered the Treasury Department to think about changing the color and size of all paper currency and adding other tactile differences so the blind can better ensure they are not being ripped off by unscrupulous cashiers.

Is this a big enough problem for the blind to impose hundreds of millions of new costs on society?

According to Judge Robinson, changing the size of the bills and other modifications would "only" cost the federal government around $200 million dollars every 10 years.

Only?

But what he doesn't seem to take into account is the non-governmental costs, like to the vending industry.

There are 7 million food and beverage machines and millions more video games in the U.S. that accept both $1 and $5 bills. To retrofit those machines to accept new currencies those industries would have to spend $200 to $300 per machine.

As one owner of a food service company that uses vending machines said, "I couldn't afford to spend $300 per machine. I simply would not be able to do it."

Besides, not even all advocates for the blind agree this is a good idea.

The National Federation of the Blind says this is a solution in search of a problem.

"In reality, blind people do not routinely find that we have been short-charged," says NFB President Dr. Mark Mauer.

All sorts of machines, vending and others, Mauer says, are readily available to identify paper money for blind people who run businesses or handle large amounts of cash.

"Essentially, the United States Treasury has been ordered by the courts to come up with a solution for a nonexistent problem," Mauer said.

It is interesting to note how the NFB and ACB take different approaches to advocating for the blind.

One stresses the importance of urging society to make changes to better accommodate the blind. While the other believes that with training and opportunity the blind can not only function well, but also compete in the world.

Mauer says such lawsuits promote the view that "the blind must be made objects of care and pity rather than equal participants in society."

Many blind people readily and routinely learn how to differentiate between their own bills (often by folding different denominations in different ways). As for the risk of their getting ripped off by sleazy cashiers or small business owners, it is low indeed. And the public scorn that ripping off the handicapped brings is enough to keep it to a minimum.

Add up all the money short-changed from blind people in the last 10 years and it probably wouldn't amount to 1/1,000,000th of what it would cost to prevent the problem.

The most annoying thing about Judge Robinson's decision is that he chose to make it at all.

Such decisions are more properly left to government policymakers.

Obviously, such changes have been considered for years, but rejected because those in charge decided the costs involved outweighed the suggested benefits to a small minority that is itself split on the issue.

In this case, what makes Judge Robinson think he's more qualified to decide this matter than the professionals at the Mint and Treasury?

He gave the government 10 days to appeal his decision.

It should.

Today's Events In Washington 53

TERRORISM NEWS:

NYU Study Finds Fault With Federal Anti-Terror Efforts. The New York Daily News (12/6, Meek) reports, "Federal authorities' strategy of arresting terror suspects on any charge possible has proved effective in thwarting attacks, but too often prosecutors have inflated the importance of the busts, a new study says. … 'The strategy of disruption has worked, but they hyped these cases to be more than what they seemed,' said Karen Greenberg, author of the study by New York University's Center of Law and Security. .. 'It leaves their record of prosecuting the war on terror unconvincing,' she said yesterday." The News continues, "Of 510 cases since the Sept. 11 attacks that the government said were terrorism-related, only 30% of the defendants were actually prosecuted on a terrorism charge, the NYU study found. Most of the others faced charges such as fraud, racketeering or conspiracy. … While 169 cases are still pending, only four people charged since the 2001 attacks were convicted for trying to commit an act of terrorism, the study said." The News adds, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the report 'reflects the underlying premise of our strategy to prevent and disrupt terrorists before they can carry out what they may be conspiring to do, by using any and all tools at our disposal in the U.S. code.' … Terror prosecutions have declined from a spike in the three months following the 9/11 attacks, when 116 people were indicted. Only 57 have been indicted in 2006. … The NYU study found that only 14% of the defendants were tied to Al Qaeda. Of the 510 defendants, more than half had 'no known affiliation' with any terrorist group. … Justice officials said that suggests homegrown terror is a bigger threat than many realize."

Critics Question Power Of Privacy Board. The AP (12/6, Yen) reports, "Civil liberties advocates urged a

White House privacy board Tuesday to review aggressively the government's warrantless surveillance program, even as they questioned whether it has the power to do so." The AP continues, "The Privacy and Civil Liberties Board, created in late 2004 after a recommendation by the Sept. 11 commission, held its first hearing with testimony from nongovernment experts on ways to protect Americans' rights during the war on terror. … Its five members, who left the agenda open, repeatedly found themselves under scrutiny. … 'This board needs to bring a little sunshine,' said Caroline Frederickson, director of the ACLU's Washington legislative office. She said she was disappointed panel members recently praised the surveillance program's safeguards that a federal judge initially ruled as illegal. … 'It remains clear that this program was built outside of, and in direct contradiction to, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and Fourth Amendment guaranteed protections,' she said. 'This panel's integrity and usefulness will be questioned if it dodges its duty to undertake a full review.'" The AP adds, 'Board members defended their role, saying that as an advisory panel to the president it was not their job to determine whether the eavesdropping program was illegal but to find ways - in consultation with Congress and Bush - to improve it. … 'Congress put us in the office of the president,' said former Clinton White House counsel Lanny Davis, the panel's lone Democrat, after several audience members unsuccessfully asked the panel to divulge what specific issues it has raised with the White House."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Schmitt) reports, "The four-member Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board was urged to take a more aggressive tack in checking the power of the Bush administration in its handling of the war on terrorism. Witnesses cited concerns over such policies as the National Security Agency's warrantless electronic surveillance program and an error-plagued terrorist watch list that has ensnared innocent citizens." The Times adds, "Created by Congress in response to a recommendation by the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission, the panel was conceived as a way to ensure the administration considers implications on privacy and civil liberties when implementing 'all laws, regulations and executive branch policies.' In practice, though, its power is limited by the fact that its members are appointed by the president, whose policies they are supposed to scrutinize. … Its authority is also likely to change next month when Democrats take control of Congress. Some Democrats have proposed making the panel independent of the White House, with the power to subpoena witnesses and documents. Others have suggested that its influence could wane if Democrats take over one of the reasons for its existence — aggressive oversight of administration policies. … But board members said at the hearing that they were taking their job seriously. They have received classified briefings on the secret surveillance program and a separate program that monitored international bank data, and were also briefed on legislation to put new limits on the surveillance program. … 'This program today is an exceedingly important part of our mission to hear these points of view, and we have a great deal to learn in order to perform our statutory responsibility,' panel member Theodore B. Olson, Bush's first solicitor general, said at the hearing. In recent months, he said, the board has met with senior officials of the Justice Department, the National Intelligence office and the National Security Agency, among others."

The Washington Post (12/6, A11, Nakashima, 690K) reports, "James Dempsey, a member of a Markle Foundation task force on privacy, said the guidelines lack substance and specificity. They do not address data-collection standards or set up appropriate redress mechanisms for people erroneously targeted in counterterrorism programs, he said." The Post adds, "Caroline Frederickson, legislative director of the American Civil Liberties Union, said the board lacked any power to change policies on crucial issues such as citizen redress on terrorist and criminal watch lists. … Frederickson called on Congress to give the board subpoena power and remove it from the executive branch."

CNET News (12/5, Broache) reports, "In a stately, wood-paneled hall at Georgetown University, a seemingly phantom White House panel charged with overseeing privacy and civil liberties issues made its public debut on Tuesday. But it didn't quite receive the warm welcome it may have liked. … At its first open meeting since it was conceived two years ago, the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board heard more than three hours of tips for future action--and not all of it gentle--from advocacy groups, think tanks and academics of various political stripes." CNET continues, "Of the 10 such representatives who spoke on panels at the meeting, many urged the group to probe more deeply into the constitutional issues surrounding electronic surveillance, data mining and swapping, and terrorist watch list programs conducted by the government. Some didn't mince words. … 'When our government is torturing innocent people and spying on Americans without a warrant, this board should act--indeed, should have acted long ago,' Caroline Fredrickson, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Washington, D.C., office, told the panel in her testimony. … Training her gaze on the five presidentially appointed board members, she added: 'Clearly you've been fiddling while Rome burns.' … The board, borne out of an act of Congress in 2004 based on recommendations by the 9/11 Commission, has been dogged before. 9/11 Commission Chairman Thomas Kean, congressional Democrats, and watchdog groups accused the Bush administration of not taking the endeavor seriously and dragging their feet in nominating members and getting the group up and running."

Italian Prosecutors Seek Indictment Of 25 CIA "Operatives" In Rendition Case. The New York Times (12/6, Fisher, Povoledo, 1.16M) reports, "Italian prosecutors asked Tuesday for the indictment of the country's former intelligence chief, along with 25 operatives of the Central Intelligence Agency, for their involvement in the kidnapping of a militant Egyptian cleric from Milan in 2003. The case is one of the most sensitive in Italy, raising the question of whether the Italian government broke the nation's laws by approving or assisting in the abduction." The Times notes, "It is the first case in the world in which local officials have been tried in the contentious program of 'extraordinary rendition,' a program in which U.S. agents abducted scores of suspected Islamic militants after Sept. 11, 2001. The suspects are believed to have been taken to interrogation centers in third countries, some of which permit torture. The case has complicated relations between Italy and the United States, though until now Italy has not asked for the agents' extradition, meaning that any trials against them could take place in absentia."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Government Urges Holiday Travelers To Keep Watch For Terrorists. The Washington Post's (12/6, A23) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that "Uncle Sam hopes you'll remain vigilant, on the lookout for terrorists who also might be heading home to see their families" for the holidays. The State Department and the Department of Homeland Security are "distributing hundreds of 'wanted terrorist' posters to major airports around the country."

Jackson-Lee's Complaint About Airport Security Draws Faint Praise. The Washington Times (12/6, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside The Beltway" column that gun control advocate Rep. Sheila Jackson-Lee "was going through security at George Bush Intercontinental Airport in Houston when the alarm sounded not once, but twice. However, when she was placed in a queue for follow-up screening, Mrs. Jackson-Lee 'complained' about the process, according to the DHS." When she "insisted on retrieving her personal carry-on items, a Transportation Security Administration (TSA) officer informed her that she would first have to be rescreened, at which point the lawmaker continued to complain. Now, one group is actually coming to the congresswoman's defense. Or is it?" In a two-page letter, Michael L. Bane, founder of the Armed Passengers Project, says, "I cannot commend you enough for criticizing the humiliating and degrading treatment that travelers must endure undergoing security screening."

DHS Extends Comment Period On Traveler Risk Assessments. In an article appearing on at least 65 news websites, the AP (12/5, Sniffen) reported, "Under pressure from Congress and the public, the Homeland Security Department extended the time for people to comment on its computerized risk assessment system for international travelers" from Dec. 4 to Dec. 29. As of Tuesday, the department "had received 59 public comments," all but one either opposing "the system outright" or calling "for better means for people to correct any errors in the data. … Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., who will become chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee when Democrats take control of Congress in January, wrote Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff seeking extension of the comment period." The AP added that the assessments, made using the Automatic Targeting System, "are based on applying so-called rules, which are actually assumptions based on the past behavior of terrorists and criminals, to the person's travel records."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/6, Marks, 59K) reports the program "is generating a growing controversy both in the United States and abroad." Officials at Customs and Border Protection, which assigns international travelers with scores "designed to identify high-risk travelers," say the program is "a crucial tool to protect the nation." However, "some congressional leaders, privacy advocates, and travel executives believe it's an unparalleled use of data-mining to invade individuals' privacy. Some European leaders also object, claiming the program…violates a privacy agreement worked out between the US and the European Union."

Investigations Find Clerics' Removal From Flight Was Justified. The Washington Times (12/6, Hudson, 88K) reports, "Three parallel investigations into the removal of six imams from a US Airways flight last month have so far concluded that the airline acted properly, that the imams' claims they were merely praying and their eviction was racially inspired are without foundation. An internal investigation by the airline found that air and ground crews 'acted correctly' when they requested that the Muslim men be removed from a Minneapolis-to-Phoenix flight on Nov. 20." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said an investigation by the agency's Office of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties had found no indication of "any inappropriate activity, at least no indication at this time." An investigation by the Air Carrier Security Committee of the Air Line Pilots Association concluded that "decisions made by all the parties were made as a result of the behavior of the passengers and not as a result of their ethnicity."

Imams' Actions Seen As Deliberately Provocative. Debra Burlingame, a director of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation and the sister of Charles F. "Chic" Burlingame III, the pilot of American Airlines flight 77, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/6, A16, 2.04M) that "Allahu Akbar," the words spoken by the six "bearded imams" before their flight, were also the "very last human sound on the cockpit voice recorder of United flight 93 before it screamed into the ground at 580 miles per hour." Burlingame says, "Given that Islamic terrorists continue their obsession with turning airplanes into weapons of mass destruction, it is nothing short of obscene that these six religious leaders -- fresh from attending a conference of the North American Imams Federation, featuring discussions on 'Imams and Politics' and 'Imams and the Media' -- chose to turn that airport into a stage and that airplane into a prop in the service of their need for grievance theater." Burlingame adds, "The imams, experienced travelers all, counted on the security system established after 9/11 to kick in, and now they plan not only to benefit financially from the proper operation of that system but to substantially weaken it -- with help from the Saudi-endowed attorneys" at the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Former HHS Secretary Urges Congress To Invest In ER One Project. Tommy Thompson, former secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, in an op-ed in the Hill (12/6, Thompson) writes, "More than five years after Sept. 11, 2001, no state is adequately prepared for a potential mass-casualty disaster caused by a terrorist attack, pandemic or natural disaster." Thompson says a provision under this year's major spending bill for the Department of Health and Human Services that would fund the "ER One" project is "arguably one of the smartest investments that Congress could make, and it deserves to be approved." The Washington Hospital Center emergency facility "will serve as an education center and working research laboratory for testing and publishing new approaches to managing risks."

Woman Arrested After Throwing Package Into Old Executive Office Building Courtyard. The AP (12/6) reports, "Streets around the White House were closed Tuesday morning after a woman threw a package into the courtyard of the adjacent Old Executive Office Building. The woman was taken into custody without incident and was being questioned by the Secret Service, said Darrin Blackford, a spokesman for the service. The package was being investigated but no immediate details were available."

GAO Report Says FEMA Failing To Recoup Unjust Payments. The New York Times (12/6, Lipton, 1.16M) reports a new Government Accountability Office report says FEMA "has recouped less than 1 percent of an estimated $1 billion in fraudulent or unjustified payments it distributed after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita." The report also says "the agency continued to wrongly send out millions of dollars of new aid this year, including $17 million in rental assistance to families living rent-free in FEMA trailers." The findings, set for release Wednesday, "demonstrate how the agency has remained open to criticism from advocates for evacuees as being too stingy with people who have real needs, and to criticism from auditors as being too willing to give taxpayer dollars to scam artists and cheats." Sen. Joe Lieberman, the ranking Democrat on the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, which has scheduled a hearing for Wednesday on Hurricane Katrina-related fraud and abuse, said the agency "has much work to do before we can be confident that it is providing assistance to those who are eligible and who need it, while denying it to those who do not."

FEMA Says It Will Appeal Housing Aid Decision. The AP (12/5) reported FEMA announced Tuesday that it would appeal "a court order requiring it to make housing payments to thousands of families whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina. US District Judge Richard J. Leon said last week that confusing, often contradictory letters to hurricane victims from the Federal Emergency Management Agency didn't explain why housing funding was cut. He said that violated the Constitution, and he ordered the agency to restart the program immediately." The agency "may ask an appeals court to put the judge's ruling on hold while the appeal plays out."

Evacuees Relying On FEMA Said To Find Little Stability. The New York Times (12/6, Dewan, 1.16M) reports Wynaen Walker, whose Lake Charles home was destroyed by Hurricane Rita, returned to her FEMA trailer one day in October to find that its "lock had been changed." She "had been displaced by a family from one of five FEMA trailer parks at the nearby Baton Rouge Metropolitan Airport that are scheduled to close in April. Though her move was a mistake, it is one that residents say the agency has made repeatedly in its trailer parks. … More than a year after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, life is still precarious and unpredictable for many evacuees, especially those who have depended on the government for a modicum of stability."

WAR NEWS:

Gates Says US "Not Winning" In Iraq. The AP (12/6, Burns) reports, "Robert Gates, seemingly clinching confirmation as the new secretary of defense, said Tuesday the United States is not winning in Iraq and he's confident President Bush will listen to his ideas about forging a new war strategy." Gates "won speedy and unanimous approval from the Senate Armed Services Committee after five hours of testimony, a bipartisan show of support that suggested how eager many lawmakers are to replace Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon. The full Senate could seal Gates' confirmation as early as Wednesday." The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Spiegel, Barnes, 850K) notes the expected quick approval of the nomination "would contrast with Gates' confirmation hearings in 1991, one of the longest and most contentious in recent Senate history. At the time, Gates was grilled on his knowledge of the Iran-Contra scandal and accusations that he bullied analysts into shaping intelligence to fit his worldview."

Gates is receiving glowing media reviews following yesterday's hearing, much of it focusing on his statement that the US "isn't winning in Iraq." That statement, seen as a deviation from the Administration's line on Iraq, is getting extensive media play. The CBS Evening News (12/5, lead story, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "No matter how much the violence has worsened in Iraq, no matter how high the death toll has risen…Bush has insisted United States is winning. He said so as recently as six weeks ago at a White House news conference. Today, that question was asked again, this time to the man who will soon be in charge of the war." CBS (Martin) added, "Gates said what no senior official of the Bush Administration has dared utter publicly." The Washington Times (12/6, Scarborough, 88K) also says Gates' assertion that the US is "not winning" seemed to "put the nominee at odds with the commander in chief," while The Hill (12/6, Tiron) reports, "Senate critics of the war saw the nominee's opinion, given in a response during his nomination hearing, as a sharp departure from the president's position." The New York Times (12/6, Cloud, Mazzetti, 1.16M) notes Gates also "appeared to differ slightly with Mr. Bush's frequent declaration that Iraq is the 'central battlefield' in fighting terrorists. Asked if he agreed with that description, Mr. Gates called Iraq 'one of the central fronts in the war on terror' but said the United States also faced a 'dispersed' enemy of Islamic militants worldwide." But "he was more direct in criticizing the Bush administration's decision to disband the Iraqi Army and, for a time, to bar from government jobs tens of thousands of Iraqis who were members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party."

The Los Angeles Times (12/6, Barnes, 850K) says "Gates stepped into what passes in the nation's capital for a congressional love-fest Tuesday for the simple reason that he was not Donald H. Rumsfeld. … The soft-spoken Gates, it seemed, could do no wrong, eliciting praise from Republicans and Democrats for his 'candor' and 'forthrightness.'" McClatchy (12/6, Stearns) reports Gates "received a warm, if stern, welcome," and the Washington Post (12/6, A1, Tyson, Ricks, 690K) notes the "cordial reception by the Senate Armed Services Committee,"

In his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (12/6, A2, 690K), Dana Milbank makes light of the "love fest." Writes Milbank, "And so it came to pass, in the 12th month of the sixth year of the reign of Bush, that a prophet came forth to deliver us from the war in Babylon." The "rapturous senators seemed to regard the president's second defense secretary as a harbinger of the Second Coming." Gates "earned these very, very nice words because of one very important attribute: He is not Donald Rumsfeld. He gave no wiseacre answers, asked himself no questions and said nothing to disparage the 'Army you have.' Instead, he made the obvious statement that the Bush administration, until yesterday, had refused to utter: We are not winning in Iraq."

Even editorial pages that often are highly critical of the Administration this morning sing the nominee's praises. The Washington Post (12/6, 690K) lauds Gates' "refreshingly candid voice" and "frankness," and the New York Times (12/6, 1.16M), in an editorial titled "The Un-Rumsfeld," says Gates "played the role of the un-Rumsfeld masterfully yesterday. He offered just enough candor and conciliation to persuade most senators that he plans to be a very different sort of defense secretary, while deftly holding back any real information about how he plans to clean up…Bush's mess in Iraq." However, adds the Times, "Iraq is unraveling so fast that Mr. Gates will have to come up with opinions quickly, and be willing to express them to the president forcefully." USA Today (12/6, 2.27M) editorializes, "After almost four years of prickly denials from…Rumsfeld that anything was wrong with the Pentagon's plan in Iraq, it was refreshing Tuesday to hear his successor acknowledge that things are not going so well." His "chief strength" is that he is not Rumsfeld. Even Maureen Dowd, in a New York Times column (12/6, 1.16M) titled "Goodness Gracious! The Truth!" praises Gates for the "sort of realistic assessment that never came from Rummy." Dowd adds that "the old criticisms of whether Mr. Gates massaged intelligence were forgotten; the senators would have embraced an ax-murderer if he had seemed sensible about Iraq."

On ABC World News (12/5, story 2, 2:05, 8.78M), George Stephanopoulos said Gates "was the anti-Rumsfeld. He was direct. He was deferential. He didn't pretend to have the answers. That's why he's going to sail through." Tim Tussert said on NBC Nightly News (12/5, story 2, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported that what "you heard over and over again" was "candor, refreshing, fresh start, new eyes. Put this in context. Who would have thought that less than a month ago that Donald Rumsfeld would be pushed out as Secretary of Defense and his replacement would come forward and say we're not winning the war and basically say that his appointment or nomination is an admission that things have to change in Iraq? That's why the vote is unanimous. Both Republicans and Democrats are yearning for a fresh start on Iraq."
